Islam, as many scholars and journalists, like Guy Behor do. More British Muslims fight in Syria than in the UK armed forces. 200,000 Muslims are involved in Radical Muslim terrorism in ISIS, al-Qaeda, Hamas, Hezbollah, and other Jihadists, while only 19 can instigate 9/11 and murder 3,000 people in New York and Washington, 8 can murder 130 Parisians in 13/11, and very small numbers can murder tens of thousands innocent civilians in Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria, Europe and America. In the second layer there are the Islamists who want to impose their religion on the rest of humanity, using also democracy like they did in Gaza (don't worry when they take power they forget about democracy, like the Nazis did). They use the political and cultural system to further their aims. The Muslim Brothers with Mohammed Morsi won the elections in Egypt and wanted to impose Islamic Law in Egypt, limit the rights of women like in Iran. They back and finance terrorist organizations like Hamas, al-Qaeda, etc. They try to silence liberals, threaten them, boycott Israel, and accuse liberals of being racists and anti-Muslims if they oppose them. They have supporters in America and Europe. Dilemma – what should prevail democracy (at least initially) or human rights? But politically correct politicians let them participate in elections, let them speak and write freely, don't ban their organizations, why?

The third layer are Fundamentalists wanting to impose Sharia Law, and according to surveys they are hundreds of millions, not 0.1%, hundreds of millions from the total of 1.6 trillion Muslims, expanding at a very fast rate. They are against terrorism, they don't want to overthrow governments, but they hold beliefs and practises against women rights, homosexuals. In 2013 a comprehensive survey was conducted among thousands of Muslims in 29 countries, and a majority of them believed that those who leave the Muslim faith should be executed, honor killing of women can be justifiable for women who had extra-marital affairs. The Muslim World is increasingly out of step with the modern world. As a matter of fact we faced such a situation after the collapse of the Roman empire when the "I will not say barbaric as I want to be politically correct" conquered Europe and shortly after the Muslims conquered half of Europe. We had for more than a thousand years the Middle Ages where human progress stood still, but in modern times we'll not have this privilege because if the Fundamentalist will get hold of Atomic weapons they will use it bringing the end of the world. 42% of the young French Muslims believe that suicide bombings against civilians can be justified (remember 13/11/2015), 35% of the British Muslims (remember 7/7/2005), 26% of American Muslims (remember 9/11/2001). The young generation is becoming more and more radical. 52% want the Sharia Law to be the law of the land in Muslim majority countries, stoning women, amputating thieves...

Many Israelis who were frustrated from the occupation of the West Bank and the alleged infringement of human rights to the Palestinians left the country to Italy, Sweden, but no Jew has left to Muslim countries, except Giuliano Mer who was murdered by Muslim extremists in Jenin. Many of them compare Israel to Nazi Germany and themselves to Thomas Mann who fled Nazi Germany. I refer extensively to the fallacy of this comparison in my book, I'll just say here that there were no terrorist Jews who killed Nazis or Germans by the thousands. The Jews who were persecuted contributed so much to Europe's culture, economy and science, while ISIS, al-Qaeda, Iran, Hamas and other Muslim extremists have contributed mainly terrorism and murder. It is true that many Palestinian civilians were killed and harassed in checkpoints and walls/fences but none of them was persecuted because he was an Arab (except very rare cases of Jewish terrorism who are horrible and should be punished like Arab terrorism), but because other Arabs murdered thousands of civilians and it was necessary to build walls/fences and checkpoints in order to stop these murders. I believe like Herzl, like Elon and like Avineri that Israel should be a model of human rights, peace, progress and freedom, with equal rights to all its citizens – Jews and Arabs. I am against the occupation and has devised in this book a plan how to end occupation and still keep Israel's security – not like the doves propose to withdraw from all or most of the West Bank, establishing a Palestinian demilitarized State, that will be demilitarized like Gaza with or without blockade that has only one purpose to prevent Hamas from receiving rockets and weapons, and that will be a state like Syria and Iraq are states with ISIS, Hamas and other extremist organizations destroying in a week the Palestinian army, conquering the West Bank and launching rockets to Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa. The Palestinians have the right for a state but not in snail states that cannot survive economically and politically, but as part of a Palestinian/Jordanian Kingdom with joint forces with Israel that will preserve the Kingdom against ISIS, and with better democracy than what they have now in Gaza and the West Bank, and as a matter of fact in all Arab countries. Such a state living in peace with Israel and being members of the European Union will resemble Herzl's vision of cooperation between Arabs and Jews, no more harassment, equal rights to all, no terrorism, and economic progress and welfare.

Amos Elon (Hebrew: עמוס אילון, July 4, 1926 – May 25, 2009) was an Israeli journalist and author. Married to Beth Elon and father of filmmaker Danae Elon. Amos Elon was born in Vienna. He immigrated to Mandate Palestine in 1933. He studied law and history in Israel and England. He was married to Beth Elon, a New York-born literary agent, with whom he had one daughter, Danae. In the 1990s, Elon began to spend much of his time in Italy. In 2004 he moved there permanently, citing disillusionment with developments in Israel since 1967. Elon died on May 25, 2009, in Tuscany, Italy, aged 82. Beginning in the 1950s, Elon served as a correspondent on European and American affairs for the newspaper Haaretz. He took a leave of absence from Haaretz in 1971 and resumed in 1978. Amos retired from Haaretz in 2001. Amos Elon was an early advocate for the creation of a Palestinian state and withdrawal from the territories occupied by Israel in 1967. He was a frequent contributor to the New York Review of Books and The New York Times Magazine. For many years, he was widely regarded as one of Israel's leading journalists. Elon was the author of nine books. He rose to international fame in the early 1970s after publishing The Israelis: Founders and Builders, described as "an affectionate but unsparing portrait of the early Zionists".

Shlomo Avineri (Hebrew: שלמה אבינרי) (born 1933, Bielsko, Poland) is an Israeli political scientist. He is Professor of Political Science at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and member of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities. He also serves as Recurring Visiting Professor at the Central European University in Budapest and Fellow of a Munich-based academic think tank offering advice to politicians (German: Centrum für angewandte Politikforschung). Avineri has written extensively in the history of political philosophy, especially on the political thought of Marx, Hegel, and on the early Zionist political theories of Moses Hess and Theodor Herzl. He has also written numerous books and articles on Middle Eastern affairs and international affairs. Avineri contributed in revising Hegel's political thought and showing Hegel's pluralism. Avineri was also involved in the debate over the dissolution of the Soviet Union. He argued that it was the pre-capitalist structure of 1917 Russia, as well as the strong authoritarian traditions of the Russian state and its weak civil society, which pushed the Soviet revolution towards its repressive development. His recent intellectual biography of Herzl shows how developments in his native Austro-Hungarian Empire, rather than the Dreyfus Affair in France, convinced Herzl of the failure of Jewish emancipation in Europe and of the need to find a political solution for the Jews, based on national self-determination, outside of Europe. His work has appeared in Dissent, Foreign Affairs, and The New York Review of Books. He frequently contributes Op-eds to Haaretz. He is a member of the Editorial Board of the Jewish Review of Books. He served as Director of Eshkol Research Institute (1971–74); Dean of Faculty of Social Sciences (1974–76); Director-General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1976–77); and Director of the Institute for European Studies at the Hebrew University (1997–2002). Avineri has had numerous visiting appointments including Yale University, Wesleyan University, Australian National University, Cornell University, University of California, The Queen's College, Oxford, Northwestern University, Cardozo School of Law, and Oxford and, most recently, the University of Toronto. He has been a visiting scholar at the Wilson Center, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and Brookings Institution in Washington, DC, and at the Institute of World Economics and International Relations in Moscow. He is currently Recurring Visiting Professor at the Central European University, in Budapest.

Avineri served as Director-General of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs from 1975–77. He also headed the Israeli delegation to the UNESCO General Assembly, and in 1979 he was a member of the joint Egyptian-Israeli commission that negotiated the Cultural and Scientific Agreement between the two countries. When the Rabin government appointed Avineri to the post of Director-General of the Foreign Ministry in 1975, this was harshly criticized by the Likud opposition because of Avineri's support for negotiations with the PLO (a Likud MK even compared him to "Lord Haw-Haw", the British traitor who had broadcast from Berlin during World War II and was later executed). During his time at the Foreign Ministry, Avineri followed the official line of the Rabin government preferring the "Jordanian Option" and participated in some of the meetings with King Hussein. But in his writings, and internal Foreign Ministry memoranda, he tried to present the conflict with the Palestinians within a wider context of a conflict between two national movements, beyond the narrow ideological or security-oriented conventional Israeli discourse. At that time, some of the first unofficial meetings between Israeli peace activists and PLO officials also took place. These developments were curtailed by the Likud electoral victory in 1977, which also led to Avineri's resignation from the Foreign Ministry, but were resumed in the 1990s in the second government of Rabin and led to the Oslo accords between Israel and the PLO.

HENRIK IBSEN – A BIOGRAPHY BY ROBERT FERGUSON

I wrote extensively about Henrik Ibsen and his work in my books and articles, and indeed Ibsen is my favorite playwright, and An Enemy of the People one of the best plays that I have ever read and seen. I have taught this play dozens of times to classes from different backgrounds, and all of them reacted enthusiastically to this play. In this book I refer also to Henrik Ibsen and his plays, so in this chapter I'll bring others opinions on Ibsen, his biography and some of his plays. First published in 1996, Robert Ferguson's controversial Henrik Ibsen: A New Biography is perhaps the most irreverent and critical of all the Ibsen biographies. Ferguson provides insight into Ibsen's personal life, his creative work, and the world in which he lived. He paints the portrait of a complex, emotionally tormented artist ... not one who is necessarily likable, but one whom we can understand and appreciate. Using previously unavailable material, including a letter in which Ibsen admits paternity of his illegitimate son, Ferguson chips through the hard enamel of Ibsen's public reputation. He details many of Ibsen's private traumas, such as how his inability to pay for the child's support very nearly landed him in jail, and shows the real impact of these experiences on Ibsen's growth, both as a man and as a playwright. The book clearly demonstrates that Ibsen was one of the great therapeutic artists. Henrik Ibsen: A New Biography is a deeply researched, wide-ranging account of the man often called the founder of modern drama. At the time of its publication it polarised the critics and stirred up a great deal of debate. Essential reading for anyone interested in Ibsen and in the development of the modern theatre.

Henrik Ibsen was a Norwegian playwright, one of "the four great ones" with Alexander Kielland, Jonas Lie and Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson of the 19th-century Norwegian literature. Ibsen is generally acknowledged as the founder of modern prose drama. He moved away from the Romantic style, and brought the problems and ideas of the day onto the stage of his time. Ibsen's famous plays, Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867), were originally not intended for the stage; they were "reading dramas". "... And what does it mean, then to be a poet? It was a long time before I realized that to be a poet means essentially to see, but mark well, to see in such a way that whatever is seen is perceived by the audience just as the poet saw it. But only what has been lived through can be seen in that way and accepted in that way. And the secret of modern literature lies precisely in this matter of experiences that are lived through. All that I have written these last ten years, I have lived through spiritually." ('Speech to the Norwegian Students, September 10, 1874, from Speeches and New Letters, 1910)

Henrik Ibsen was born in Skien, a tiny coastal town in the south of Norway. His father, Knud Ibsen, was a prosperous merchant, whose financial failure changed the family's social position. Later Ibsen bitterly recalled how his father's friends broke all connections with him and the "Altenburg Manor", earlier known for its dinners and festivities. In disgrace the family moved to Venstøp farmhouse, provided to them by the creditors. As a child Ibsen dreamed of becoming an artist. His mother, Marichen Cornelia Martine Altenburg, was an avid painter, and she loved theatre. Ibsen's education was interrupted by poverty and at the age of 15 he was apprenticed to a pharmacist in Grimstad. In 1846 he was compelled to support an illegitimate child born to a servant girl. Ibsen moved in 1850 to Christiania (now Oslo), where he attended Heltberg's "student factory", an irregular school for university candidates, and occasionally earned from his journalistic writings. In the same year he wrote two plays, Cataline, a tragedy, which reflected the atmosphere of the revolutionary year of 1848, and The Burial Mound, written under the pseudonym of Brynjolf Bjarme. Ibsen hoped to become a physician, but failed university entrance examinations.

Cataline sold only a few copies but The Burial Mound was performed three times in 1850. The first performance of Cataline did not take place until 1881. After successfully performing a poem glorifying Norway's past, Ibsen was appointed in 1851 by Ole Bull as "stage poet" of Den Nationale Scene, a small theater in Bergen. During this period Ibsen staged more than 150 plays, becoming thoroughly acquainted with the techniques of professional theatrical performances. In addition to his managerial work he also wrote four plays based on Norwegian folklore and history, notably Lady Inger of Ostrat (1855), dealing with the liberation of medieval Norway. In 1852 his theater sent him on a study tour to Denmark and Germany. Ibsen returned in 1857 to Christiania to continue as artistic director of the new Norwegian (Norske) Theatre. In 1858 he married Suzannah Thoresen, the stepchild of the novelist Magdalene Thoresen. Their only child, Sigurd, was born next year. After many productions, the theater went bankrupt, and Ibsen was appointed to the Christiania Theatre. To this period belong The Vikings of Helgoland (1858) and The Pretenders (1864), both historical sagas, and Love's Comedy (1862), a satire. Several of Ibsen's plays failed to attract audience. These drawbacks contributed to his decision to move abroad. In 1864 Ibsen received an award for foreign travel from the government, and also had financial help from Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. He left Norway for Italy in April, and traveled abroad for the next 27 years, returning to Norway only for brief visits. During this time, when he lived in Rome, Munich and Dresden, Ibsen wrote most of his best-known works, among others Brand, inspired by Kierkegaard's idea of subjectivity as truth. The symbolic tragedy tells about a priest, who follows his high principles at the cost of the lives of his child and his wife. Its theme, an individual with his God-given mission pitted against society, reflected Ibsen's disappointment in weak and spineless politicians.

Brand's firm belief is "No compromise!". At the end Brand admits his own weakness and is buried by an avalanche. Peer Gynt (1867), written mostly in Southern Italy, in Ischia and in Sorrento, was a satiric fantasy about a boastful egoist, irresponsible young man, an Ulyssean figure from Norwegian folklore. In both of these works the romantic hero is destroyed and their "ideal demands" are crushed. No doubt the themes also rose from Ibsen's disillusionment with his countrymen. In 1865 he wrote to Björnson: "If I were to tell at this moment what has been the chief result of my stay abroad, I should say that it consisted in my having driven out of myself the aestheticism which had a great power over me – an isolated aestheticism with a claim to independent existence. Aestheticism of this kind seems to me now as a great curse to poetry as theology is to religion." Ibsen himself considered The Emperor and the Galilean (1873) his most important play. However, this heavy drama about Christianity and paganism is generally not included among his most important achievements. Pillars of Society (1877) dealt with a wealthy and hypocritical businessman, whose perilous course almost results in the death of his son. A Doll's House (1879) was a social drama, which caused a sensation and toured Europe and America. In the play a woman refuses to obey her husband and walks out from her apparently perfect marriage, her life in the "doll's house". At the turn-of-the-century physicians used Nora, whose mood changes from joy to depression in short cycles of time, as an example of "female hysteria". Later Havelock Ellis, inspired by Nora's character, saw in her "the promise of a new social order."

In An Enemy of the People (1882) Ibsen attacked "the compact liberal majority" and the mass opinion. Arthur Miller's adaptation from 1950 was a clear statement of resistance to conformity. "The majority," says the honest and brave Dr. Stockmann, "is never right until it does right." Ghosts (1881) touched the forbidden subject of hereditary venereal disease. The London Daily Telegraph called the play "an open drain; a loathsome sore unbandaged; a dirty act done publicly; a lazaret house with all its doors and windows open." Again a bourgeois façade hides moral decay and guilt. Mrs. Alving, the widow of the respected Captain Alving, has to reveal to her son Oswald the ugly truth about his disease. Eventually she has to decide whether or not to euthanize his son, whose mind has disintegrated. Hedda Gabler (1890) was a study of a neurotic woman. Oscar Wilde, after attending the play, wrote: "I felt pity and terror, as though the play had been Greek." Hedda, twenty-nine years old, has married down, is pregnant with an unwanted child, and bored by her husband. Before marriage she has flirted with the drunken poet Loevborg, a portrait of the playwright Strindberg, who hated Ibsen. She plots to the ruin of Loevborg by burning his manuscript on the future of civilization. Judge Brack, who lusts after Hedda, discovers that Hedda has instigated Loevborg's accidental suicide - he has died in a bordello. Hedda cries: "Oh, why does everything I touch become mean and ludicrous? It's like a curse!" Brack gives her the choice either of public exposure or of becoming his mistress. But Hedda chooses suicide when she falls into his power.

In 1866 Ibsen received poet's annual stipend. He also had royalties from his dramatic poem Brand, his first financially successful drama. With the receipt of a new grant, he visited Stockholm, dined with the King, and later represented Norway at the opening of the Suez Canal. In the 1870s he worked with the composer Edward Grieg on the premiere of Peer Gynt. Grieg had met Ibsen in Rome in 1866; the play was written a year after their meeting. They never became close but Ibsen felt that the busy conductor and virtuoso pianist had a real understanding of his work. In January 1874 he commissioned Grieg to provide incidental music for the play, which he never intended to be staged. The assignment was completed in September of the following year and was premiered in Oslo, together with a revised stage version of the drama, on February 24, 1876. Both the author and the composer were surprised by its success. When Ibsen spent a couple months in Norway during the summer of 1874, Norwegian students marched in procession to his home to greet him. In reply Ibsen said: "For a student has essentially the same task as the poet: to make clear to himself, and thereby to others, the temporal and eternal questions which are astir in the age and in the community to which he belongs." (from Speeches and New Letters)

Ibsen returned to Norway in 1891 and continued to write until a stroke in 1900. His marriage was joyless, but he had a few episodes of friendship with young women. In 1898 Ibsen received the world's homage on the occasion of his 70th birthday. George Bernard Shaw called him the greatest living dramatist in a lecture entitled 'The Quintessence of Ibsenism'. Ibsen's son married Bjørnson's daughter Bergliot. The marriage built a bridge of friendship between the two writers. Their relationship had broken after Ibsen's play The League of Youth (1869), where the central character resembled Bjørnson. Ibsen died in Christiania on May 23, 1906. Ibsen's final years were clouded by mental illness. When We Dead Awaken (1899), his last dramatic effort, showed the influence of Strindberg. James Joyce, who was from his student days a great admirer of Ibsen's work, published a laudatory essay on the play in the 1 April 1900 issue of the Fortnightly Review. It was Joyce's first published piece. A supposedly unknown Ibsen play, entitled The Sun God, surfaced in 2006 and an antiquarian bookshop in Oslo was offered a chance to buy it. After police investigation, a Norwegian scriptwriter and actor was charged in 2011 for forging writings and documents that allegedly originated from Ibsen and Knut Hamsun. "A woman cannot be herself in the society of the present day, which is an exclusively masculine society, with laws framed by men and with judicial system that judges feminine conduct from a masculine point of view." (from Ibsen's Workshop, 1912)

Ibsen wrote for and about the middle class and life in the suburbs and small towns. He focused on characters and psychological conflicts rather than dramatic situations. His central theme was the duty of the individual towards himself, not the out-of-date conventions of bourgeois society. "I have really never had a strong feeling for solidarity," Ibsen said to Brandes in 1871. Ibsen's anarchistic individualism made a deep impression on the younger generation outside Norway, where he was considered a progressive writer. In his home country, however, Ibsen was seen as a moral preacher and more conservative than Bjørnson. Ibsen's disciple or successor was George Bernard Shaw, who dramatized with flair and wit generally accepted ideas into uncompromising plays. Peer Gynt (1867), a verse drama. The hero is the legendary Peer Gynt of Norwegian Folklore. Peer is a young peasant farmer, a liar and opportunist, the antithesis of Brandes; he has no calling. He attends the country wedding feast, where he meets Solveig, a girl who is deeply attracted to him. Peer kidnaps the bride and later abandons her in the wilderness. A fugitive now, Peer experiences, like Sinbad the sailor, amazing adventures in many lands. He courts and then abandons the daughter of the Troll King. Before fleeing the country, he visits Aase, his aged mother, whose death he softens by a fantasy of a sleigh ride into an imaginary heaven. In his middle life Peer ships missionaries and idols to China, and becomes a slave trader. "To be creator of the universe, / So I need gold if I'm to play / The emperor's part with any force." He makes and loses money, and saves his own life in a shipwreck by letting another drown. Eventually Peer returns to Norway, old and embittered by his fruitless odyssey. He comes up before the Button Molder, who tells that "Friend, it's melting time," and tries to melt him in his ladle. Peer asks what is "to be yourself" and the Button Molder answers: "To be yourself is to slay yourself." Peer is horrified at the idea of losing his precious identity. However, he is saved from oblivion by the redeeming love Solveig, who has waited for him faithfully and in whose mind he has existed as a real personality. Peer discovers his reason for being in her forgiving arms. Incidental music accompany the play was composed by Edward Grieg. - "Whatever his critics think, Ibsen does not regard Peer as a failure or a hollow man. Faust, Part Two is an even greater dramatic poem than Peer Gynt, but unlike Faust, Peer is the triumphant representation of a personality. What Ibsen values in Peer is what we should value: the idiosyncratic that refuses to be melted down into the reductive or the commonplace..." (Harold Bloom in The Western Canon, 1994)

LEE KUAN YEW – AUTOBIOGRAPHY – MEMOIRS – FROM THIRD WORLD TO FIRST

I was much impressed from Singapore when I visited it for the first time on business and much more in 2006 when I taught there a whole semester at Insead. There are many affinities between Israel and Singapore and indeed both countries cooperated tightly on defense issues. Lee Kuan Yew is Singapore and Singapore is Lee Kuan Yew, one of the most outstanding leaders of the twentieth century, and by far the most remarkable leader of the third world who manage to bring his country from the third world to the first. Singapore is one of the most advanced countries in the world mostly because of its leader. There were so many leaders in the new independent states, former colonies, in the second half of the twentieth century, who failed so harshly in their missions and so few who succeeded but none has succeeded so much as Singapore and none had the stature of Lee Kuan Yew. I have great admiration to Ben Gurion, who has also succeeded very much in bringing Israel from third world to first, but he did not succeed, nor have the other Israeli leaders, to achieve peace with Israel's neighbors. We still have huge problems, terrorism, inequality, tense relations between the seculars, ultra-Orthodox Jews, and Israeli Arabs, many countries perceive us very negatively, we are boycotted by many intellectuals, Iran wants to annihilate us, the Palestinians incite their children to murder Jews and become Shahids. But Lee Kuan Yew was so clever that in a similar situation as Israel, a Chinese population of 75% of the country, surrounded by huge Muslim states as Malaysia and Indonesia, with a large minority of Muslims, he managed to achieve peace, admiration, and respect by all the countries of the world.

If we compare Lee Kuan Yew to other leaders who did a lot for their countries, we see that he has done much more in most fields, compared to Kenya's Jomo Kenyatta, Cote d'Ivoire's Felix Houphouet-Boigny, Taiwan's Chiang Kai-shek – another Chinese, Senegal's Leopold Senghor, Malaysia's Tunku Abdul Rahman, Indonesia's Sukarno, and I am not speaking of most negative leaders like Uganda's Idi Amin, communist regimes in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos, dictatorial regimes like Burma, Pinochet in Chile, and other Latin American, African, and Asian regimes. I will not refer in this chapter on the democratic issues of Singapore, I've done it at length in my other book Ethics Pays. I would only say that it is unfair to compare Singapore to Denmark – both are very ethical and receive the highest results in all the parameters of welfare, yet Denmark is the most democratic country in the world and Singapore under Lee's rule was criticised, particularly in the West, for curtailing civil liberties (public protests, media control) and bringing libel suits against political opponents. He argued that such disciplinary measures were necessary for political stability, which together with rule of law, were essential for economic progress. I can cite here one example – when I taught in Singapore in 2006 I heard on the news that the government has issued directives for the country's companies to hire elder people, this move was praised as benefiting the companies with the elders' experience and assiduousness and the elders by letting them continue to be productive in spite of their old age. Chinese are very respectful for their elders and I was very moved by this humanist approach, especially coming from a country as Israel which has adopted the ultra neoliberal attitude of American companies to maximize profits without taking into consideration humanistic factors – laying off "elder" persons aged 50 and letting them be unemployed or in low salaries jobs for another 20 years until they get their pension if at all. Advocates of the free market are outraged by "directives" of the government, telling them whom to hire or fire, but as a manager whose job was to find employment for elderly people aged 50 or more who were excellent employees and managers, I was very moved by this directive, which shows how humane & in favor of the citizens is the regime in Singapore.

Few gave tiny Singapore much chance of survival when it was granted independence in 1965. How is it, then, that today the former British colonial trading post is a thriving Asian metropolis with not only the world's number one airline, best airport, and busiest port of trade, but also the world's fourth-highest per capita real income? The story of that transformation is told here by Singapore's charismatic, controversial founding father, Lee Kuan Yew. Rising from a legacy of divisive colonialism, the devastation of the Second World War, and general poverty and disorder following the withdrawal of foreign forces, Singapore now is hailed as a city of the future. This miraculous history is dramatically recounted by the man who not only lived through it all but who fearlessly forged ahead and brought about most of these changes. Delving deep into his own meticulous notes, as well as previously unpublished government papers and official records, Lee details the extraordinary efforts it took for an island city-state in Southeast Asia to survive at that time. Lee explains how he and his cabinet colleagues finished off the communist threat to the fledgling state's security and began the arduous process of nation building: forging basic infrastructural roads through a land that still consisted primarily of swamps, creating an army from a hitherto racially and ideologically divided population, stamping out the last vestiges of colonial-era corruption, providing mass public housing, and establishing a national airline and airport. In this illuminating account, Lee writes frankly about his trenchant approach to political opponents and his often unorthodox views on human rights, democracy, and inherited intelligence, aiming always "to be correct, not politically correct." Nothing in Singapore escaped his watchful eye: whether choosing shrubs for the greening of the country, restoring the romance of the historic Raffles Hotel, or openly, unabashedly persuading young men to marry women as well educated as themselves. Today's safe, tidy Singapore bears Lee's unmistakable stamp, for which he is unapologetic: "If this is a nanny state, I am proud to have fostered one."

Though Lee's domestic canvas in Singapore was small, his vigor and talent assured him a larger place in world affairs. With inimitable style, he brings history to life with cogent analyses of some of the greatest strategic issues of recent times and reveals how, over the years, he navigated the shifting tides of relations among America, China, and Taiwan, acting as confidant, sounding board, and messenger for them. He also includes candid, sometimes acerbic pen portraits of his political peers, including the indomitable Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan, the poetry-spouting Jiang Zemin, and ideologues George Bush and Deng Xiaoping. Lee also lifts the veil on his family life and writes tenderly of his wife and stalwart partner, Kwa Geok Choo, and of their pride in their three children — particularly the eldest son, Hsien Loong, who is now Singapore's deputy prime minister. For more than three decades, Lee Kuan Yew has been praised and vilified in equal measure, and he has established himself as a force impossible to ignore in Asian and international politics. From Third World to First offers readers a compelling glimpse into this visionary's heart, soul, and mind.

Amazon.com Review

In this memoir, the man most responsible for Singapore's astonishing transformation from colonial backwater to economic powerhouse describes how he did it over the last four decades. It's a dramatic story, and Lee Kuan Yew has much to brag about. To take a single example: Singapore had a per-capita GDP of just $400 when he became prime minister in 1959. When he left office in 1990, it was $12,200 and rising. (At the time of this book's writing, it was $22,000.) Much of this was accomplished through a unique mix of economic freedom and social control. Lee encouraged entrepreneurship, but also cracked down on liberties that most people in the West take for granted--chewing gum, for instance. It's banned in Singapore because of "the problems caused by spent chewing gum inserted into keyholes and mailboxes and on elevator buttons." If American politicians were to propose such a thing, they'd undoubtedly be run out of office. Lee, however, defends this and similar moves, such as strong antismoking laws and antispitting campaigns: "We would have been a grosser, ruder, cruder society had we not made these efforts to persuade people to change their ways.... It has made Singapore a more pleasant place to live in. If this is a 'nanny state,' I am proud to have fostered one."

Lee also describes one of his most controversial proposals: tax breaks and schooling incentives to encourage educated men and women to marry each other and have children. "Our best women were not reproducing themselves because men who were their educational equals did not want to marry them.... This lopsided marriage and procreation pattern could not be allowed to remain unmentioned and unchecked," writes Lee. Most of the book, however, is a chronicle of how Lee helped create so much material prosperity. Anticommunism is a strong theme throughout, and Lee comments broadly on international politics. He is cautiously friendly toward the United States, chastising it for a "dogmatic and evangelical" foreign policy that scolds other countries for human-rights violations, except when they interfere with American interests, "as in the oil-rich Arabian peninsula." Even so, he writes, "the United States is still the most benign of all the great powers.... [and] all noncommunist countries in East Asia prefer America to be the dominant weight in the power balance of the region." From Third World to First is not the most gripping book imaginable, but it is a vital document about a fascinating place in a time of profound transition. --*John J. Yew is not an endearing figure. He is arrogant, self-righteous, and seems unduly sensitive to criticism by "outsiders" of Singapore's record on human rights. Despite occasional efforts to hide his less-than-pleasant characteristics, they often burst through in his long and often fascinating account of the dramatic transformation of this island nation into a stable and prosperous society. As prime minister for more than three decades, Yew certainly merits credit for Singapore's emergence, and there is much to be learned from his version of his stewardship. This is a detailed and sometimes difficult read, particularly if one lacks a strong grounding in macroeconomics. Still, his description of the difficulties of nation building in a multiethnic society has great value; his efforts to mesh Western concepts of free enterprise with Third World traditions of a "guided economy" may not have universal applicability, but they deserve close scrutiny. This is an essential contribution in efforts to understand why some societies seem so successful in becoming important players in the global economy. Jay Freeman

10 Lessons From Lee Kuan Yew's Singapore

Are there lessons other countries might draw from the city-state's experiences?

By Prashanth Parameswaran

March 24, 2015

Few would disagree that Singapore has achieved remarkable success in transforming itself from a tiny third-world country into a first-world city state. As the country celebrates the 50th anniversary of its founding, prepares to hold elections within the next year or so, and mourns the passing of its founding prime minister Lee Kuan Yew (which The Diplomat covered here), there have been some interesting attempts to look back at the country's experience to date. In that vein, last month, one of Singapore's most renowned (and controversial) diplomats, Kishore Mahbubani, now dean and professor of practice at the Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy at the National University of Singapore, delivered a lecture in East Timor about what lessons other developing countries – including East Timor – might draw from the city-state's success. Apart from the lessons themselves, the lecture is interesting because it reveals what Singaporean elites like Mahbubani choose to emphasize – and, equally important, not emphasize – when sieving out what others can learn from their country's experience. Mahbubani is a big fan of lists in his remarks, so he focused his attention on ten reasons why Singapore had succeeded.

First, Mahbubani acknowledges, Singapore got lucky. By accident of fate, Singapore was blessed with good founding fathers like Lee Kuan Yew, S. Rajaratnam and Goh Keng Swee to guide the country just as it was starting out. Second, the city-state cultivated a culture of meritocracy. Singapore ensured that officers were recruited and promoted by merit and were adequately paid. Mahbubani quotes Lee himself as saying, "A strong political leadership needs a neutral, efficient, honest civil service." Third, the country's leaders used pragmatism as their guiding philosophy. Mahbubani notes that Goh Keng Swee had studied the Meiji Restoration very carefully, and that Japanese leaders had spent significant time trying to study, copy and adapt best practices into Japan from around the world. Singapore aimed to adopt a similar approach. Fourth, Singapore maximized its maneuverability in its foreign policy. Realizing that small states cannot afford to make enemies, it managed its relationships adroitly in order to preserve peace and prosperity. Mahbubani quotes S. Rajaratnam as saying in 1965 in a UN speech that: “We want to live in peace with all our neighbors simply because we have a great deal to lose by being at war with them. All we therefore ask is to be left alone to reshape and build our country the way our people want it.” Fifth, Singapore’s leaders focused on starting with small wins. Initially, Mahbubani says, achieving development might not mean sweeping reform, but smaller steps that have a huge impact on the everyday lives of the people such as getting a standing pipe in the village to provide water.

Sixth, Singapore relied not on foreign aid, but on trade and investment to achieve its development goals. Mahbubani argued that a large chunk of Western aid often goes back to the donor country in the form of administrative expenses, consultancy fees and contracts, such that there is actually very little actual transfer of aid to developing countries. He emphasized the success of the Economic Development Board of Singapore in helping bring in foreign direct investment. Seventh, Singapore had an inclusive policy on ethnic groups. To accommodate the ethnic groups in the country – which include Chinese, Malays and Indians – the country has four official languages: English, Mandarin, Malay and Tamil. There is also a balance struck in school between having English as a common language of instruction to enable communication and allowing groups to learn their own ‘mother tongue.’ Eighth, Singapore’s leaders believed in thinking long-term. Here, Mahbubani uses the example of Singapore’s need to secure its water supply. Even though the city-state had signed a 100-year water agreement with Malaysia in 1961, its leaders acknowledged the inherent vulnerability of relying on its neighbor for such a critical resource. Therefore, they invested in ways to get their own sources of water, including through reservoirs, desalination plants and water reclamation facilities. Ninth, Singapore avoided populist measures. For instance, Mahbubani notes the aversion of the country’s leaders to the welfare state, believing that ‘handouts’ undermined self-reliance and fostered a dependence on the state. Nonetheless, he says, the city-state has invested in the welfare of its people in other ways, including through high-quality education and healthcare, affordable public housing and public transportation, and a compulsory saving fund for workers. Tenth, Singapore’s leaders were honest and not corrupt. Mahbubani acknowledges that this might be the most challenging thing to achieve in his list. Honesty in a country makes people feel confident in their leaders and gives investors the peace of mind they need to do business. After going through his list, Mahbubani did acknowledge at the end of his lecture that some of these lessons might be difficult to replicate, that any principles need to be adapted to the local context including in East Timor. You can read the full text of his lecture, delivered at the Dili Convention Center, here.

Prime Minister Lee was one of the most effective politicians of his era and a prominent global ideologist. He formulated the principle of the "Asian century," that came to replace the "century of the West." . With an average per capita GDP of just $427.9 in 1960, Singapore surged more than a hundred times to over $55,000 in 2013, making the country one of the richest. Singapore has overtaken Hong Kong and Japan, as well as established European economies such as the UK. Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew's policy was aimed at encouraging savings and investment, keeping inflation and taxes low and currencies stable, and emphasizing high-quality education. Lee pushed the island to develop key infrastructure, he focused on housing and jobs.

"I am often accused of interfering in the private lives of citizens. Yes, if I did not, had I not done that, we wouldn't be here today," he said in 1987. Lee Kuan Yew came to power in 1959 and led Singapore to independence from Malaysia in 1965. A tiny land with no natural resources turned into a global economic powerhouse under his guidance. "I was trying to create, in a third world situation, a first world oasis," Lee said in an interview in 2008. The economy of modern Singapore is known as one of the freest, most innovative and business-friendly, according to the Asian Century Institute. It was ranked the second freest economy in the 2011 Index of Economic Freedom behind Hong Kong. The Global Competitiveness Index 2012-2013 ranks Singapore as the most competitive country in world. Prime Minister Lee underlined the role of government rather than the free hand of the market. Singapore today attracts a large amount of foreign investment as a result of its corruption-free environment, low tax rates and advanced infrastructure. Foreign direct investment in the country amounted to $534 billion in 2011; according to the 2014 Investment Climate report from Singapore's government. Singapore has a 7 percent corporate tax and 0-20 percent personal tax rate. More than 7,000 multinational corporations from the United States, Japan, and Europe are located in the country. However, Lee was criticized for his iron-fisted rule, which forced several opposition politicians into bankruptcy or exile. "Between being loved and being feared, I have always believed Machiavelli was right. If nobody is afraid of me, I'm meaningless." Lee Kuan Yew stepped down as Prime Minister in 1990; nevertheless he remained "minister mentor" till 2011 when his eldest son Lee Hsien Loong was elected for a second term as prime minister. "I have spent my life, so much of it, building up this country. There's nothing more that I need to do. At the end of the day, what have I got? A successful Singapore. What have I given up? My life."

I personally appreciate freedom as the most important factor in public life, so I cannot figure that in any circumstance I could live in a state that is not fully democratic. But I have stayed in Singapore for a whole semester and my impression is that the citizens appreciate much more the fantastic achievements of Singapore under the leadership of Lee Kuan Yew than what they would have achieved in a democracy like India. And as I wrote before, Singapore has to be compared to the other Asian countries and former colonies and not to Switzerland or Denmark, taking into consideration what was their starting point as we saw in the statistics above. My humble opinion is that it is due mainly to the brilliant leadership of Lee Kuan Yew, who served his nation faithfully without corruption. One has to read Lee's autobiography to understand what were the huge hurdles that he had to overcome, as his country could have been communist, corrupt, in a civil war, invaded by Malaysia, or just remain very poor as most countries of Africa and many Asian countries. My models are of course Scandinavia as they have everything and I am in favor of a welfare state, with a different taxation and economic policy of Singapore, I think that Machiavelli was basically wrong in The Prince, that a leader has not to be feared, that he should not be succeeded by his son, and that there should be democracy. But I don't think that Singapore had at all those options and that probably they could achieve the first world status only with a leadership as Lee Kuan Yew's. The same applies to China, Vietnam, Taiwan, Korea and many other countries, each one according to their own road to success. So, I think that if an Indian living in Singapore had to choose between the alternative of living in India with its extreme poverty (and riches) or to live as a minority in Singapore, they would choose living in Singapore, despite the fact that it is not a democracy as India (what is the benefit of democracy if most of the population is living in extreme poverty?), and they are only a small minority in Singapore.

You have to stay in Singapore in order to understand the extreme cleverness of Lee Kuan Yew who gives the Indians and the Malays who are willing to comply with the regime full rights, full acknowledgement of their culture and religion, housing, work, ethics, and an exceptional quality of life, in a sustainable environment, speaking a common language English and hosting the largest Western corporations. As a westerner, you also feel quite at home in Singapore because of the official English language, the extremely clean city, the security and lack of crime that you have for all the citizens, for women, for elders and children. If you are a dissident Malayan and preach at the Mosque for Islam supremacy you may find yourself at the middle of the night across the border into Malaysia. This cannot happen in democratic France, UK, US or Israel, but then we suffer from terrorism while Singapore has no terrorism, and she is much weaker of course than all the democratic countries. Lee Kuan Yew knew perfectly his Malayan neighbors, he even was part of their country, and the Malayan did not want him, so in his extreme cleverness he got the respect and cooperation of almost all the Muslim Malaysians living in Singapore and he gave them respect and welfare as to the other communities, while not imposing a Chinese language or supremacy. A situation where a Muslim leadership expresses itself against their country where they are only a minority and in favor of their brothers in a country which is an enemy of their country and opt for terror and hate of the majority of their country could not exist in Singapore, nor a situation where rich and strong European states are afraid to send their police to Muslim quarters where some Imams preach in favor of terrorism in their own country. And there are plenty of Mosques in Singapore but in none of them the Imams preach against the regime, and they do it willingly because they are better off than in Malaysia.

ALMA MAHLER – A BIOGRAPHY BY FRANCOISE GIROUD

I was fascinated by the biography of Alma Mahler as well as the play by Joshua Sobol. She was a remarkable woman in a century where women lived in the shadow of their men and husbands. She succeeded in her life time to be at the crossroads of most of the cultural facets of civilization: music (with one of the leading composers Gustav Mahler), architecture (with one of the leading architects Walter Gropius), literature (with one of the leading authors Franz Werfel), painting (with one of the leading painters Oscar Kokoshka), and even religion. She lived in two continents in a very troubled period, actually she lived (1879-1964) in the best period of the cultural geniuses I like most in modern literature and drama – Zola, Ibsen, Sartre, Chekhov, Tolstoy, Brecht, Pirandello, Proust, Lorca, Strindberg, in modern painting and sculpture - Monet, Renoir, Cezanne, Rodin, Klimt, in modern music – Mahler, Verdi, Puccini, Tchaikovsky, Stravinsky, in modern architecture..., but she was hit by personal tragedies, she could not achieve happiness and peace of mind, she was a fascinating personality but also a tragic one.

Born in 1879, the daughter of a Viennese painter, Alma Mahler inspired the passionate love and devotion of an astonishing array of creative artists. She married three of them--the composer Gustav Mahler, the architect Walter Gropius, and the writer Franz Werfel--and had a host of admirers and lovers, including the painters Oscar Kokoschka, Egon Schiele, and Gustav Klimt. The composer Alban Berg dedicated his opera Wozzeck to her and a violin concerto to the memory of her daughter, Manon, who died of polio. In Alma Mahler, Francoise Giroud provides a spirited portrait of one of Europe's great femme fatales, ranging from her childhood (she was raised on a steady diet of Nietzsche) to her heyday as a leading figure in Europe's art scene, to her later life as an exile in California and New York. We meet a woman of remarkable beauty and unconventional mind, the possessor of a fine, demanding intelligence, who was highly conscious of herself as a member of the elite, a woman never truly conquered by her lovers. Her last husband, Franz Werfel, called her "one of the very few sorceresses of our time." And indeed when she appeared, her presence attracted all eyes as she moved like a queen through a room. And what eyes she drew. Virtually all the great figures of 19th-century Vienna march through these pages, including Sigmund Freud, Richard Strauss, Arnold Schonberg, Hugo van Hofmannsthal, Karl Kraus, and Elias Canetti, and Giroud pens striking portraits of each. There are also many memorable scenes: Franz Werfel singing Verdi arias with James Joyce in a Paris cafe; the young Gropius, having an affair with then-married Alma, chased from the Mahler home by guard dogs and taking refuge under a bridge; Kokoschka, after his affair with Alma has died, commissioning a life-sized doll, a faithful reproduction of his former lover. But the heart of the book is Alma's marriage to Mahler. We read Alma's own first impression of Mahler--"He is terribly nervous. He paced around the room like a wild animal. He's pure oxygen. You get burnt if you go too near." Unfortunately for Mahler, his attempt to subjugate his young wife to his will--"you have only one profession from now on: to make me happy"--led to disaster, and he himself was burnt. Alma Mahler stood at the center of the creative world, the intimate friend (if not lover) of the major artists of her age, and Giroud paints an unforgettable portrait. It was awarded France's Grand Prix litteraire de la femme in 1988. Francoise Giroud has written numerous books, including biographies of Marie Curie and Christian Dior. Director of the French magazine Elle from 1945 to 1952 and co-founder of L'Express, she was Minister of Culture under Giscard D'Estaing from 1974 to 1977. The main drawback of this biography is that it is very short, less than 200 pages, and I like biographies of 500-1,000 pages if not more. I would expect that Alma's exceptional adventure with some of the most cultural personalities of the century would be developed fully and not like in Giroud's rudimentary biography.

From Kirkus Reviews

Although in this unsatisfying biography she describes Alma Mahler as a "goddess who made a god of each of her lovers," Giroud (ed. in chief, L'Express; I Give You My Word, 1974) also depicts the composer's wife as an arrogant, narcissistic woman who played whatever role she was cast in by creative, demanding men who in turn adored her for conforming to their expectations. Mahler was born into the artistic circles of Vienna in 1879. According to Giroud, Gustav, her first husband and 20 years her senior, enslaved her to his domestic needs, denigrated her taste for Nietzsche, Wagner, and Plato, and read Kant to her while she was in labor with the second of their two daughters, who died at age four. Sexually deprived, Alma began an affair with architect Walter Gropius; her husband consulted Freud. After Gustav's death and several other affairs, Mahler married Gropius, with whom, Giroud says, she "had nothing in common" except an exquisite daughter who died at age 17. The couple divorced. Although the work of Mahler's creative mates "bored" her, as Giroud puts it, Mahler liked the painting of Oskar Kokoschka, with whom she had an affair before, at age 50, marrying Franz Werfel, the author of The Song of Bernadette. There were other lovers, even at age 55, in what Werfel called his wife's "last fling," with a 38-year-old priest. As Werfel's fame declined, Mahler resumed her role as the great composer's widow, or sometimes as the "widow of the four arts." She died in 1964, at age 85. A grudging tribute without insight, compassion, or even evidence of the "power" that inspired the love that Mahler supposedly cultivated as an art. Mahler's determination, which allowed her to survive the loss of children and husbands, and her life in prewar Vienna certainly deserve at least as much attention as the amount of benedictine she drank.

Alma Maria Mahler Gropius Werfel (born Alma Maria Schindler; 31 August 1879 – 11 December 1964) was a Viennese-born socialite and composer. She became the wife, successively, of composer Gustav Mahler, architect Walter Gropius, and novelist Franz Werfel, as well as the consort of several other prominent men. Musically active from her teens, she was the composer of at least seventeen songs for voice and piano. In later years her salon became part of the artistic scene, first in Vienna, then in Los Angeles. Alma Schindler was born in Vienna, Austria (then Austria-Hungary), to the landscape painter Emil Jakob Schindler and his wife Anna Bergen (1857–1938), in 1879. Although later in life Mahler characterized her upbringing as privileged, the family is said to have been only moderately successful. After her father's death (1892), her mother married her late husband's former pupil, Carl Moll, who was a co-founder of the Vienna Secession. Alma's social interactions in her youth included friendships with the artists of the Vienna Secession, among them Gustav Klimt. As a young woman she had a series of flirtations, including Klimt, theater director Max Burckhard, composer Alexander von Zemlinsky.

On 9 March 1902 she married Gustav Mahler, who was nineteen years her senior and the director of the Vienna Court Opera. With him she had two daughters, Maria Anna (1902–1907), who died of scarlet fever or diphtheria, and Anna (1904–1988), who became a sculptor. The terms of Alma's marriage with Gustav were that she would abandon her own interest in composing. Artistically stifled herself, she embraced her role as a loving wife and supporter of Gustav's music, together regularly attending the salon of Adele Bloch-Bauer (Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer I). Later in their marriage, after becoming severely depressed in the wake of Maria's death, she began an affair with the young architect Walter Gropius (later head of the Bauhaus), whom she met during a rest at a spa. On seeking advice from Sigmund Freud, who cited Mahler's curtailing of Alma's musical career as a major marital obstacle, and following the emotional crisis in their marriage after Gustav's discovery of the affair, Gustav began to take a serious interest in Alma's musical compositions, regretting his earlier dismissive attitude and taking promotional actions, including editing and re-orchestrating some^{[which?]} of her works. Upon his urging, and under his guidance, she prepared five of her songs for publication (they were issued in 1910, by Gustav's own publisher, Universal Edition). After this turbulent period in their marriage, Alma and Gustav traveled to New York, where Gustav was seasonally engaged as a conductor. In 2/1911, he fell severely ill with an infection related to a heart defect that had been diagnosed several years earlier. He died in May, shortly after their return to Vienna.

After Mahler's death, she did not immediately resume contact with Gropius. Between 1912 and 1914 she had a tumultuous affair with the artist Oskar Kokoschka, who created works inspired by his relationship with her, including his painting The Bride of the Wind. Kokoschka's possessiveness wore on Alma, and the emotional vicissitudes of the relationship tired them both. With the coming of World War I, Kokoschka enlisted in the Austro-Hungarian Army, and she subsequently distanced herself from him and resumed contact with Gropius, who was also serving in combat at that time. She and Gropius married in 1915 during one of his military leaves. They had a daughter together, Manon Gropius (1916–1935), who grew up being friends with Maria Altmann. Manon died of polio at the age of 18. (Composer Alban Berg wrote his Violin Concerto in memory of her.) She became pregnant and gave birth to a son, Martin Carl Johannes Gropius (1918–1919). Gropius at first believed that the child was his, but Alma's ongoing affair with Werfel was common knowledge in Vienna by this time, and she was soon exposed. Within a year, they agreed to a divorce. In the meantime, Martin, who had been born prematurely, developed hydrocephalus and died at the age of ten months. Her divorce from Gropius became final in 1920. While Gropius's military duties were still keeping him absent, she met and began an affair with Prague-born poet and writer Franz Werfel in the fall of 1917. She and Werfel began openly living together from that point on. She postponed marrying Werfel until 1929, after which she took the name "Alma Mahler-Werfel".

In 1938, following the Anschluss, Alma and Werfel, who was Jewish, were forced to flee Austria for France; they maintained a household in Sanary-sur-Mer, on the French Riviera, from summer 1938 until spring 1940. With the German invasion and occupation of France during World War II, and the deportation of Jews and political adversaries to Nazi concentration camps, the couple were no longer safe in France and frantically sought to secure their emigration to the United States. In Marseille, they were contacted by Varian Fry, an American journalist and emissary of the Emergency Rescue Committee, a private American relief organization that came to the aid of refugee intellectuals and artists at that time. Since exit visas could not be obtained, Fry arranged for the Werfels to journey on foot across the Pyrenees into Spain, in order to evade the Vichy French border officials. From Spain, Alma and Franz traveled on to Portugal and then boarded a ship for New York City. Eventually they settled in Los Angeles, where Werfel, who had already enjoyed moderate renown in the U.S. as an author, achieved popular success with his novel The Song of Bernadette, which was made into a film in 1943, and the science fiction novel, Star of the Unborn, published after his death. Werfel, who had experienced serious heart problems throughout their exile, died of a heart attack in California in 1945. In 1946 Mahler-Werfel became a U.S. citizen. Several years later she moved to New York City, where she remained a cultural figure. Leonard Bernstein, who was a champion of Gustav Mahler's music, stated in his Charles Eliot Norton lectures of 1973 that Alma had attended some of his rehearsals. Bernstein considered her to be a "living" link to both Mahler and Alban Berg. He had not had the chance to meet either man, since he was of a later generation. Alma Mahler Werfel died 11 December 1964 in New York City. She is buried in the Grinzing section of Vienna, in the same cemetery as her daughter Manon Gropius and her first husband Gustav Mahler.

KARL MARX – A BIOGRAPHY BY DAVID MCLELLAN

It is difficult to read and understand Karl Marx's works and even Karl Marx's biography. Yet, I read it with great attention as I wanted to understand the man and his ideas. As a philosopher and economist he was the most influential personality in modern history. For better and for worse he influenced all Europe, Asia and America, half of Europe became communists in the 20th century – USSR and Eastern Europe, and half of Asia as well – China, Afghanistan, Mongolia, South Yemen, Indochina and Asian USSR. Many African countries had communist or neo-communist regimes – Angola, Benin, Congo-Brazzaville, Ethiopia, Mozambique, Somalia, but in the 21st century only one country remained communist – Cuba, while China, Laos and Vietnam have regimes that can be labeled as neo-communists. North Korea is no more officially communist. Yet, the fear of communism was instrumental in the establishment of the welfare state in Europe and the US, as in many Western countries the communist party was quite important – France, Italy, Spain, Greece, Germany. When the USSR crumbled the neoliberal regimes were no more afraid of communism and increased substantially inequality in the US and in Western Europe. All this turmoil came about because of one man, one giant, who devised a theory which seemed very appealing, especially to the masses who were extremely poor and even starving – as Marx said 'You have nothing to lose but your chains', 'Proletarians of the world – Unite!'. We can quote Marx in hundreds of quotes as he found ways to influence the masses with his works and slogans. I would add only one more of my own: "If Marx did not exist we would still be working in sweatshops in unhealthy conditions, paid minimum salaries by greedy capitalists who would pay us as little as necessary not to die from hunger. Proletariat and even 99% of the population would be exploited by the 1% who rules us and oppresses us. But, are we living in 1850 or in 2015? Is it not what Occupy Wall Street and all the protest organizations say, we are still in the same situation but at a higher level of welfare, which is due to Karl Marx and to the fear from his communism, but now that fear does not exist the ruthless neoliberal capitalists want to reconquer what they have lost in the last century, return us to the state of slavery, ruled by a chosen fews and we have the right to chose between those who oppress us and those who enslave us!"

I am bringing here famous quotes from Karl Marx's works, some of them are still relevant today: Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, and the soul of soulless conditions. It is the opium of the people.

Social progress can be measured by the social position of the female sex.

History repeats itself, first as tragedy, second as farce.

Workers of the world unite; you have nothing to lose but your chains.

From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs.

Democracy is the road to socialism.

A specter is haunting Europe - the specter of communism.

Landlords, like all other men, love to reap where they never sowed.

If anything is certain, it is that I myself am not a Marxist.

The first requisite for the happiness of the people is the abolition of religion.

The writer must earn money in order to be able to live and to write, but he must by no means live and write for the purpose of making money.

Experience praises the most happy the one who made the most people happy.

Jonathan Wolff, an eminent professor and Marx's expert, maintains that communism is relevant even today: " In recent years we could be forgiven for assuming that Marx has nothing left to say to us. Marxist regimes have failed miserably, and with them, it seemed, all reason to take Marx seriously. The fall of the Berlin Wall had enormous symbolic resonance: it was often taken to be the fall of Marxism as such, as well as of Marxist politics and economics. But in celebrating the end of the 'evil empire' we forgot that the thinkers who inspired Eastern European communism were not evil people. On the contrary, they saw themselves as our saviours. At huge personal cost they sought to liberate humanity from what they believed to be an inhumane economic and social system: capitalism. They were fired both by a vision of how society ought to be and an account of what was wrong with existing, bourgeois, society. The positive vision turned into a nightmare (although, as we shall see, whether communist regimes were an authentic interpretation of Marx's ideas is another question). But the failure of communism does not mean that all is well with Western, liberal, democratic capitalism. And it is Marx, above all, who still provides us with the sharpest tools with which to criticize existing society. We can think of Marx as the great-grandfather of today's anti-capitalist movement. Of course, much has changed. For example, Marx seems to have assumed that natural resources were inexhaustible, and thus he has a much more limited ecological perspective than one would expect today. But on the other hand Marx portrays a world in which the capitalist market comes to permeate society, putting a price on everything and crowding out non-economic forms of value. Businesses grow ever-larger, becoming more ruthless and exploitative—more vampire-like—in the process. Under capitalism progress comes at a high price. Marx's criticisms of late nineteenth-century society have enormous relevance even in the early twenty-first century. We may have no confidence in his solutions, but this does not mean that the problems he identifies are not acute."

Karl Marx: His Life and Thought is a 1973 biography of Karl Marx by political scientist David McLellan. The work was republished as Karl Marx: A Biography in 1995. McLellan deals with Marx's intellectual, political and private life. The 1995 edition includes a critical bibliography that briefly evaluates numerous works dealing with Marx and Marxism, among them Isaiah Berlin's Karl Marx: His Life and Environment (1939), Herbert Marcuse's Reason and Revolution (1941), and Leszek Kołakowski's Main Currents of Marxism (1976). The book has been described as, "The most comprehensive scholarly account of Marx's life and works" by professor of political theory Terrell Carver. Historian of science Roger Smith calls it "readable and reliable". Karl Marx (5 May 1818 – 14 March 1883) was a German philosopher, economist, communist, sociologist, journalist and revolutionary socialist. Born in Prussia (now Rhineland-Palatinate), he later became stateless and spent much of his life in London. Marx's work in economics laid the basis for much of the current understanding of labour and its relation to capital, and subsequent economic thought. He published numerous books during his lifetime, the most notable being The Communist Manifesto (1848) and Das Kapital (1867–1894). Born into a wealthy middle-class family in Trier in the Prussian Rhineland, Marx studied at the universities of Bonn and Berlin where he became interested in the philosophical ideas of the Young Hegelians. After his studies he wrote for the Rheinische Zeitung, a radical newspaper in Cologne, and began to work out the theory of the materialist conception of history. He moved to Paris in 1843, where he began writing for other radical newspapers and met Friedrich Engels, who would become his lifelong friend and collaborator. In 1849 he was exiled and moved to London together with his wife and children, where he continued writing and formulating his theories about social and economic activity. He also campaigned for socialism and became a significant figure in the International Workingmen's Association.

Marx's theories about society, economics and politics—the collective understanding of which is known as Marxism—hold that human societies progress through class struggle: a conflict between an ownership class that controls production and a dispossessed labouring class that provides the labour for production. States, Marx believed, were run on behalf of the ruling class and in their interest while representing it as the common interest of all; and he predicted that, like previous socioeconomic systems, capitalism produced internal tensions which would lead to its self-destruction and replacement by a new system: socialism. He argued that class antagonisms under capitalism between the bourgeoisie and proletariat would eventuate in the working class' conquest of political power and eventually establish a classless society, communism, a society governed by a free association of producers. Marx actively fought for its implementation, arguing that the working class should carry out organised revolutionary action to topple capitalism and bring about socio-economic change. Both lauded and criticised, Marx has been described as one of the most influential figures in human history. Many intellectuals, labour unions and political parties worldwide have been influenced by Marx's ideas, with many variations on his groundwork. Marx is typically cited, with Émile Durkheim and Max Weber, as one of the three principal architects of modern social science.

Karl Marx's contribution to modern social thought is so immense it is now difficult to understand the profound degree to which much of what he thought and wrote has been almost totally discredited and discounted. This is not to deny the fact that his social theory is indeed quite essentially flawed, but rather to suggest that given the relative proportions of his contribution to sociology, economics, and cultural critique, one tends to throw out the baby with the bath water in summarily rejecting all that this intellectual genius had to offer regarding the nature of modern capitalistic society. No book does a better job of presenting the broad sweep of Marx's remarkable critical contributions than this wonderful and quite comprehensive biography of Marx by renowned psychologist and academic David McLellan. With painstaking care and meticulous attention to detail, McLellan places Marx's life in context, showing how the multitude of social, cultural, and economic issues that formed him and scarred him early in life carried with them a most urgent message regarding the nature of modern society. Growing up a secular Jew in Germany, the phenomenally gifted young academic found himself barred from teaching based both on virulent anti-Semitism within the academic community and the fact that he was indeed correctly perceived as a radical thinker and political dissident from the beginning in the truculent and suffocating political environment within the society itself. Yet there was no denying either his intellectual brilliance or his charismatic abilities to fan the flames of political discontent almost everywhere he went over his sixty some years. The son of a comfortable Jewish professional who had adopted the Protestant faith for secular convenience, Marx found himself set adrift within currents that his own proclivities toward radical social, economic, and political analysis forced him to often flee one step ahead of arresting authorities. Marx finally settled into London, surviving through a combination of writing short newspaper articles and through the largesse and generosity of his long-time confidant and erstwhile ally in arms, Friedrich Engels, the scion of a quite prosperous industrial family who incessantly came to the aid of Marx and his perpetually destitute family. McLellan helps us to see how all the elements of the times and the sweep of historical circumstances sped Marx along toward political involvement in one of the most important social developments of the twentieth century. My own personal opinion is that a careful reading of Marx leads one to the conclusion that his observations are still strikingly accurate in terms of his prognostications regarding the destiny of capitalism and I remind the prospective reader that the jury is yet out, time still marches on, and that what is going on now around us can be quite persuasively interpreted in elegant Marxian terms. Enjoy!

ARTHUR MILLER – TIMEBENDS – AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

I am amazed sometimes at how I perceive the authors whom I like most, and especially the playwrights, but even the main protagonists in their plays as family members – mainly brothers or fathers. I feel part of Joe Keller's family in All My Sons, and share their dilemmas as if I was experiencing their ordeals with them. I have written extensively about Miller and his plays in my books, especially All My Sons, The Crucible and Death of a Salesman. It is difficult to identify with the protagonists of Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, or Falstaff/The Merry Wives of Windsor (but much more with Julius Caesar and King Lear), or with the protagonists of Henrik Ibsen (except An Enemy of the People) and Chekhov's plays. But Arthur Miller is family, not only All My Sons (on stage and in films), I can identify fully with John Proctor in The Crucible (especially in the films with Yves Montand and Daniel Day-Lewis), and it goes without saying with Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman. I had the privilege of seeing the final performance of Death of a Salesman on Broadway with Dustin Hoffman, I was sitting as usual in the first row, and for a couple of hours I was Loman, due to the tremendous synergy between two giants – Arthur Miller the playwright and Dustin Hoffman the actor. I was moved to tears, I saw my life crumbling, I experienced the ingratitude of Loman's young boss Howard (I just don't have a single solitary spot, 'Cause you gotta admit business is business), was shocked by the selfishness of his sons Biff and Happy blaming him for their incompetence, when Loman was buried within spitting distance I identified myself with Linda his wife: "Willy, dear, I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. We're free and clear. Sobbing more fully, released: We're free. We're free... We're free..." Linda does not understand him, nor his children, nor his boss, but I understand him, and so do all the spectators, who rose and gave the actors a standing ovation of ten minutes.

Arthur Miller is family (besides the fact that both of us wrote our biography at the age of 72), he speaks our language, he speaks to our hearts, he relates our modern dilemmas, his protagonists are not kings or famous, they are you and me, they are not heroes, they are weak, they are human. Loman is my father who was ruthlessly fired when he was aged and weak, while still at the hospital after two cataract operations. Joe Keller is the crooks who wrong all their friends, neighbors, family, and partners, the country and the customers, and have a public image of society benefactors, so hypocrites that they even convince themselves of their impeccable conduct, during World War II, in 1947 when the play was published, in 1974, 1984, 1994, or 2015, in the US, Israel, France. I know them so well that when I read or watched many times the play on stage on Broadway, in Israel, and in films, I could imagine that they were the same despicable persons whom I know. But unlike Miller, in real life none of those crooks commits suicide, some of their victims even die unexpectedly, they don't have any scruples, not for their sons, nor for their family, as society is not for them All My Sons but All My Suckers. Finally, I am Giles Corey (another Cory who is an historic figure). Corey or Cory (his name is quite often spelled Corey, but the baptismal record is Cory), after being arrested for witchcraft, refused to enter a plea of guilty or not guilty. He was subjected to pressing in an effort to force him to plead — the only example of such a sanction in American history — but instead died after two days of torture. In Arthur Miller's words: "Proctor: Then how does he die? Elizabeth: They press him, John. Proctor: Press? Elizabeth: Great stones they lay upon his chest until he plead aye or nay. They say he give them but two words. "More weight," he says. And died. Proctor "More weight." Elizabeth: Aye. It were a fearsome man, Giles Corey." Oh, how I was pressed to collaborate with the crooks, some of them were before that my best friends before becoming Rhinoceroses, the torture was not physical but more psychological, although they threatened my life (on record), or resorted to frequent flat tyres and fixing the breaks of my car in order to convince me in Mafia ways that they were serious and I should not oppose them. But I maintained my ethical beliefs, denouncing them, e pur si muove, more weight, I did not break!

The definitive memoir of Arthur Miller—the famous playwright of The Crucible, All My Sons, Death of a Salesman, A View from the Bridge, and other plays—Timebends reveals Miller's incredible trajectory as a man and a writer. Born in 1915, Miller grew up in Harlem in the 1920s and 1930s, developed leftist political convictions during the Great Depression, achieved moral victory against McCarthyism in the 1950s, and became president of PEN International near the end of his life, fighting for writers' freedom of expression. Along the way, his prolific output established him as one of the greatest writers of the twentieth century—he wrote twenty-two plays, various screenplays, short stories, and essays, and won the Pulitzer Prize in 1949 for Death of a Salesman and the New York Drama Critics Circle Award in 1947 for All My Sons. Miller also wrote the screenplay for The Misfits, Marilyn Monroe's final film. This memoir also reveals the incredible host of notables that populated his life, including Marilyn Monroe, Elia Kazan, Clark Gable, Sir Laurence Olivier, John F. Kennedy, and Mikhail Gorbachev. Leaving behind a formidable reputation in the worlds of theater, cinema, and politics, Arthur Miller died in 2005 but his memoir continues his legacy.

In an interview conducted before he wrote this book, Miller said, "I think memoirs, autobiography...can help to translate chaos into something that is a useable past. Give an image where there was only a blur." He suggests the kind of autobiography he would be interested in writing would be more about the time he was living rather than his life, so a reader would "come away from it somehow a little heavier than he went into it." In all of this, TIMEBENDS succeeds wonderfully. I learned a great deal more about the textures, realities and significance of the 1930s, 40s and 50s through his observations and images than through any linear professional histories. A bonus for those who enjoy seeing and reading Miller's plays is his deliberate selection of significant events and people in his life that show up in the plays in one way or another. And he does have great stories and observations about famous people--Olivier, Clark Gable, etc.-- that are the more conventional pleasures of show biz autobios. Even if he wasn't among the most important American dramatists of our time--perhaps the most important--this book would be a significant literary accomplishment. Miller is a careful writer, so readers perhaps unused to tact and understatement in memoirs are advised to look beyond their expectations to what he actually says. Yet his chapters on Marilyn Monroe were vivid and gave me more of an impression of her as a person than anything else I've read. Miller's voice brings all of this varied material together, and so the reader might approach this book as if listening to a great storyteller. This is a book full of heart, humor, wisdom and perspectives not found elsewhere. It is a treasure and a gift.

This autobiography, written by Miller at age 72, strikes the reader immediately with his wonderful writing style. He does not march year by year through his life but bobs and weaves subtly bending time with his abundant dramatic talent. It is a pleasure to read. But so much in his life! It does go on and on. It is a book for leisure, not speed, reading. He brings to live the Depression Age, insight into our real life in World War II, the ugliness of the House un-American Activities Committee and McCarthyism (he was convicted of contempt for Congress for refusal to name names though the conviction was later overturned upon appeal), and of course he writes on his successes of his plays All My Sons, Death of a Salesman, the Crucible and of many others as well as his failures. All this with Marilyn Monroe yet to come! He seems continually embroiled in injustice and wrenching emotional turmoil. With his third wife, in his 40s, he gets his emotional life together but still pursues freedom for writers as a president of PEN. Miller, now 85, still writes and has recently published 60 years of collected essays entitled Echoes Down the Corridor. Some of the material covers the events covered in TimeBends, but TimeBends is much more interesting.

He Who Is Most Alone

By ROGER SHATTUCK/THE NEW YORK TIMES/NOVEMBER 8, 1987

Arthur Miller has done it all wrong. He grew up white and Jewish in Harlem and went to college in Michigan. He worked in a shipyard and wrote a full script with Ernie Pyle to redeem his 4-F status in World War II. "Death of a Salesman" dumped fame on him at the age of 34. He has never turned his back or his wrath on the Marxists and Communists he knew as a young man. He divorced his wife of 15 years to dedicate himself to an American Helen of Troy created by the casting studio. After a few months of marriage to Marilyn Monroe he could no longer work with her or save her from herself. No one told him that in the introduction of his "Collected Plays" a dramatist must not declare flat-footedly that "life has meaning." Mr. Miller doesn't seem to understand that in our day an artist has to cultivate some extravagance or addiction or mania in order to make his mark. He isn't even homosexual. What is he trying to be? A Jewish Don Quixote? For all his pains and sins, Mr. Miller was the only American famous enough and courageous enough in 1966 to inject new vitality into PEN International. He presided with dignity over its congress of writers in Bled, Yugoslavia, and refused to change the rules to allow the Russians to join. Unpersuaded by the Beats, whose antics had become a commercial commodity in the United States, and resistant to the Absurd, which had devoured Europe, Mr. Miller, with his Gary Cooper physique and attentive manner, created at Bled a sense of evenhanded integrity that reaffirmed PEN as the champion of writers' freedom everywhere. After all, he stood firm against any form of fanaticism from any quarter. Having been honored, investigated and condemned in his own country without losing his faith in it, he had unbeatable credentials and learned when to use them.

Anyone who knows Mr. Miller's work has seen this "life" coming for some time. Plays as different as "A Memory of Two Mondays" and "After the Fall" incorporate extensive autobiographical materials. Many of his essays on the theater deal with the circumstances of his professional and personal life. In spite of certain weaknesses, "Timebends" embraces and surpasses all these sources in a work of genuine literary craftsmanship and social exploration. I find Mr. Miller's lengthy autobiography neither self-serving nor self-indulgent in a way Lillian Hellman and Tennessee Williams saw fit to record their lives. Most of this self-portrait makes absorbing and entertaining reading. Mr. Miller's comfortable childhood in the era of rotogravure and radio was transformed by his father's ruin in the Depression and the family's forced move from their Upper West Side apartment at the edge of Harlem to Brooklyn. In passages reminiscent of Alfred Kazin's lyric memoir, "A Walker in the City," Mr. Miller describes round-robin handball games against the wall of Dozick's drugstore in the '30's. It was then that he heard murmurings of the new religion that condemned religion -- Marxism -- and underwent an important rite of passage while competing with other boys to sing the latest hit songs. "After I had turned fifteen these competitions seemed childish, but I continued as one of the star comics of the gang, improvised inanities, doing imitations of the Three Stooges ... We always had a sandlot football team going, and one of our halfbacks, a giant with a heavy lower lip named Izzy Lenowitz... would clap me on my thin back and implore me, "Oh, come on, Artie, enjoy us." And with sufficient encouragement I would ad-lib a monologue that with a little luck might stay airborne for five minutes or more. Without plan or awareness of what I was doing, I began the process of separating myself; I was moving out of the audience to face them alone."

The detail and the diction convince me that the scene is authentic, even if telescopic. A form of self-imposed performance drew the youngster gradually out of his environment toward higher education, social causes and the theater. That amalgam of interests carried him a long way. Yet the funny, moving, exasperating sense of the family unit in racially mixed Brooklyn never disappears from the later sections of the book. Three hundred pages and twenty-five years later, Mr. Miller was subpoenaed to testify before the House Un-American Activities Committee. He traveled to Washington in June 1956 while the press was hounding him because of his impending marriage to Marilyn Monroe and shortly before he needed his passport renewed for a trip to England, where both of them had professional engagements. Spyros Skouras, who held Monroe's contract at 20th Century-Fox had flown from Hollywood to New York to try to persuade Mr. Miller to cooperate with the committee, name names and condemn the left. Mr. Miller's lawyer informed him that Francis Walter, the chairman of the committee, would call off the whole charade if Monroe would consent to a photograph of herself shaking hands with Mr. Walter. What did it all mean? I find the muted yet intense account of the hearings oddly incomplete. Mr. Miller quotes his reply to the question, should a Communist poet have the right to advocate overthrowing the Government in his poetry: "A man should have the right to write a poem about anything." And he goes on to explain his unequivocal opposition today to Marxism as passive before history and dismissive of human rights. He passes over his candid statement to the committee that aspects of Marxist thought "suited (his) mood" in the 40's, but that he was "never under Communist discipline."

What does not come out here or in Mr. Miller's 1953 play about the Salem witch trials, "The Crucible," is that behind McCarthyism and the unscrupulous and publicity-seeking HUAC investigations lay not giggling girls and a widespread belief in witches but a genuine international conspiracy that threatened Europe at the time, even if it did not threaten the United States. Mr. Miller has never been moved to write a play comparable to the novels "Nineteen Eighty-Four" or "Darkness of Noon," or to explore dramatically how he could have been drawn to a doctrine and a practice he later rejected. At the hearings Mr. Miller behaved honorably, never took the Fifth Amendment and made his legal and intellectual points with eloquence. The House went on to vote 373 to 4 to cite him for contempt of Congress. In "Timebends" Mr. Miller could have probed deeper into this complex confrontation. On the page following his account of the hearings Mr. Miller describes how he and Marilyn Monroe were received in England by Laurence Olivier and an immense crowd of reporters. Of the reporters he says, "When she smiled they did, and frowned when she frowned, and if she so much as giggled they roared with delighted laughter, and listened in churchly silence when she took a moment and actually spoke! with her voice so soft and soothing that grown men went limp as lichens at the living sound of it."

What secret, what dream brought together the radical intellectual and Hollywood's sex goddess? In an earlier scene that tests our credulity and Mr. Miller's writing, he describes fainting in a Nevada telephone booth when he realizes that Monroe is on the verge of suicide during the filming of "Bus Stop." He revives, talks her back down to sanity and goes on in his commentary to reveal the fantasy he had spun of their life together: "To be one thing, sexuality and mind, appetite and justice...My vision had been of each of us doing our own work side by side, drawing strength from one another." One of the books' few rancorous moments comes near the end when Mr. Miller tells us that Monroe was proof that sexuality and seriousness cannot coexist in the American psyche. The shattering of his vision of a higher coupling represents another rite of passage. Everything here suggests that his third wife, photographer Inge Morath, with whom he has collaborated on four books, saved him from bitterness and kept him working. The passages I have mentioned evoke most of the major themes in "Timebends" -- family, theater, politics, women. But there is more. Mr. Miller as a child was taken by his great-grandfather to the 114th Street synagogue and observed "about fifteen old men, bent over and covered completely by their prayer shawls, all of them in white socks, dancing!" Later Dostoyevsky and Melville invaded his mind at about the same time as Marxism. A 1958 essay entitled "Shadows of the Gods" describes the deep shock of the Depression on Mr. Miller's whole attitude toward life when he realized that no one, not even a businessman was in charge. "What the time gave me...was a sense of an invisible world." The motif of the spiritual, without the benefit of formal religion but never isolated from moral and social dilemmas, runs strongly through Mr. Miller's work, including "Timebends." He quotes several times Ibsen's line from "An Enemy of the People" -- "He is strongest who is most alone" -- as if it should be the key to salvation. Later, the hero's final cry in Pound's translation of Sophocles' "Ajax" -- "It all coheres!" -- wins out. By the last paragraph of the book Mr. Miller has decided to devote himself to "making myself possible." I read his last sentence as close to prayer. "The truth, the first truth, probably, is that we are all connected, watching one another. Even the trees."

Ten pages into his recollections of early childhood, Mr. Miller jumps ahead 45 years to relate how the family dining-room table was used as a prop in his play "The Price." "Timebends" does not advance in a steady narrative line. Its eight untitled sections dig up bucketfuls of past incidents ordered almost as much by association as chronology. When Mr. Miller speaks here of wanting to write a play that will achieve the simultaneity of lines in music, that will "cut through time like a knife through a layer cake or a road through a mountain revealing its geological layers...instead of one incident in one time-frame after another," he is also describing this autobiographical book full of shuttlings and diagonals. Its somewhat lame title refers to this laminated free-form construction as well as to a deep-sea diver's malady when he comes up too rapidly from the depths. The nearly paratatic structure successfully assimilates the diaries and notebooks from which Mr. Miller must have worked, and it allows him to alternate dramatized scenes, superb descriptions of people and places and commentary from the present. As "a life" "Timebends" is closer to the sweep and shift of "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" than to the careful analyses of "The Education of Henry Adams." (Mr. Miller could not possibly have got away with what Adams did; he simply omitted his 14-year marriage and his wife's suicide.) In its construction, its soliloquizing voice and its sense of time, "Timebends" resembles Andre Malraux's "Anti-memoir," but it is without Malraux's grandiloquent tone of living perpetually at the summit of history.

Many characters emerge vividly: Mr. Miller's illiterate yet baronial father, Manny Newman, a Brooklyn salesman and family man who shares many of Willy Loman's fantasies; Mitch Berenson and Vincent Longhi, union mavericks who tried to buck Joe Ryan, the longshoreman's union boss, and the Mafia on the docks; Marilyn Monroe, and the director Elia Kazan (although Mr. Miller has never forgiven Mr. Kazan for his testimony to HUAC, he remains loyal to him as a man of the theater.) The Monroe portrait is above all loyal, not altogether tidied up, composed by a man who almost wistfully resigned to fate. It is evident that Mr. Miller himself wrote the captions for the 32 pages of photographs in "Timebends." Giving no identifications, he laconically labels the center spread of pictures, showing him with Monroe and others in glowing poses "The best of times." Presumably the reader can complete the opening sentence of "A Tale of Two Cities." Mr. Miller's mother and his first wife remain shadowy figures. Ernie Pyle, Laurence Olivier, Clark Gable, Lee and Paula Strasberg, make convincing appearances in working situations that bring out Mr. Miller's shrewdness as a judge of character. Only the Strasbergs earn his contempt as self-absorbed mountebanks. The writing varies a great deal in "Timebends." The opening pages, woven loosely around a child's "view from the floor," reach an almost Proustian note; "It's simply that the view from the floor, filled though it is with misunderstandings, is also the purest. The account of the rehearsals and ultimate success of "Death of a Salesman" effectively mixes public fact and personal feelings without distortion. Mr. Miller describes smells with particular passion. The most apposite and amusing dialogue occurs in the plane carrying him back to New York after the shooting of "The Misfits" and his breakup with Monroe. Seeing a man about to recognize him, Mr. Miller lies, "I'm not him. I look like him, but I'm not." But the stranger thinks Mr. Miller is not Mr. Miller but the owner of a hardware store in Poughkeepsie. After great fame, anonymity returns.

In discussing one of our most substantial authors, I cannot refrain from pointing out a troubling drift toward inept usage in this book. "Societal," "depart" as a transitive verb, "researching"

"different than" does Arthur Miller want to be quoted in future dictionaries as licensing these forms? Referring to the 1930's he writes "If there was a national pastime I suppose it was hanging out." In the Depression we hung 'around' or went to a "hangout." There are two flaws that cut deeper than style. In analyzing presences as different as Marilyn Monroe and Robert Oppenheimer, Mr. Miller falls back repeatedly on the word "power." He fails to distinguish the fame-glamour-stardom cluster from strength-authority-position. They are not the same, even though they overlap in notions like privilege and charisma. 'Power' used alone to cover all these items belongs to a mode of fuzzy thinking Mr. Miller usually deplores. At other moments he writes stue apropos of Clark Gable for instance: "A great star implies he is his own person and can be mean and even dangerous, like a great leader." The second flaw takes the form of a double standard of divulgence and indulgence. We learn a great deal about Mr. Miller's professional dealings and public life. Yves Montant, however with whom Marilyn Monroe had an affair is never mentioned in connection with her. Mr. Miller's long marriage to Mary Slattery appears only obliquely through lenses. One can respect his discretion, but there is evidently more to say. Late in the book he issues some ramrod-straight judgments of the self-destructiveness of drugs and liberated sex in the '60's. He refers convincingly to a "moral center." But one remembers earlier pages about Lucky Luciano and organized crime, which suggest a tolerance, even a comic sympathy for them that I find disturbing and out of character.

In his plays Mr. Miller has never quite resolved or fully exploited the double attraction of his talent -- to collective drama, in which society itself is the protagonist, and to monodrama, which takes place inside one person's head. He is the closest we come to Bertolt Brecht. This "life" appearing when Mr. Miller is 72 years old and still writing, represents more than his claim to a place in 20th-century literature. "Timebends" is really a book of falls. The central pages portray "a perpetual night of confusion" that descended on Mr. Miller in the early '50's. The original fall of the Depression was followed by the crumbling of his marriage and his disenchantment with Marxism at the moment when McCarthy's know-nothingism was sweeping the country. After the triumph of "Death of a Salesman" his writing had reached an apparent standstill. His first trip to Hollywood was a failure. All these disasters seem to be ironically focused in Mr. Miller's searing encounter in Hollywood with a lonely Marilyn Monroe. He survived these falls and more. A book that passes through moments of numbing despair ends up close to rhapsodic.

ON THE SHUTTLE OF MEMORY

"I haven't gone with every vagrant wind that struck the theater," Arthur Miller said in a recent telephone conversation from West Berlin, where he and his wife were visiting. "I have written as my character dictated, not to some style, and I think that's true of anybody who takes the art with some seriousness. The consequence is that you're likely to be misinterpreted and misread as having no more to say about the current situation. Everyone past 30 has the sense of life in a world he never made." He failed in his first efforts to write an autobiography, Mr. Miller admitted, because he tried to set down a linear tale. "The chronological attempts bored me to death," he said. "I ended up doing what I did in 'Death of a Salesman' - following the twists and turns of what went on in Willy Loman's head. In 'Salesman' there would be no transitional material, nothing to prepare us for what was to come. So with the autobiography. I just followed my nose, putting down a recollection in rising and falling waves. My only goal was that people would not be bored." One of Mr. Miller's major themes is the influence on his art of moviemaking, which he describes in "Timebends" as "an exotic and fantastic affair." "None of us who write is willing to confront the power film has had on our culture," he said. "It's an immense pressure on the way we write, tell stories, even think. The methodology of movie storytelling reflects dreams. It's gotten deep into the way we write. And it's perfectly admissible."

In conversation, Mr. Miller sounded confident about the timelessness of his own work - a recurring theme of his autobiography as well. Referring to a 1980 play of his that drew on his own family life after the Wall Street crash of October 1929, he said: "You write out of the middle of your belly or it won't last very long. Look at the stock market now, just three or four years after 'The American Clock.' It makes you think, I wonder what's changed? The wheel has turned again." "Memory is a shuttle," he said, clearly moved by a visit to a city that was full of ghosts for him. "I'm moving along the lines of a paradox to a point that illuminates them. Any time you start to tell an event, you end up moving backward as well as forward. Life goes on, and I find that hopeful." --JEREMY GERARD

Arthur Asher Miller (October 17, 1915 – February 10, 2005) was a prolific American playwright, essayist, and prominent figure in twentieth-century American theatre. Among his most popular plays are All My Sons (1947), Death of a Salesman (1949), The Crucible (1953) and A View from the Bridge (1955, revised 1956). He also wrote several screenplays and was most noted for his work on The Misfits (1961). The drama Death of a Salesman is often numbered on the short list of finest American plays in the 20th century alongside Long Day's Journey into Night and A Streetcar Named Desire. Miller was often in the public eye, particularly during the late 1940s, 1950s and early 1960s. During this time, he was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for Drama; testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee; and was married to Marilyn Monroe. He received the Prince of Asturias Award and the Praemium Imperiale prize in 2002 and the Jerusalem Prize in 2003, as well as the Dorothy and Lillian Gish Lifetime Achievement Award and the Pulitzer Prize.

Miller successfully diverse dramatic styles and movements in the belief that a play should embody a delicate balance between the individual and society, between the singular personality and the polity, and between the separate and collective elements of life. He thought himself a writer of social plays with a strong emphasis on moral problems in American society and often questioned psychological causes of behavior. He also built on the realist tradition of Henrik Ibsen in his exploration of the individual's conflict with society but also borrowed Symbolist and expressionist techniques from Bertolt Brecht and others. Some critics attempt to interpret his work from either an exclusively political or an exclusively psychological standpoint but fail to pierce the social veil that Miller creates in his work. Miller often stressed that society made his characters what they are and how it dictated all of their fears and choices.

Themes

All American Family

While Miller comes under criticism for his reputation, most critics note him as a dramatist of the family. One of his greatest strengths is his penetrating insight into familial relationships.^[71] Often, Miller positions his characters are living in service of their family. The conventions of the family play, such as patterns, setting, and style of representation were set canonically by Eugene O'Neill, Tennessee Williams, and Miller. In these plays, white men are privileged with their family and social responsibility; typically, these men are lower class. Miller maintained that family relationships and families must be immersed in social context.

Social responsibility

Arthur Miller is known for the consciousness of the characters in his play. In his plays, he confronts a level of banality with the roller coaster of guilt and responsibility. Some strong examples of characters who portray this struggle between their conscious and their social responsibility are Joe Keller in All My Sons and John Proctor in The Crucible. Miller often creates consequences for characters who ignore or violate their social responsibilities.

Life, death, and human purpose

Miller's determination to deal with the eternal themes of life, death and human purpose is one of his most prominent themes across his works. This theme spans from Willy Lowman's dedication to providing for his family and his inherent belief that his death would leave a legacy, to John Proctor's willingness to die to preserve his name. Mostly all of Miller's protagonists struggle with the mark they leave on life and what it means to die.

Characters

Willy Loman

In Death of a Salesman – originally entitled “The Inside of His Head” – Miller brilliantly solves the problem of revealing his main character’s inner discord, rendering Willy Loman as solid as the society in which he tries to sell himself. Indeed, many critics believe that Miller has never surpassed his achievement in this play, which stands as his breakthrough work, distinguished by an extremely long Broadway run, by many revivals, and by many theater awards, including the Pulitzer Prize in 1949. Death of a Salesman seems destined to remain an American classic and a standard text in American classrooms. Willy Loman desperately wants to believe that he has succeeded, that he is “well liked” as a great salesman, a fine father, and a devoted husband. That he has not really attracted the admiration and popularity at which he has aimed is evident, however, in the weariness that belabors him from the beginning of the play. Nearing retirement he suffers a drastic decrease in sales work, a dissatisfying marriage, and a turbulent relationship with his sons which inexorably leads to his suicide with the justification that the insurance will finally provide for his family.

Eddie Carbone

Eddie Carbone is the central character in A View From The Bridge and is not positioned as the protagonist or the antagonist. He is a longshoreman who lives with his wife, Beatrice, and his 17-year-old niece, Catherine. When his family from Italy, Rodolpho and Marco, migrate illegally and begin to live with him, the small world that he operates in is disrupted. Eddie becomes conflicted and ultimately self-destructive over his sexual attraction to his niece and her involvement with one of his Italian tenants. His character arc culminates as he becomes an informer to the immigration authorities which leads to a confrontation with one of his tenants. Marco labels him as an informer and Eddie perceives this as a permanent blemish on his good name. This confrontation ultimately leads to his death, leaving Eddie as one of Miller's examples of tragic figures.

John Proctor

John Proctor is the protagonist of one of Miller's most controversial works, The Crucible. He is a faithful farmer who lives by a strict moral code that he violates by succumbing to an affair with a young girl, Abigail, who serves in his home. After rejecting her, Abigail spitefully accuses John's wife of witchcraft, involving him in a string of affairs that challenge his beliefs and convictions.

In his attempts to save his wife, he is convicted of witchcraft as well, and will only be acquitted if he confesses to his crime and signs his name to a piece of paper. Proctor is a strong, vital man in the prime of his life both in his confession of witchcraft and the subsequent passion with which he defends his name at the cost of his life.

Joe Keller

Critics have long admired the playwright's suspenseful handling of the Keller family's burden in the play All My Sons. The critical character in this work is Joe Keller, who permitted defective parts to remain in warplanes that subsequently crash. Not only does Joe Keller fail to recognize his social responsibility, but also he allows his business partner to take the blame and serve the prison term for the crime. Gradually, events combine to strip Keller of his rationalizations. He argues that he never believed that the cracked engine heads would be installed and that he never admitted his mistake because it would have driven him out of business at the age of sixty-one, when he would not have another chance to "make something" for his family, his highest priority. Joe's irresponsibility is exposed through his son's questioning of his very humanity. Joe's suicide results from the tremendous guilt and self-awareness that arises during the play. This reversal from staunchly defensive over his honorable need to protect his family to discovering his social responsibility had some critics claiming that this was a theatrical trick.

VICTOR HUGO – OLYMPIO OU LA VIE DE HUGO, BIOGRAPHY BY ANDRE MAUROIS

Victor Hugo was the first great author whom I read, when I was still a boy, and he uncovered for me a wonderful world – France of the Middle Ages, France of the eighteenth century, France of the Revolution. Hugo has a style uncomparable to any other author, which is quite impossible to translate – in poetry, drama, and prose. Hugo was the first humanist writer that I read, long before Emile Zola. Dumas and Verne are excellent authors but they don't have a humanist agenda as Hugo had. The foundations of my ethical beliefs are probably in Hugo's works, as he was greater than life, he not only wrote masterpieces, but he was also an exceptional person, that France reveres even today. Zola was not the author of all France – he was the author of half of France, of the socialist and humanist half as compared to the conservatives who abhorred him. But the veneration to Hugo is throughout all the classes of France – this was not so in the 19th century, as he was a republican anti-clerical, and the royalists and clericals did not like him although they respected him. But today, almost all Frenchmen love Hugo and his works. Andre Maurois succeeds to give us the fantastic story of Hugo's life in a very vivid way, as only a great author can tell the story of another great author. I read this biography at least twice, and I still remember it as one of the most exhilarating biographies that I have ever read when I was young.

KIRKUS REVIEW

Destined for the broad market and recognition which came to Lelia, Maurois' recent biography of George Sand, and perhaps to go beyond it, this is a monumental study of a monumental poet and statesman. Reading this in comparison with the Lelia, it is a pleasure to note again Maurois' style, his choice of detail and emphasis that makes such a study thoroughly interesting to modern readers, his fine use of source material that covers hitherto unpublished letters as well as the most familiar of Hugo's poems, and the apt integration of the man's works with the man's life. To some readers who may come to this book as an introduction to Hugo, he emerges as a creature of amazing contrasts. The events in his life alone are enough to startle, but Maurois leads us into them, unfolding them so that their cumulative effect is particularly lasting. That Hugo was a quiet, retiring boy, a demanding and priggish suitor, a bored husband, and in old age a faun becomes especially clear in the perceptive reporting of his feelings towards women through letters he wrote and received and in the light of social background and his own erratic genius. So too does his evolution as a writer and believer in liberty as the root of good. The praise Hugo received from his contemporaries- Sainte Beuve, Lamartine, Vigny- and the contrast of his poems and plays with those of his forerunners in the romantic period firmly cast him in the role of spokesman for the French language of his day & the ""voice, in the wilderness"" who in exile kept the thought of freedom alive after 1850. A complete study, for a wide variety of readers.

Victor Marie Hugo (26 February 1802 – 22 May 1885) was a French poet, novelist, and dramatist of the Romantic movement. He is considered one of the greatest and best-known French writers. In France, Hugo's literary fame comes first from his poetry and then from his novels and his dramatic achievements. Among many volumes of poetry, Les Contemplations and La Légende des siècles stand particularly high in critical esteem. Outside France, his best-known works are the novels Les Misérables, 1862, and Notre-Dame de Paris, 1831 (known in English as The Hunchback of Notre-Dame). He also produced more than 4,000 drawings, which have since been admired for their beauty, and earned widespread respect as a campaigner for social causes such as the abolition of capital punishment. Though a committed royalist when he was young, Hugo's views changed as the decades passed, and he became a passionate supporter of republicanism; his work touches upon most of the political and social issues and the artistic trends of his time. He is buried in the Panthéon. Victor Hugo's first mature work of fiction appeared in 1829, and reflected the acute social conscience that would infuse his later work. Le Dernier jour d'un condamné (The Last Day of a Condemned Man) would have a profound influence on later writers such as Albert Camus, Charles Dickens, and Fyodor Dostoevsky. Claude Gueux, a documentary short story about a real-life murderer who had been executed in France, appeared in 1834, and was later considered by Hugo himself to be a precursor to his great work on social injustice, Les Misérables.

Hugo became the figurehead of the romantic literary movement with the plays Cromwell (1827) and Hernani (1830). Hugo's novel Notre-Dame de Paris (The Hunchback of Notre-Dame) was published in 1831 and quickly translated into other languages across Europe. One of the effects of the novel was to shame the City of Paris into restoring the much-neglected Cathedral of Notre Dame, which was attracting thousands of tourists who had read the popular novel. The book also inspired a renewed appreciation for pre-Renaissance buildings, which thereafter began to be actively preserved. Hugo began planning a major novel about social misery and injustice as early as the 1830s, but a full 17 years were needed for Les Misérables to be realised and finally published in 1862. Hugo was acutely aware of the quality of the novel and publication of the work went to the highest bidder. The Belgian publishing house Lacroix and Verboeckhoven undertook a marketing campaign unusual for the time, issuing press releases about the work a full six months before the launch. It also initially published only the first part of the novel ("Fantine"), which was launched simultaneously in major cities. Installments of the book sold out within hours, and had enormous impact on French society.

The critical establishment was generally hostile to the novel; Taine found it insincere, Barbey d'Aurevilly complained of its vulgarity, Gustave Flaubert found within it "neither truth nor greatness", the Goncourt brothers lambasted its artificiality, and Baudelaire – despite giving favourable reviews in newspapers – castigated it in private as "tasteless and inept". Les Misérables proved popular enough with the masses that the issues it highlighted were soon on the agenda of the National Assembly of France. Today, the novel remains his most enduringly popular work. It is popular worldwide, and has been adapted for cinema, television, and stage shows. An apocryphal tale about the shortest correspondence in history is said to have been between Hugo and his publisher Hurst and Blackett in 1862. Hugo was on vacation when Les Misérables was published. He queried the reaction to the work by sending a single-character telegram to his publisher, asking ?. The publisher replied with a single ! to indicate its success. Hugo turned away from social/political issues in his next novel, Les Travailleurs de la Mer (Toilers of the Sea), published in 1866. The book was well received, perhaps due to the previous success of Les Misérables. Dedicated to the channel island of Guernsey, where he spent 15 years of exile, Hugo tells of a man who attempts to win the approval of his beloved's father by rescuing his ship, intentionally marooned by its captain who hopes to escape with a treasure of money it is transporting, through an exhausting battle of human engineering against the force of the sea and a battle against an almost mythical beast of the sea, a giant squid. Superficially an adventure, one of Hugo's biographers calls it a "metaphor for the 19th century—technical progress, creative genius and hard work overcoming the immanent evil of the material world."

His last novel, Quatre-vingt-treize (Ninety-Three), published in 1874, dealt with a subject that Hugo had previously avoided: the Reign of Terror during the French Revolution. Though Hugo's popularity was on the decline at the time of its publication, many now consider Ninety-Three to be a work on par with Hugo's better-known novels. Another masterpiece is - L'Année terrible - a series of poems written by Victor Hugo and published in 1872. They deal with the Franco-Prussian War, the trauma of losing his son Charles, and with the Paris Commune. Covering the period from August 1870 to July 1871, a group of poems encapsulates each month, blending Hugo's anguish over personal tragedies with his despair at the predicament of France.

J'entreprends de conter l'année épouvantable,	I take up pen to tell of the terrible year,
Et voilà que j'hésite, accoudé sur ma table.	And suddenly I stop, elbows on my desk.
Faut-il aller plus loin ? dois-je continuer ?	Must I proceed? must I go on?
France ! ô deuil ! voir un astre aux cieux diminuer	France! what horror! to see a star fade in the heavens!
Je sens l'ascension lugubre de la honte.	I feel the lugubrious ascent of disgrace.
Morne angoisse ! un fléau descend, un autre monte.	Dismal anguish! one curse falls, a new one rises.
N'importe. Poursuivons. L'histoire en a besoin.	No matter. Let's continue. History needs this.
Ce siècle est à la barre et je suis son témoin.	The century is in the dock and I am his witness.

My father Albert had three fields of interest: Books, Stamps, and Zionism. He wrote articles on Zionism, read many Zionist books, and risked to be imprisoned because of that by the Egyptian authorities as it was forbidden by law. He collected also thousands of stamps from all over the world, but his pride was on the 4 complete collections of Israeli stamps – mint, used, first day covers, with tabs. When he was more than 80 and not in his prime he was conned by a crook who came to his apartment and sold him counterfeit stamps – for the most valuable and rare Israeli stamps. He invested in his collection large amounts of money, and unfortunately when he passed away at the age of almost 88 we found the deceit and the value of the collections was quite small. You need to be a ruthless crook to con old people, but unfortunately this is quite common nowadays. My father was a fervent admirer of Victor Hugo, he was born about twenty years after Hugo died, so they were almost contemporary. He read and purchased most of Hugo's books, as well as many Alexandre Dumas books, but did not like much Emile Zola. Anyhow, he had a huge library with many books, some of them quite rare books. One of the rare books that my father had in his library was Victor Hugo's L'annee terrible. It was a very fine book with illustrations by Flameng and Vierge, published by Michel Levy Freres, Editeurs, in 1874. On the first blank page of the book, I read an inscription in pencil - 15 francs (when? In 1874?) and a seal: I. M. Rofe – 30 August 92 (probably 1892) – Caire, Egypte, with the original signature of Isaac Rofe. Oh, that is indeed a rare book, I thought, published more than a century ago, I'll take it for evaluation to the antique dealer who was at the corner of Rue du Faubourg Saint Honore, near my hotel. At those times I travelled every month to Paris, so I brought it in my next trip.

The antiquaire laughed at me and said that its value was 100 francs – $14, because the first edition was in 1872, and the 1874 was the second edition which had no value. Really, I was frustrated that I would not get rich from the stamps or rare books, and I'll have to rely solely on the business that I make in Paris, the US and Israel, and not on rare books, stamps or inheritance.

After three unsuccessful attempts, Hugo was finally elected to the Académie française in 1841, solidifying his position in the world of French arts and letters. A group of French academicians, particularly Etienne de Jouy, were fighting against the "romantic evolution" and had managed to delay Victor Hugo's election. Thereafter he became increasingly involved in French politics. He was elevated to the peerage by King Louis-Philippe in 1841 and entered the Higher Chamber as a pair de France, where he spoke against the death penalty and social injustice, and in favour of freedom of the press and self-government for Poland. In 1848, Hugo was elected to the Parliament as a conservative. In 1849 he broke with the conservatives when he gave a noted speech calling for the end of misery and poverty. Other progressive speeches called for universal suffrage and free education for all children. Hugo's advocacy to abolish the death penalty was renowned internationally. One should bear in mind that Hugo's convictions were an exception.

When Louis Napoleon (Napoleon III) seized complete power in 1851, establishing an anti-parliamentary constitution, Hugo openly declared him a traitor to France. He relocated to Brussels, then Jersey, from which he was expelled for supporting a Jersey newspaper that had criticised Queen Victoria and finally settled with his family at Hauteville House in Saint Peter Port, Guernsey, where he would live in exile from October 1855 until 1870. While in exile, Hugo published his famous political pamphlets against Napoleon III, Napoléon le Petit and Histoire d'un crime. The pamphlets were banned in France, but nonetheless had a strong impact there. He also composed or published some of his best work during his period in Guernsey, including Les Misérables, and three widely praised collections of poetry (Les Châtiments, 1853; Les Contemplations, 1856; and La Légende des siècles, 1859). He convinced the British government to spare the lives of six Irish people convicted of terrorist activities and his influence was credited in the removal of the death penalty from the constitutions of Geneva, Portugal and Colombia. He had also pleaded for Benito Juárez to spare the recently captured emperor Maximilian I of Mexico but to no avail. His complete archives (published by Pauvert) show also that he wrote a letter asking the USA, for the sake of their own reputation in the future, to spare John Brown's life, but the letter arrived after Brown was executed.

Although Napoleon III granted an amnesty to all political exiles in 1859, Hugo declined, as it meant he would have to curtail his criticisms of the government. It was only after Napoleon III fell from power and the Third Republic was proclaimed that Hugo finally returned to his homeland in 1870, where he was promptly elected to the National Assembly and the Senate. He was in Paris during the siege by the Prussian army in 1870, famously eating animals given to him by the Paris zoo. As the siege continued, and food became ever more scarce, he wrote in his diary that he was reduced to "eating the unknown". Because of his concern for the rights of artists and copyright, he was a founding member of the Association Littéraire et Artistique Internationale, which led to the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works. However, in Pauvert's published archives, he states strongly that "any work of art has two authors : the people who confusingly feel something, a creator who translates these feelings, and the people again who consecrate his vision of that feeling. When one of the authors dies, the rights should totally be granted back to the other, the people".

Hugo's religious views changed radically over the course of his life. In his youth, he identified as a Catholic and professed respect for Church hierarchy and authority. From there he became a non-practicing Catholic, and increasingly expressed anti-Catholic and anti-clerical views. He frequented spiritism during his exile (where he participated also in many séances conducted by Madame Delphine de Girardin), and in later years settled into a rationalist deism similar to that espoused by Voltaire. A census-taker asked Hugo in 1872 if he was a Catholic, and he replied, "No. A Freethinker". After 1872, Hugo never lost his antipathy towards the Catholic Church. He felt the Church was indifferent to the plight of the working class under the oppression of the monarchy. Perhaps he also was upset by the frequency with which his work appeared on the Church's list of banned books. Hugo counted 740 attacks on Les Misérables in the Catholic press. When Hugo's sons Charles and François-Victor died, he insisted that they be buried without a crucifix or priest. In his will, he made the same stipulation about his own death and funeral. Hugo's rationalism can be found in poems such as Torquemada (1869, about religious fanaticism), The Pope (1878, anti-clerical), Religions and Religion (1880, denying the usefulness of churches) and, published posthumously, The End of Satan and God (1886 and 1891 respectively, in which he represents Christianity as a griffin and rationalism as an angel). Vincent van Gogh ascribed the saying "Religions pass away, but God remains", actually by Jules Michelet, to Hugo.

In another context I brought one of my most favorite poems by Victor Hugo, that summarizes my attitude towards business ethics, and towards life in general. I may be a super nerd, but deep in my soul I am a revolutionary, fighting for my ideas, like Hugo, Zola, Ibsen, and the prophets... I am no more politically correct, I would rather be approximately right than precisely wrong, and I prefer to put a red hat on the old dictionary, making a tempest at the bottom of the inkstand, leaping out of the ring and breaking the compass. I would rather establish democratically a Second Republic of Israel than try to change the situation with a political party, as it was proved inefficient throughout the years. I point the finger at the wrongdoers, the hypocrites, the crooks, and call them by their name. My book's purpose is to blend the white swarm of ideas with the black multitude of words. In my 72nd year I know all the tricks of the trade, I found out that more activism is needed in order to make an impact in the near future. A new revolutionary wind is needed, even if it is not based on smoking-gun evidence. Most of what I preconize in this book cannot be fully proven, as the wrongdoers prefer to conduct their abuse in the dark, like Mack the knife. A fresh wind of transparency is essential, and I base most of my book inter alia on entries that I have found on the Internet, the ultimate transparency democratic vehicle...

"Je fis souffler un vent révolutionnaire.
 Je mis un bonnet rouge au vieux dictionnaire.
 Plus de mot sénateur! plus de mot roturier!
 Je fis une tempête au fond de l'encrier,
 Et je mêlai, parmi les ombres débordées,
 Au peuple noir des mots l'essaim blanc des idées;
 Et je dis: Pas de mot ou l'idée au vol pur
 Ne puisse se poser, toute humide d'azur!...
 Je bondis hors du cercle et brisai le compas.
 Je nommai le cochon par son nom; pourquoi pas?"
 (Victor Hugo, Reponse a un acte d'accusation, Reply to a bill of indictment)
 "I have swept a revolutionary wind.
 I have put a red hat on the old dictionary.
 No more noble! no more common people!
 I have made a tempest at the bottom of the inkstand,
 And I have blended, between the overloaded shadows,
 The white swarm of ideas with the black multitude of words;
 And I said: No words where the pure flight of ideas
 Cannot land on, all humid from the azure sky!...

I have leaped out of the ring and broken the compass.
I have pointed the finger at the pig; why not?

MAHATMA GANDHI – BY JUDITH BROWN

It is quite odd that I would chose Gandhi as the personality who impressed me most, being raised in a Western culture and having never visited India. Yet, I admire Gandhi and his doctrine, and especially his non-violence attitude. An Israeli advocating non-violence – is it an oximoron? Jews have preconized non-violence throughout 2,000 years, our prophets preached against violence, and I know that the Israeli society is mostly against violence of all sorts, and if it uses violence it is only against our enemies' aggression. This is not a coincidence that most of the Israelis who travel abroad after their service in the Israeli army travel to India, and Indian philosophy and meditation. I have read several times the Bhagavad Gita, translated from Sanskrit by my friend and fellow ethicist Itamar Theodor. The setting of the Gita in a battlefield has been interpreted as an allegory for the ethical and moral struggles of the human life. The Bhagavad Gita's call for selfless action inspired many leaders of the Indian independence movement including Bal Gangadhar Tilak and Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi. Gandhi referred to the Gita as his "spiritual dictionary". Yet, Gandhi never ceased trying to overturn the prejudices of Western modernity. He dressed as an Indian peasant and rejected all outward signs of being a modern intellectual or politician. True civilization, he insisted, was about moral self-knowledge and spiritual strength rather than bodily well-being, material comforts, or great art and architecture. I believe like Gandhi that true civilization is moral self-knowledge and spiritual strength, but I am not willing to overlook bodily well-being, moderate material comfort, great art, architecture, literature and music. I found the harmony between an intellectual and cultural life with a cosmopolitan perspective, but rooted in my Jewish heritage, my country, and my language, without any inferiority complexes towards the West, nor any resentment from past colonialism, anti-Semitism, and discrimination. I feel well in my country Israel, and in my visits and stays in Paris and Provence, UK, US, Spain, Germany, Greece, Latin America, Singapore, Portugal, Scandinavia, the Netherlands, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Italy and Switzerland. I adhere spiritually with Gandhi's vision, but I think that his asceticism is inconvenient for me but I don't want also luxuries and riches, just to live a moderate/ethical life, with a rich culture.

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi (2 October 1869 – 30 January 1948) was the preeminent leader of the Indian independence movement in British-ruled India. Employing nonviolent civil disobedience, Gandhi led India to independence and inspired movements for civil rights and freedom across the world. The honorific Mahatma (Sanskrit: "high-souled", "venerable") applied to him first in 1914 in South Africa, is now used worldwide. He is also called Bapu (Gujarati: endearment for "father", "papa") in India. In common parlance in Bharat (India) he is called Gandhiji; reference as Gandhi can be considered lacking in good form and respect. Born and raised in a Hindu merchant caste family in coastal Gujarat, western India, and trained in law at the Inner Temple, London, Gandhi first employed nonviolent civil disobedience as an expatriate lawyer in South Africa, in the resident Indian community's struggle for civil rights. After his return to India in 1915, he set about organising peasants, farmers, and urban labourers to protest against excessive land-tax and discrimination. Assuming leadership of the Indian National Congress in 1921, Gandhi led nationwide campaigns for easing poverty, expanding women's rights, building religious and ethnic amity, ending untouchability, but above all for achieving Swaraj or self-rule. Gandhi famously led Indians in challenging the British-imposed salt tax with the 400 km Dandi Salt March in 1930, and later in calling for the British to Quit India in 1942. He was imprisoned for many years, upon many occasions, in both South Africa and India. Gandhi attempted to practise nonviolence and truth in all situations, and advocated that others do the same. He lived modestly in a self-sufficient residential community and wore the traditional Indian dhoti and shawl, woven with yarn hand-spun on a charkha. He ate simple vegetarian food, undertook long fasts as a means of both self-purification and social protest.

Gandhi's vision of an independent India based on religious pluralism, however, was challenged in the early 1940s by a new Muslim nationalism which was demanding a separate Muslim homeland carved out of India. Eventually, in August 1947, Britain granted independence, but the British Indian Empire was partitioned into two dominions, a Hindu-majority India and Muslim Pakistan. As many displaced Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs made their way to their new lands, religious violence broke out, especially in the Punjab and Bengal. Eschewing the official celebration of independence in Delhi, Gandhi visited the affected areas, attempting to provide solace. In the months following, he undertook several fasts unto death to promote religious harmony. The last of these, undertaken on 12 January 1948 at age 78, also had the indirect goal of pressuring India to pay out some cash assets owed to Pakistan. Some Indians thought Gandhi was too accommodating. Nathuram Godse, a Hindu nationalist, assassinated Gandhi on 30 January 1948 by firing three bullets into his chest at point-blank range. Review on the biography by Pavan Varma

The first volume of Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi's autobiography, My Experiments with Truth, was published in 1927; the second volume surfaced in 1929. Both were written in Gujarati and priced at Re 1. Since then there have been innumerable biographies of Mahatma Gandhi, the entire trend culminating in Richard Attenborough's epochal film, Gandhi, in 1982. The question that arises now is: is there anything new remaining to be said about Gandhi? Reading Judith Brown's masterly biography of the great saint-politician, the answer is a categorical 'yes'. What is distinct about her work is that it is not merely a narration of the main events of the well-known life of the 'father of the Indian nation', but also a portrait of Gandhi, the man and the person; it is a portrait of not only the 'Mahatma' but also of the 'Bapu'; and it is a picture of not only the politician but also of the son, the father and the husband. It explores, through considerable new archival research, the inner dilemmas of a leader, not always victorious - as those who have put him on a pedestal tend to believe - but often in deep gloom; not always declaratory and triumphant, but often in contemplative retreat. Historians of peoples and places tend to focus on the peaks and shallows; this particular work dwells equally on the plateaus that stretch for long distances between the two. Brown begins with a succinct summary of the impact of British rule in India as a backdrop to Gandhi's birth in 1869. She then traces the evolution of Gandhi, the political agitationist - from the petty politics of Kathiawad to the national stage in India. The spiritual evolution of Gandhi, inseparable from his politics, is dexterously interwoven.

Important events are analysed to identify Gandhi's impact, his choices and options, in the context of the time, place and circumstance. Considerable space is given to Gandhi's views on matters other than politics: diet, personal hygiene, education, health and sex. For instance, Gandhi attempted a celibate life when still in his early 30s. In his autobiography he recalls that he was in bed with his wife when his ailing father died. Brown feels that Gandhi could never outlive this childhood association of sex with guilt. Many of Gandhi's views - and not only in matters of sex - would even be difficult for a modern Indian to understand, leave alone someone from the West. Brown's approach, however, is to treat Gandhi, in such matters, as a man of his time and place, with a particular philosophic and religious background. There is no derisive condescension here; even criticism is in the form of careful comment, not hasty dismissal. There is no doubt that even Gandhi's fads became elevated to the level of principles by the touch of his idealism and the force of his convictions. Each of his tools - ahimsa, satyagraha and non-cooperation - had their contradictions and limitations, and yet taken together they nurtured to victory the world's most unique anti-imperialist revolution. The problem is that Gandhi's personal morality and idealism were so absolute that they were incapable of emulation. In part, therefore, his legacy has been to spawn the most widespread hypocrisy in Indian public life: lip service to the ideals of the father of the nation, self-service in pursuit of the very things he spent a life-time trying to eliminate.

Review on the biography by Silvester Percival

Gandhi is often remembered simplistically as the champion of non-violent resistance and the "father of independent India." There is plenty of truth to this. Like Malcolm X and Martin Luther King, he is remembered most for a few signature achievements. But behind these signature achievements there was a highly complex private life, and a career trajectory that was never as simple or smooth as it would seem. Judith Brown's biography of Gandhi tries to tell this more complex story. It is mainly a story of Gandhi's public life and the aspects that would later influence his view of Indian affairs: studying law in England as a young man, his early political activism in South Africa, his discovery of higher ideals upon return to India, and finally his influence on the movement for Indian independence. Brown depicts Gandhi as a character of both contradiction and vision, who confronted the most profound questions of the time "in the context of an active public life." She gives particular emphasis to Gandhi's personal crisis in the 1920s, which resulted from the failure of non-violence and his diminishing political influence as the leader of Congress. According to Brown, this crisis inspired Gandhi's transformation from a political activist to a spiritual leader, and ultimately characterized the remainder of his life. His new vision became the transformation of Indian society from the roots upwards in order to create a unified and harmonious India free of British rule. In contrast to the popular memory of Gandhi as the father of independent India, Brown stresses the ways in which he uneasily coexisted with the educated and westernized Indians who led the Indian National Congress. Gandhi's sympathies lay with the poor, with the masses unable to find representation within the system the British imposed – not with Congress leaders intent on expedient political solutions.

Gandhi's early struggles in convincing Indians of the importance of non-violence, in particular, set him at odds with Congress members, who wished for a more aggressive pursuit of independence. But it also cast him as an all-India public figure capable of commanding mass support, and made him recognizable to all who were politically aware. According to Brown, this charisma became Gandhi's appeal. His ideals reflected a unique combination of Indian traditionalism and Western idealism. He appealed to both Indians and Western sympathizers, who recognized him as a visionary spiritual leader, aloof from the fray of politics, and this is largely how he is remembered today. The only real weakness of this biography is that it focuses perhaps overmuch on Gandhi's public life when the reader perhaps wishes for a little more on his controversial personal life (Gandhi did not have such progressive views when it came to the treatment of women, such as his wife, for example). But this is still one of the best biographies of one of the most important figures of modern history.

Extracts from an Article: The Inner Voice/Gandhi's Real Legacy, by Pankat Misra, published on May 2, 2011 in The New Yorker

Gandhi's ideas were rooted in a wide experience of a freshly globalized world. Born in 1869 in a backwater Indian town, he came of age on a continent pathetically subject to the West, intellectually as well as materially. Europeans backed by garrisons and gunboats were free to transport millions of Asian laborers to far-off colonies (Indians to South Africa, Chinese to the Caribbean), to exact raw materials and commodities from Asian economies, and to flood local markets with their manufactured products. Europeans, convinced of their moral superiority, also sought to impose profound social and cultural reforms upon Asia. Even a liberal figure like John Stuart Mill assumed that Indians had to first grow up under British tutelage before they could absorb the good things—democracy, economic freedom, science—that the West had to offer. The result was widespread displacement: many Asians in their immemorial villages and market towns were forced to abandon a life defined by religion, family, and tradition amid rumors of powerful white men fervently reshaping the world, by means of compact & cohesive nation-states, the profit motive, and superior weaponry. Dignity, even survival, for many uprooted Asians seemed to lie in careful imitation of their Western conquerors. Gandhi, brought out of his semirural setting and given a Western-style education, initially attempted to become more English than the English. He studied law in London and, on his return to India, in 1891, tried to set up first as a lawyer, then as a schoolteacher. But a series of racial humiliations during the following decade awakened him to his real position in the world. Moving to South Africa in 1893 to work for an Indian trading firm, he was exposed to the dramatic transformation wrought by the tools of Western modernity: printing presses, steamships, railways, and machine guns. In Africa and Asia, a large part of the world's population was being incorporated into, and made subject to the demands of, the international capitalist economy. Gandhi keenly registered the moral and psychological effects of this worldwide destruction of old ways and life styles and the ascendancy of Western cultural, political, and economic norms.

He was not alone. By the early twentieth century, modern Chinese and Muslim intellectuals were also turning away from Europe's universalist ideals of the Enlightenment, which they saw as a moral cover for unjust racial hierarchies, to seek strength and dignity in a revamped Confucianism and Islam. (These disenchanted Confucianists and Islamic modernists were later pushed aside by hard-line Communists and fundamentalists, respectively.) The terms of Gandhi's critique, however, were remarkably original. He set out his views in "Hind Swaraj or Indian Home Rule," a book written feverishly, in nine days, in November, 1909. Gandhi opposed those of his revolutionary Indian peers who—inspired by Marx, Herbert Spencer, Russian nihilists, and nationalists in Italy and Ireland—saw salvation in large-scale emulation of the West. Many of these were Hindu nationalists, intellectual ancestors of Gandhi's assassin, determined to unite India around a monolithic Hinduism. Gandhi saw that these nationalists would merely replace one set of deluded rulers in India with another: "English rule," as he termed it, "without the Englishman." Gandhi's indictment of modern civilization went further. According to him, the industrial revolution, by turning human labor into a source of power, profit, and capital, had made economic prosperity the central goal of politics, enthroning machinery over men and relegating religion and ethics to irrelevance. As Gandhi saw it, Western political philosophy obediently validated the world of industrial capitalism. If liberalism vindicated the preoccupation with economic growth at home, liberal imperialism abroad made British rule over India appear beneficial for Indians—a view many Indians themselves subscribed to. Europeans who saw civilization as their unique possession denigrated the traditional virtues of Indians—simplicity, patience, frugality, otherworldliness—as backwardness.

Gandhi never ceased trying to overturn these prejudices of Western modernity. He dressed as an Indian peasant and rejected all outward signs of being a modern intellectual or politician. True civilization, he insisted, was about moral self-knowledge and spiritual strength rather than bodily well-being, material comforts, or great art and architecture. He upheld the self-sufficient rural community over the heavily armed and centralized nation-state, cottage industries over big factories, and manual labor over machines. He also encouraged satyagrahis to feel empathy for their political opponents and to abjure violence against the British. For, whatever their claims to civilization, the British, too, were victims of the immemorial forces of human greed and violence that had received an unprecedented moral sanction in the political, scientific, and economic systems of the modern world. Satyagraha might awaken in them an awareness of the profound evil of industrial civilization. Hostile interpretations of Gandhi's acts stalked him throughout his life. Muslims accused him of being the harbinger of Hindu "Raj"; Hindu nationalists accused him of being insufficiently dedicated to their cause. Left-wing Indians suspected that he was cunningly preempting class conflict on behalf of India's big businessmen. Most of Gandhi's European interlocutors regarded him with fear and distaste; Winston Churchill wanted Gandhi to be "bound hand and foot at the gates of Delhi and then trampled on by an enormous elephant with the new Viceroy seated on its back." A confidential government report on Gandhi's years in South Africa declared that "the workings of his conscience . . . his ethical and intellectual attitude . . . baffles the ordinary processes of thought." The British press as well as the government routinely took this disdainful view of India's leading anti-colonial campaigner.

Gandhi was not only the most prolific of modern thinkers—his "Collected Works" will run to a hundred volumes—but also the most globalized and ecumenical, and, a century later, it's still not easy to place him. His closest friends in South Africa were Jewish intellectuals from England and Germany. After trying vainly to turn himself into an English gentleman, he was initiated into Hindu philosophy by a Russian Theosophist. And he borrowed as much from the New Testament, Ruskin, Thoreau, G. K. Chesterton, and Tolstoy (the polemical Christian rather than the novelist) as from the Bhagavad Gita, whose affirmation of righteous war he reinterpreted as a parable of nonviolence. Though known as a devout Hindu, Gandhi rarely visited temples, and was generally repelled by the rituals and customs of organized religion. He disclaimed all responsibility for what his followers and detractors called "Gandhism," declaring that any ideological " 'ism' deserves to be destroyed." Though he drew upon the language of modern anti-imperialism, he professed no faith in constitutional democracy, Communism, industrialization, or other forms of self-strengthening embraced by Indian and Asian anti-imperialists. He preferred, as his exasperated and articulate assassin put it, such "old superstitious beliefs" as the "power of the soul, the inner voice, the fast, the prayer and the purity of the mind."

Gandhi's nonconformist ways tend to appall and alienate secular-minded observers. George Orwell confessed to an "aesthetic distaste" for his "anti-human and reactionary" aims. "Gandhi's teachings cannot be squared with the belief that Man is the measure of all things," Orwell warned, correctly. Roberts is not entirely wrong to allege that Gandhi was "a political incompetent, and a fanatical faddist." Advising European Jews to practice nonviolent resistance against Hitler, he was guilty of a grotesque misunderstanding of the Third Reich. Many of his acts were deeply selfish: he did not consult his wife before imposing his vow of celibacy on her. Yet the British historian Judith Brown exaggerates only slightly when she claims, in her introduction to "The Cambridge Companion to Gandhi," that "anyone who considers many of the fundamental issues of human life, its goals, its capacities, and the nature of men and women in public communities, issues of violence and cooperation, and of ends and means, will find that Gandhi has been there before, and struggled with them." Gandhi's name, after all, is frequently and wistfully invoked in many conflict zones today; sometimes, the widely felt yearning for a Palestinian or Israeli Gandhi seems proof of the moral superiority of his nonviolent politics. He diagnosed many maladies of our interdependent world in ways that seem prescient. His ecological world view—summed up by his homily "Earth provides enough to satisfy every man's need but not for every man's greed"—and forays into organic farming no longer seem as eccentric as they did when hardly anyone had a private car and only a fraction of the world's population regularly ate meat. Petra Kelly, a co-founder and the first leader of Germany's increasingly powerful Green Party, credited Gandhi for the now commonplace belief that having an ecologically oriented society "reduces the risk that policies of violence will be pursued in our name."

Gandhi's greatest contribution to the arsenal of political activism, however, is his theory and practice of bringing together great masses of highly motivated and disciplined protesters in public spaces. Here his spiritual beliefs were crucial: the assumption, in particular, that, regardless of the regime people lived under—democracy or dictatorship, capitalist or socialist—they always possessed a freedom of conscience, an inner capacity to make moral choices in everyday life. As his mass campaigns often proved, and the recent Arab uprisings have affirmed, such strongly self-aware individuals acting coöperatively in the spotlight of the world media could come to wield an astonishing amount of moral authority—the "authentic, enduring power" of people that, as Hannah Arendt wrote in her analysis of the Prague Spring of 1968, a repressive regime or government could neither create nor suppress through the use of terror, and before which it must eventually surrender. Gandhi did not see his own political activism as a means to a predetermined end, and exhorted his old Congress Party to dissolve itself after India's independence instead of becoming the new ruling class. Gandhi felt politics to be too important to be left to professional politicians, or to the technocrats and journalists who shape government policy and influence public opinion. Indeed, as the philosopher Akeel Bilgrami points out in a stimulating essay in "The Cambridge Companion to Gandhi," he recoiled from such instrumentalist categories of statecraft and politicking as "populations" and "citizenry." For him, working and bonding with other flesh-and-blood men and women was the most satisfying way of being in the world. As such, political and social activism was an end in itself.

Bilgrami describes Gandhi as a greater "anti-imperialist theorist" than Lenin and Frantz Fanon. This seems right. Unlike them, Gandhi didn't just single out Western imperialists, or blame capitalism's unquenchable thirst for new markets and resources for European expansionism in Asia and Africa. In his view, organized exploitation of people and resources was a feature of all industrial civilization; and he did not spare its eager imitators in Asia, such as Japan, and their obsession with achieving national strength at the expense of the weak. He could never have advocated or endorsed something like the Great Leap Forward—Mao's attempt to catch up with the industrialized West, which consumed between thirty and forty-five million lives. India, he was convinced, would be "a curse for other nations, a menace to the world," once it became industrialized. Bilgrami shows how finely Gandhi integrated his religious beliefs and his political ones. According to him, Gandhi intuited that the triumph of a scientific world view over a religious one had "desacralized nature and made it prey without impunity to the most ruthlessly systematic extractive political economies—of mining, deforestation, plantation agriculture (what we now call agribusiness), and so on." Defining humanity in terms of "gains and utilities," the modern outlook "could not see the world itself as containing anything that made moral or normative demands on one," and led East and West alike into a "cognitive enslavement." For Gandhi, genuine anti-imperialism lay in devising a mode of politics and economy that did not lead millions of Indians into the iron cage of a "decadent and utilitarian modernity."

The audacious radicalism of Gandhi's ideas is too often lost in the blandly universal reverence his name evokes. It's true that a lot of his arguments can seem like the ravings of a Luddite: his accusation, for instance, that modern lawyers and doctors make people more irresponsible and greedy. But they are not without a kernel of truth: a century later, we are more receptive to his idea that the profit motive makes lawyers divide rather than reconcile people, or that the lucrative business of modern medicine often treats symptoms while ignoring the real causes of disease. Dwight Macdonald claimed to love Gandhi precisely because he lacked respect for “railroads, assembly-belt production and other knick-knacks of liberalistic Progress” and did not make speeches about democracy and Fascism. “He was the last political leader in the world who was a person, not a mask,” Macdonald wrote in a tribute after Gandhi’s assassination, “the last leader on a human scale.” But Gandhi’s refusal to endorse one or another of the many secular and rational ideologies of collective redemption (liberal capitalism, socialism, nationalism) also makes it difficult for us to enter his unique world view.

As a figure, the spiritually minded, sagelike thinker long ago faded from the mainstream of modern societies, together with religious faith, which used to prescribe ethical responsibilities and duties. Such traditional forms of authority have been displaced by ideologies, laws, and institutions, and the secular world views of science and commerce. It has been left to relatively marginal religious writers and philosophers such as Simone Weil, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Czeslaw Milosz to reckon with the difficulty of being moral men and women in complex, immoral societies. Gandhi, trying to devise a way of living ethically in the midst of the most violent century in history, now seems the most distinguished figure in this countercultural tradition; and if some part of his message rings true it is because we share his anxieties about the public life of our societies, which seems possessed of an irrational momentum all its own. States grow ever more machine-like, men are transformed into statistical choruses of voters, producers, patients, tourists or soldiers. In politics, good and evil, categories of the natural world and therefore obsolete remnants of the past, lose all absolute meaning; the sole method of politics is quantifiable success. Power is a priori innocent because it does not grow from a world in which words like guilt and innocence retain their meaning.

This could be Gandhi; it is actually Václav Havel, in his early essay “Politics and Conscience,” describing the political consequences of the desacralized world—the loss of the human scale in Western democracies as well as in Communist dictatorships. Reflecting on the ideological standoffs of the Cold War, Havel was convinced that “a genuine, profound and lasting change for the better . . . can no longer result from the victory of any particular traditional conception.” Instead, it would have to “derive from human existence, from the fundamental reconstitution of the position of people in the world, their relationships to themselves and each other, and to the universe.” This sounds like a very tall order. But it was what Gandhi set his sights on, pitting himself against every political and social trend of the past two hundred years. Defeat was ordained. Yet there were many moments of redemptive glory in his great struggle. Emerging in the early nineteen-thirties from one of Gandhi’s most brilliantly choreographed campaigns, Jawaharlal Nehru confessed, “What the future will bring I know not, but . . . our prosaic existence has developed something of epic greatness in it.” Many more people since then have known this exhilaration of effecting change through individual acts of courage and empathy. It is what young Egyptians and Tunisians feel today, and their Yemeni counterparts may experience tomorrow: the ever renewable power of coöperative action, which is a truer measure of Gandhi’s legacy than his many failures.

FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA– A BIOGRAPHY (THE ASSASSINATION) BY IAN GIBSON

The author I admire most in Spanish language is Cervantes, but the modern author I admire most is Federico Garcia Lorca. I have read his poetry, his plays, a biography, and I was moved by the story of his assassination. I strongly oppose any censure, any ban on books, as an intellectual has to be exposed to all the literature that he chooses. Lawrence was banned, Zola was banned, even Hugo was banned, many authors who wrote about freedom, who opposed oppression, who were social activists were banned, not counting dissident authors as Heine because he was Jewish, Solzhenitsyn because he fought for freedom, Lorca because he was homosexual. We live in times that are both advanced and retrograde. Homosexuals are allowed to marry in many countries, while in others they are murdered. In 2015 in the advanced Israel a young teenager was murdered by an ultra-orthodox fanatic at a gay parade and the two orthodox parties' members of parliament left their seats when a gay Likud member was sworn in. Yet, many gays and lesbians are no more afraid to speak about their sexual orientation in Spain, Israel, France, the UK and the US. How can one ban such a marvelous author as Lorca, one of the best poets whom I ever read if not the best. I am privileged to understand Spanish because otherwise I would have lost in translation most of the flavor of Lorca's poems. I am very far from the ambience of Lorca's plays – Yerma, Bodas de sangre, La casa de Bernarda Alba... - but Lorca makes us identify with his protagonists and understand perfectly their motives, in an exemplary style.

Federico del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús García Lorca, known as Federico García Lorca (5 June 1898 – 19 August 1936) was a Spanish poet, playwright, and theatre director. García Lorca achieved international recognition as an emblematic member of the Generation of '27. The Generation of '27 was a group consisting of mostly poets who introduced the tenets of European movements (such as symbolism, futurism, and surrealism) into Spanish literature. He was executed by Nationalist forces at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War. His body has never been found. In 2008, a Spanish judge opened an investigation into Lorca's death. The García Lorca family eventually dropped objections to the excavation of a potential gravesite near Alfacar, but no human remains were found. At dawn on the 19th of August 1936 Spaniards murdered the man who most profoundly embodied the poetic spirit of their country. Federico Garcia Lorca was the victim of the passions that arose in Spain as the Church, the military and the bourgeoisie embarked on their reckless and brutal repression of "undesirables". For Lorca was not a political man; he embraced Spain - from its struggling leftist movement to its most conservative traditions - with a love that transcended politics. His "crime" was his antipathy to pomposity, conformity and intolerance. For years the Spanish government suppressed the truth about Lorca's death. In this recreation of the assassination, Ian Gibson redresses the wrong. Based on information only recently made available, this is an illumination not only of the death of a great poet, but of the atmosphere of Civil War Spain that allowed it to happen.

A review by MH Lambert on 14 Feb. 2010

This is basically a revised, more readable and more approachable English-language edition of Gibson's book about the Nationalist repression in Granada. This edition is subject to more revision and a more Lorca-based analysis of proceedings. This is no bad thing, Gibson does not pretend to be an academic historian but writes lucidly, engagingly and brilliantly about a brutal, controversial and mystified topic. For those wanting to delve briefly into one of the most whitewashed and misunderstood political murders in Spanish history - you need look no further than this. Gibson starts the book with an outline of Granada as an historical-cultural area and about how Lorca fitted into it all. He then elucidates the basic politics of the Republic and local politics of Granada in easily understandable and approachable terms. Gibson readily argues against the revisionist wisdom of an apolitical Lorca and inserts him in the narrative of the Republic. He does occasionally simplify issues but not to the detriment of his overall argument or the tone of the book. The main section of the book then deals with the rising, repression and revenge that engulfed Granada - eventually resulting in the death of Lorca. This is the main weight of the book and Gibson reconstructs this tumultuous time through a great selection of primary evidence which paints a picture for the audience of life and death in Granada.

What makes this book great for the general reader is that Gibson leads you by the hand through all the controversies of the topic. Evidence and items are not left in the bibliography or footnotes alone, but incorporated and dealt with in the text itself. For instance, he discredits the arguments of Nationalist historians but explains WHY and HOW they are incorrect, scurrilous or downright fictitious. He meticulously - but not boringly - picks apart why he has constructed the sequence of events he has and backs it up to the reader with justification. He does not say it is the absolute truth, but suggests it is the most feasible with all the presentable evidence. This is even more interesting in the recent failed efforts to exhume his body and all the controversy surrounding the ruthless and systematic terror of the civil war. I would strongly recommend this book to those with a passing interest in the topic of Lorca, the Spanish Civil War and the circumstances of his death. It is a short and easily readable book which is aware of its shortcomings but is excellent at constructing and conveying the intensity of the time. Importantly, it does not require prior reading nor deals with the - now enormous - historiographical literature on the civil war. Written in plain English and with easily digestible chapters, this narrative demonstrates everything right on research about the war, and everything wrong with the conduct and experiences of participants during it.

A review by DANIEL EISENBERG, Florida State University:

This polemical and eminently readable book, probably the final one of this most controversial of topics, is a revised and expanded translation by the author of his original La represión nacionalista en Granada en 1936 y la muerte de Federico García Lorca (Paris, 1971). Gibson's strength is his exhumation and exploration of new sources, and where his book is good, it is very good indeed. He succeeded in talking to the evasive Ramón Ruiz Alonso, smuggling in with him a tape recorder, and unearthed a forgotten book of Alonso's, Corporativismo (Salamanca, 1937), which has important biographical information. He located and won the confidence of Angelina, the maid of the Montesinos family, who carried Federico his meals while he was in the Granada jail. By some wizardry he was able to consult in the newspaper's own office copies of the rightist Ideal for the initial days of the revolt. He consulted the cemetery records of Granada, and identifies and reproduces the death certificate of another man executed together with Lorca. This is first-rate sleuthing, and from documents and numerous interviews Gibson has been able to establish some things for the first time and to provide substantiation for others. The uprising in Granada was surely accompanied by widespread executions. The operation to remove Lorca from the Rosales' house, where he was hiding, was undoubtedly headed by Ruiz Alonso, and he was taken to jail in the car of Alonso's friend Juan Trescastro. Once in jail, he was kept there several days, presumably so that the governor Valdés could consult with Queipo de Llano about his fate. Gibson knows even the names of the members of the death squad at Víznar, which he decided not to publish. This is all the mechanics of the execution, however, and when discussing the more important question of the motives, Gibson's analysis is less satisfying. In an important clarification, he disproves the theory that Lorca's death was in retaliation for the supposed assassination of Benavente, documenting John Crow's observation that the first news of Benavente's "assassination" appeared after Lorca's death. But he has nothing to suggest in its place, save Lorca's friendship with Republican politicians, and ends with the lame conclusion that "Lorca was assassinated by a state of mind"... Gibson is obviously a competent scholar, even if he gets a bit carried away with a justified indignation over the events in Granada in 1936. I hope he will publish a revised edition of his book with a definitive explanation, and put an end to the speculation which as things stand now is bound to continue.

THE BLOOD OF A GENIUS, by ALLEN JOSEPHS; Allen Josephs, who is University Research Professor at the University of West Florida, October 8, 1989, on FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA A Life by Ian Gibson – The New York Times

The story of Lorca's brief life (1898-1936) seems forever fated to begin with his death: "Federico Garcia Lorca was thirty-eight when anti-Republican rebels in Granada assassinated him at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War in 1936." So begins, almost ineluctably, the introduction to Ian Gibson's rich biography of the great Spanish poet. Even in the most death-conscious country in Western tradition - where, as Lorca once pointed out, death is the national spectacle - his obsession with the subject was remarkable. In a poem written in New York in 1929, he predicted that he would be assassinated and that his body would never be found. On Aug. 19, 1931, he finished and dated an insistently death-centered, autobiographical play called "When Five Years Pass." Five years later to the day a fascist death squad executed him and dumped his body into a common, unmarked grave. In 1934 his friend Ignacio Sanchez Mejias returned to the bullring after seven years in retirement, and Lorca knew intuitively the matador would be killed. When it proved true he told a friend: "Ignacio's death is like mine, the trial run for mine." The matador, he commented, "did everything he could to escape from his death, but everything he did only helped to tighten the strings of the net." That Sophoclean description fits Lorca's death as well. At the beginning of the civil war he should have been in Mexico with his favorite actress, Margarita Xirgu, who was there staging his plays. But he hesitated to leave Spain. When the violence preceding the military uprising began in Madrid, Lorca was frightened and decided to go home to Granada instead. He was repeatedly warned not to go, and his once-close friend, the film maker Luis Bunuel, was adamant: "Dreadful things are going to happen. Stay here. You'll be much safer in Madrid." Yet, like the figure summoned to a date with death in one of his "Gypsy Ballads," Lorca went home to Granada and his fate. Against that dark backdrop, his life sometimes seemed like a display of fireworks. "Life is laughter," he once remarked, "amid a rosary of deaths." Actor, director, scene designer, costume designer, pianist, guitarist, folklorist, painter, essayist, playwright and poet - he developed into a consummate artist whose genius in theater, music, art and poetry rather defies description or comparison, and he has now become the most widely translated Spanish author of all time.

He also possessed a rare talent for performance, and his "lectures" in Spain, Cuba and Argentina brought thunderous applause from his admirers. In New York in 1929-30, knowing little English, he electrified cultural gatherings by reciting his poetry, singing and accompanying himself on the piano. His theatrical success in Argentina in 1933-34 was such that the Chilean poet Pablo Neruda called it "the greatest triumph ever achieved by a writer of our race." Years later Neruda would remember with intense nostalgia the months preceding the civil war in Madrid as "the great days of my life. It was such a splendid and generous rebirth of Spanish creative life that I never again saw anything that could approach it." There were many stars in that fugitive Hispanic Pleiade, but Lorca burned the brightest. Mr. Gibson has captured the chiaroscuro of Lorca's life as no one before him has done. Unlike previous biographers, he was allowed access to the Lorca archives, specifically to "many unpublished manuscripts, his letters to his family, and a wide range of correspondence received." He was also given encouragement, cooperation and "much useful information" by Isabel Garcia Lorca, the poet's younger sister. Armed with that privileged information, 20 years of research, a scrupulous sense of honesty and the wise decision to limit himself to Lorca's life and not to include elaborate critical consideration of his works, Mr. Gibson has written a distinguished biography that never falters on the tightrope between readability and credibility.

To say that Ian Gibson - Irish by birth and a Spanish citizen since 1984 - is the authority on Lorca's life is probably to understate the case. He began in Paris in 1971 (because of censorship in Spain) with a ground-breaking book on Lorca's assassination. Since moving permanently to democratic Spain in 1978, he has written a number of books on Lorca and the Spanish Civil War. In 1985 and 1987, he completed the two volumes, published in Spain, of his magnum opus on Lorca. "Federico Garcia Lorca: A Life" is the author's own English-language condensation of that work. In the course of his far-ranging research, he has tracked down hundreds of sources all over Spain and in all the places where Lorca spent any time: the United States, England, Cuba, Uruguay and Argentina. Mr. Gibson understands Spanish culture from the inside, and he paints the complex historical and geographical background of Lorca's native region of Andalusia perfectly. His opening chapters, set in Granada and the surrounding countryside, are as informative as they are graceful and witty. In straightforward chronological fashion, he goes on to render the familiar outlines of Lorca's life: the idyllic childhood in the village of Fuente Vaqueros; the liberal education of a talented, sensitive and somewhat feckless student in Granada; the glorious early years in Madrid at the Residencia de Estudiantes, surrounded by the already eccentric painter Salvador Dali, Luis Bunuel and other young luminaries from all over Spain; the publication in 1928 of "Gypsy Ballads," the most popular book of poetry ever published in Spanish; the frustration, depression and rejection that followed - "An Andalusian Dog," Dali and Bunuel's revolutionary film of 1929, refers specifically to Lorca - and the subsequent flight to New York and Havana; the optimistic early days of the Spanish Republic when he was artistic director of the University Theater, touring with the classics of the Spanish stage to outlying towns and villages; the theatrical triumphs in Buenos Aires and Barcelona; and finally the political turmoil of the waning days of the republic, the uprising and the senseless slaughter of a poet.

Within that chronological frame, however, Mr. Gibson traces three intertwining threads of Lorca's life: religious belief, sexuality and social concern. It is in these areas - and their integral relationship to Lorca's creative powers - that his investigation and analysis are at their sharpest, his new and definitive contributions most important. Lorca was a mystical poet, a pantheistic purveyor - both provider and foreseer - of mystery, but he was also a fierce rebel against ecclesiastical authority and dogmatism. Calling Lorca's youthful rebellion "Swinburnian in its intensity," Mr. Gibson gives irrefutable evidence of "a passionate hatred for the Christian God." He cites important unpublished early poems that reveal an embittered young artist for whom the orthodox ideals of God, church and country were anathema, but who identified so deeply with the figure of Jesus that, at the age of 19, he began a play called "Christ: A Religious Tragedy." That the poet's Dionysian homoeroticism paralleled his religious heterodoxy is reasonably well known. But Mr. Gibson has greatly amplified our understanding of Lorca's involvement with the most significant figures of his time, especially Salvador Dali. At the vaunted height of their complex relationship they thought of themselves as the twin souls of Greek mythology, Castor and Pollux. Indeed, they had many similarities, and both were subject to obsessions with dreams, death and sex. As Mr. Gibson's analysis shows, although their physical relationship did not develop (Dali was unreciprocal), the effect they had on each other's lives and art was deep and enduring.

Lorca's outspoken social concerns - including, for example, published remarks about Granada's having "the worst middle class in Spain today," which "infuriated many people" there - are inseparable from his religious and sexual iconoclasm. Although he was not actively political, his deep commitment to democracy and freedom was part and parcel of his revolutionary ideas about the theater. This past July in Madrid, Lorca's most startlingly modern play, the so-called "Play Without a Name" - a long, unfinished fragment that had never before been staged - sold out and has had to be held over for the fall season. This new biography goes to the heart of Lorca's explosive genius and helps explain the undiminished appeal of such radically innovative theater. Mr. Gibson has accomplished an original critical triangulation - one that is essential for fully understanding Lorca's life, his art and his death. He has told us those parts of Lorca's life he has actually been able to verify and has not indulged in surmises. His disarming candor about the impossibility of always knowing the truth and the lack of any overriding thesis lend this very believable account the air of a classic. It has taken a long time for Lorca's full story to come to light, but now that the Spanish Civil War - so symbolic of the violence of our time - is half a century behind us, it is appropriate to have Mr. Gibson's monumental biography of its most gifted victim. THE GRANDSON OF AN IRISH FASCIST?

"I practiced the arts of sleuthing, lying and bribing people," Ian Gibson recalled about his earliest investigations into the death of Lorca, which began in Spain in 1965. To get access to a collection of Spanish newspapers, Mr. Gibson was particularly creative: "I said I was the grandson of an Irish fascist general and that I was researching the Irish contribution to the Spanish Civil War." One of Mr. Gibson's earlier books, "The Assassination of Federico Garcia Lorca," won the Prix International de la Presse in 1971 and was banned in Spain. After the death of Generalissimo Francisco Franco in 1975, official obstacles facing Mr. Gibson slowly eased, only to be replaced by those thrown up by friends and admirers wanting to protect Lorca from Mr. Gibson's "prying on private territory." "It's not surprising that the first Lorca biography was done by a foreigner, because there's a complete lack of a biographical tradition in Spain," according to Mr. Gibson, a native of Ireland who became a Spanish citizen in 1984. "Anytime I asked anything about Lorca's personal life or his sexuality, I was called 'morboso,' or morbid."

The absence of documentation about the poet's sexual life is "an important loss, but I can honestly say it's not my fault," Mr. Gibson said by telephone from his apartment in Madrid. "Lorca was very careful with his letters, and other people were very careful with them too." When he began work on his biography of Lorca in 1978, Mr. Gibson returned to Spain hoping for an advance from a publisher. Instead, he found himself churning out five other books to support his family while researching Lorca's life. "I kept thinking that if I could write just one more I'd be ahead of the game, so I could concentrate fully on Lorca. That never happened." Even now, with his life of the poet published, he acknowledges he may not be finished. "If something significant came to light, if his personal letters were found, I'd have to revise." JOSEPH A. CINCOTTI

García Lorca's return to Spain in 1930 coincided with the fall of the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera and the re-establishment of the Spanish Republic. In 1931, García Lorca was appointed as director of a university student theatre company, Teatro Universitario la Barraca (The Shack). This was funded by the Second Republic's Ministry of Education, and it was charged with touring Spain's most remote rural areas in order to introduce audiences to radically modern interpretations of classic Spanish theatre free of charge. With a portable stage, and little equipment, they sought to bring theatre to people who had never seen any, with García Lorca directing as well as acting. He commented: "Outside of Madrid, the theatre, which is in its very essence a part of the life of the people, is almost dead, and the people suffer accordingly, as they would if they had lost their two eyes, or ears, or a sense of taste. We [La Barraca] are going to give it back to them". His experiences of travelling through impoverished rural Spain and New York (particularly amongst the disenfranchised African American population), transformed him into a passionate advocate of the theatre of social action. He wrote "The theatre is a school of weeping and of laughter, a free forum, where men can question norms that are outmoded or mistaken and explain with living example the eternal norms of the human heart".

While touring with La Barraca, García Lorca wrote his now best-known plays, the Rural Trilogy of Bodas de Sangre (Blood Wedding), Yerma and La Casa de Bernarda Alba (The House of Bernarda Alba), which all rebelled against the norms of bourgeois Spanish society. He called for a rediscovery of the roots of European theatre and the questioning of comfortable conventions such as the popular drawing room comedies of the time. His work challenged the accepted role of women in society and explored taboo issues of homoeroticism and class. García Lorca wrote little poetry in this last period of his life, declaring in 1936, "theatre is poetry that rises from the book and becomes human enough to talk and shout, weep and despair." Travelling to Buenos Aires in 1933 to give lectures and direct the Argentine premiere of Blood Wedding, García Lorca spoke of his distilled theories on artistic creation and performance in the famous lecture Play and Theory of the Duende. This attempted to define a schema of artistic inspiration, arguing that great art depends upon a vivid awareness of death, connection with a nation's soil, and an acknowledgment of the limitations of reason. As well as returning to the classical roots of theatre, García Lorca also turned to traditional forms in poetry. His last poetic work Sonnets to his dark love (1936) was long thought to have been inspired by his passion for Rafael Rodríguez Rapun, secretary of La Barraca, but new documents and mementos discovered in 2012 suggest that the actual inspiration was Juan Ramírez de Lucas, a 19-year-old with whom Lorca hoped to emigrate to Mexico. The love sonnets are inspired by the 16th-century poet San Juan de la Cruz. La Barraca's subsidy was cut in half by the new government in 1934, and its last performance was given in April 1936. Lorca kept Huerta de San Vicente as his summer house in Granada from 1926 to 1936. Here he wrote, totally or in part, some of his major works, among them When Five Years Pass (Así que pasen cinco años) (1931), Blood Wedding (Bodas de sangre) (1932), Yerma (1934) and Diván del Tamarit (1931–1936). The poet lived in the Huerta de San Vicente in the days just before his arrest and assassination in August 1936. Although García Lorca's artwork doesn't often receive attention he was also a keen artist.

García Lorca left Madrid for his family home in Granada only three days before the Spanish Civil War broke out (July 1936). The Spanish political and social climate had greatly intensified after the murder of prominent monarchist and anti-Popular Front spokesman José Calvo Sotelo by Republican Assault Guards (Guardia de Asalto). García Lorca knew that he would be suspect to the rising right wing for his outspoken socialist views. Granada was so tumultuous that it had had no mayor for months; no one dared accept the job. When Lorca's brother-in-law, Manuel Fernández-Montesinos, agreed to accept the position, he was immediately assassinated. On the same day he was shot, 18 August, Lorca was arrested. It is thought that García Lorca was shot and killed by Nationalist militia on 19 August 1936. The author Ian Gibson in his book The Assassination of García Lorca alleges that he was shot with three others (Joaquín Arcollas Cabezas, Francisco Galadí Melgar and Dióscoro Galindo González) at a place known as the Fuente Grande, or Great Fountain in Spanish, which is on the road between Víznar and Alfacar. Police reports released by radio station Cadena Ser in April 2015 conclude that Lorca was executed by fascist forces. Significant controversy remains about the motives and details of Lorca's murder. Personal, non-political motives have also been suggested. García Lorca's biographer, Stainton, states that his killers made remarks about his sexual orientation, suggesting that it played a role in his death. Ian Gibson suggests that García Lorca's assassination was part of a campaign of mass killings intended to eliminate supporters of the Marxist Popular Front. However, Gibson proposes that rivalry between the anti-communist Spanish Confederation of

the Autonomous Right (CEDA) and the Falange was a major factor in Lorca's death. Former CEDA Parliamentary Deputy Ramón Ruiz Alonso arrested García Lorca at the Rosales's home, and was the one responsible for the original denunciation that led to the arrest warrant being issued.

It has been argued that García Lorca was apolitical and had many friends in both Republican and Nationalist camps. Gibson disputes this in his 1978 book about the poet's death. He cites, for example, Mundo Obrero's published manifesto, which Lorca later signed, and alleges that Lorca was an active supporter of the Popular Front. Lorca read this manifesto out loud at a banquet in honour of fellow poet Rafael Alberti on 9 February 1936. Many anti-communists were sympathetic to Lorca or assisted him. In the days before his arrest he found shelter in the house of the artist and leading Falange member Luis Rosales. Indeed, evidence suggests that Rosales was very nearly shot as well for helping García Lorca by the Civil Governor Valdes. The Basque Communist poet Gabriel Celaya wrote in his memoirs that he once found García Lorca in the company of Falangist José Maria Aizpurua. Celaya further wrote that Lorca dined every Friday with Falangist founder and leader José Antonio Primo de Rivera. On 11 March 1937 an article appeared in the Falangist press denouncing the murder and lionizing García Lorca; the article opened: "The finest poet of Imperial Spain has been assassinated." Jean-Louis Schonberg also put forward the 'homosexual jealousy' theory. The dossier on the murder, compiled at Franco's request and referred to by Gibson and others, has yet to surface. The first published account of an attempt to locate Lorca's grave can be found in British traveller and Hispanist Gerald Brenan's book 'The Face of Spain'. Despite early attempts such as Brenan's in 1949, the site remained undiscovered throughout the Franco era.

LIV ULLMANN – CHANGING – AUTOBIOGRAPHY

The best film that I have ever seen is Scenes from a Marriage, written and directed by Ingmar Bergman, where Liv Ullmann plays the immortal role of Marianne. This is the absolute film as it contains all that is necessary to make a masterpiece: first of all a story that is so realistic that the film could be also a documentary, then the protagonists are acting perfectly – you think that you are present in their lives, and most of all – Liv Ullmann is so humane, so feminine, so convincing that you fall in love with her, platonically at least. Films can be Star Wars, Superman, or The Ten Commandments, they are fine and agreeable but you are not moved, impressed, or touched. I judge films and actors/actresses not by their budget but on how they made me identify with the protagonists, love them, moved by them. That is why I love so much Scenes from a Marriage, It's a Wonderful Life, or Jean de Florette, Manon des sources, and Les sorcières de Salem. But the stories of the three French films is quite remote, although plausible, while Scenes from a Marriage can happen to you, to your friends, in Israel, Sweden, or the US, it is universal, contemporary, it is family. And Liv Ullmann is perfect in the role of Marianne as in all the other roles that she played. It made me become more feminist than I was before, as I identified fully with her and not at all with her husband, and it was instrumental (as also It's a Wonderful Life) in making our marriage overcome all its usual problems. Cinema is cosmopolitan, I can identify with protagonists in Korean, Japanese, Chinese, Latin American, Iranian, and of course European and Israeli films, as long as the subjects treated are universal, because we are all humans, we may speak different languages and dress differently, but the problems are almost identicals, as הָאָדָם הָאֶרְצִי, in Aramaic and Hebrew – People are similar in every place and in every era, social phenomenons that we think are peculiar to our country and times occur also in Sweden and India, yesterday and 2000 years ago. Scenes from a Marriage occur everywhere...

Scenes from a Marriage (Swedish: Scener ur ett äktenskap) is a 1973 Swedish television series written and directed by Ingmar Bergman. The story explores the disintegration of a marriage between Marianne, a lawyer, and Johan, a professor (played respectively by Liv Ullmann and Erland Josephson) over a long period, using a restricted cast, a naturalist, hyper-realistic cinematic style, claustrophobic close-ups, and strings of rapid, articulate monologues. After major success in Sweden, the series became notorious worldwide when it was condemned for allegedly inspiring a spike in Scandinavian divorce rates, which nearly doubled in the year of its release. This plot summary is for the 281-minute^[1] TV miniseries version of the work (the feature film retains the episode names as chapter titles). Each episode concludes with long, quiet, comforting shots of Fårö landscapes, as a "relief" from the up-close, tense and claustrophobic episodes. Each episode is structured around one critical scene, below, with the rest of the episode dedicated to discussion and aftereffects. Some of the episodes occur months or years apart.

1 "Innocence and Panic"

The story begins around Marianne's and Johan's 10th anniversary, when a reporter for a women's magazine interviews them. Peter and Katarina visit later for dinner, and cruelly humiliate one another.

2 "The Art of Sweeping Things Under the Rug"

Marianne tries to withdraw from a Sunday dinner with her parents but fails and realizes how difficult it is for her to let down other people's expectations. Johan flirts with another woman at work.

3 "Paula"

The couple retreat to their country house. Johan informs Marianne that he wants a separation and is leaving for Paris the next day with his lover, Paula.

4 "The Vale of Tears"

Johan is disillusioned with Paula and revisits Marianne. They discuss their current lives and Johan attempts to initiate sex, but Marianne is unwilling. He attempts to spend the night but cannot sleep and leaves.

5 "The Illiterates"

Marianne and Johan meet at his office to sign divorce papers, but Johan refuses. The two fight savagely. Johan declares that they are emotional illiterates. They sign the papers.

6 "In the Middle of the Night in a Dark House Somewhere in the World"

Marianne and Johan have married other people, but are unhappy. Having met coincidentally in a theatre some time earlier, they have begun secretly seeing each other again. On the 20th anniversary of their wedding, they decide to spend time together at their country house. Finding that too strange, they go to a friend's country house instead. There they discuss how much they have changed, with Marianne more self-conscious and Johan accepting his real abilities. When Marianne awakes panicking from a nightmare, Johan comforts her.

From Simon Hattenstone's Article in the Guardian, on 3 February 2001: Liv Ullmann wrote a haunting autobiography called Changing. The great Norwegian actress had recently parted from the great Swedish film-maker Ingmar Bergman, and she could feel middle age encroaching. She wanted to embrace it, but was drowning in her fears - was she a bad mother, had she sacrificed her daughter's well-being to her own ambition, what would happen when her breasts started to sag, when she was no longer a desirable commodity? The only constant she could see in the future was Bergman. Although they had separated, although there was no prospect of reconciliation, in one way or another she knew that she and Bergman would never be apart. "I was right - we never did leave each other," she says today. "You know, soon after we met, Ingmar told me he had a dream that we would be painfully connected." In the 60s and early 70s, Ullmann and Bergman were one of the world's most celebrated couples. She was his muse, his star, his love. He was her inspiration, her director, her love. This was the golden age of European cinema. Godard and Truffaut in France, Buñuel in Spain, Fassbinder in Germany, Antonioni in Italy, Tarkovsky in the Soviet Union and, of course, Bergman in Sweden. The golden age of cinema full stop. And Bergman was at the peak of his powers with a string of angst-soaked classics to his name - Wild Strawberries, The Virgin Spring, The Seventh Seal.

Those were the days when films were taken seriously. And no one's films were more serious than Bergman's. It was cinema as psychoanalysis. His movies didn't have plots, as such, let alone special effects. Yet they were gripping. They were stripped to the essence - long, brutally cropped close-ups of characters talking and talking about love and hate, guilt and God, hope and despair. Bergman showed, more powerfully than any film-maker, how people tear each other apart in the name of love. Somehow, he showed cinema at both its most humane and at its cruellest. And Ullmann, with her complex, ever-changing face, was his ideal actress - chaste, frigid, hungry, sensual, lumpen, elegant, tormented, beatific Ullmann. She had an extraordinary knack of showing contrary emotions at any one time. In Cries And Whispers, she orgasms through tears of anguish after her husband announces that he is leaving her; in Autumn Sonata, she plays a quiet, kindly daughter whose bitterness rages behind her selfless love.

Within seconds of meeting Ullmann, you realise why she was so pivotal to Bergman. She can't do small talk. She says that her head is so full of stuff these days that she is selective with her memories, and suddenly she's talking about how images define memory, and how smell is one of the strongest images, and how she's spent a lifetime trying to recapture the smell of childhood security. "My grandmother's neck smelled of safety. She was my best friend, and I used to sit on her lap when I was a little girl, and she'd tell me all these wonderful stories, and she always said the stones and the trees talked to us. If I fell asleep I would have this wonderful smell in her neck, and I would always search for this smell." What was the smell? "Maybe just being old, but in a good way. Being old in a safe way. Being human, being understandable." (Rather than be remembered by my books, autobiography, articles, lectures or courses, by my ethical teaching and beliefs, I'd rather be remembered by my children and grandchildren by my smell of safety, by being their best friend, when they sat on my lap when they were little, when I told them all these wonderful stories about Ulysses, Alice, Max and Moritz, Kaspion, stories that I have invented as the Jungle stories, where the wild animals talked to us. That they would remember me and Ruthy by our smell, while we were old, in a good, safe way, understandable, human...)

When she first met Bergman, she was married to a psychiatrist and already an established actress in her 20s. Bergman cast her in Persona (1966), opposite Bibi Andersson, as an actress having a breakdown, tormented into silence. Andersson, who had had an affair with Bergman, warned her against the film-maker. Bergman was a serial star-fucker, who seemed to sleep with his actresses as a matter of course. He was nearing 50, had been married 4 times and had 7 children. Ullmann and Bergman duly fell in love. She left her husband, moved in with him and they had a daughter, Linn. The most revealing film Ullmann starred in is Scenes From A Marriage, made in 1973, a few years after they split up. Both of them denied that this devastating account of a break-up was autobiographical, but it's hard to believe. Ullmann is Marianne, the repressed, diffident wife of a scientist, played by Bergman regular Erland Josephson, who leaves her for another woman. At the beginning of the film, the couple, being interviewed, are asked to describe themselves. The husband says that he is successful, clever, quite brilliant actually, moral, decent, popular, responsible, considerate and an absolute wow in bed. Marianne struggles to think of anything to say. Eventually, she manages, "I am a mother." As so often with Bergman, it is an unsparing study of the neurotic loneliness of women and the savage egotism of men. In Scenes From A Marriage, we never saw Marianne's children. It was as if they didn't exist. And, for much of Bergman's life, his children haven't. He used to say, almost boast, that he didn't know the ages of his children, that he measured the years by his movies, not by his offspring.

Ullmann and Bergman lived together for five short and long years on Faro, his remote Baltic island. They never married, and when they separated in the early 70s, Bergman kept Ullmann's dog, Pett, and Ullmann kept their daughter, Linn. It was while making Cries And Whispers with Ullmann that Bergman began an affair with Ingrid von Rosen, who later became his wife and remained so until she died in 1995. Ullmann decided to escape the frozen darkness of the Scandinavian climate and Bergman's vision. She went to Hollywood, where she was sold as the new Ingrid Bergman. And she certainly gave it a go, most notably in 40 Carats, a romantic comedy somewhere between Shirley Valentine and The Graduate. But Hollywood never really took to her - Scandinavian melancholy was no longer considered exotic in Tinseltown, just morose. For a short time, she was entranced by the sun, the heated pools and Henry Kissinger. But she also worried. She was shy, she was made to feel stupid by Kissinger, she wondered whether she should be out on the town when she had a young daughter.

Ullmann says people were so generous to her that it was only when she got home that she realised what a fiasco Hollywood had been. She achieved great success on Broadway, as Nora in Ibsen's A Doll's House, but even then the roots lay in Norway. Over the years, she has made Nora, that trapped butterfly of a housewife who finally breaks free, her own. She still feels Norway in her bones. "We are surrounded by mountains, we want to come out of it, we want to explore, we are not sophisticated, but we are more natural. We celebrate the light summers and shudder in the cold, dark winters." Where does she live now? "I don't know." She has a home in Norway, lives in America with Donald, and spent two and a half years making Faithless in Sweden. She talks about Linn, who is now 35, and her 10-year-old boy, Ullmann's grandson, with such tender pride. In Changing, she wrote that when Linn grew up she wanted to be a trapeze artist. Did she succeed? "No, she didn't. Well, she did in a way. She's a writer, she's a trapeze artist. Her writing is full of fantasy and images. Incredible." She's been thinking about Changing, and changing, and the importance of optimism. "Optimism wins out in the end. If you don't seek happiness, it is going to be a really sad life and it doesn't mean you have to be Polyanna. You know Polyanna? It doesn't mean you should smile at everything."

Then there was the night with Woody Allen and Bergman. "I was doing A Doll's House a long time ago on Broadway and Woody Allen was kind of courting me, probably to get to know Ingmar. Then Ingmar came to New York to see me in A Doll's House. He stayed in a hotel with Ingrid, whom he had just married. I told him Woody Allen wanted to meet him. Ingmar wanted to meet him, and he said come to my suite and we will have dinner. Then Woody Allen came to get me and he was so excited, he was shivering and talking, talking. Anyway, Ingmar opened the door and said welcome. That's all he said. And the two of them looked at each other. Two geniuses met. We sat down at the table - and this is the honest to God truth, Ingrid was sitting there, I was sitting there, Ingmar there, and Woody Allen there - and they did not talk. They just looked at each other, almost lovingly. They never talked. They never talked. They laughed to each other but never said a word. Then it was over and they said goodbye. On the way home Woody Allen said, 'Thank you. He is an incredible man.' I couldn't believe it. Then, when I came home, Ingmar called, 'Thank you, Liv, what an incredible meeting.'"

Would she ever have plastic surgery? "Never. Never did. Never will." Why not? "Because I want to see what I was meant to be, what my face is meant to be." Did she think things would work out okay when she started out? "Yes, but in a different way. I thought my mother would praise me and my men would praise me, and my daughter would praise me, and they don't necessarily praise me. But I praise myself. I'm not big in my head, and I don't feel terrible about myself, and I'm not a drunk, and I've not burnt out, and I have feelings, and I feel very young inside. I think I'm a very okay person, and that's the best thing I've done in life." Ullmann tells me of the last time she saw Bergman. Yes, of course, they fought and disagreed, but they also realised that they had reached an understanding. "We have found what real love is. It's respect, trust, admiration. It's everything except sex. But, you know, even that is there, the fondness, wanting to hug, wanting to hold hands. The last time I saw him he followed me down to my hotel in Stockholm. It was very late and I really wanted to go because I'd been sitting in his flat for a long time. And he said I'll follow you home and I said no, you don't have to. Then suddenly it was a wonderful, wonderful walk. We didn't say much. We went by a church where his father had been a preacher and it wasn't so much what he said, and it wasn't sex at all, but it was the same intimacy as sex, the way we were walking that night. And he was moved and I was moved because we hadn't been walking in the street in the dark alone for 30 years since we'd been lovers."

Amazon - from Ullmann's Changing: 'I am a woman- a single career woman with a child. My life has been filled with all a human being can expect- and much more. I have loved and been loved. I have known pain and sorrow, but also happiness far greater than I ever dreamed of as a young girl. I have never been hungry: only at certain times did I have to count my money to see whether I could afford butter instead of margarine. Sometimes I am happy and wake up in the morning an smile at a man I have the peace to love. I am constantly living in a state of change, although deep inside I am a "young girl who refuses to die." We who are alive at this moment are only an infinitesimal part of something that has existed for eternity and will continue when there is no longer anything to show that earth existed. Still we must feel and believe that we are all. That is our responsibility - not only to ourselves but to everything and everyone with which we share our time here. What is change? Is it something that happens inside me? Or is it something I experience in other people? What I am striving for? To become the best possible human being? Or the best artist? What do I really want to do with what I have achieved? What will I do with change? Maybe it isn't so important to know. Maybe it's isn't so important to arrive.'

Liv Johanne Ullmann (born 16 December 1938) is a Norwegian actress and film director. She is known as one of the "muses" of Swedish director Ingmar Bergman. Ullmann won a Golden Globe Award for Best Actress – Motion Picture Drama in 1972 for the film The Emigrants (1971), and has been nominated for another four. In 2000, she was nominated for the Palme d'Or for her second directorial feature film, Faithless. She has also received two BAFTA Award nominations for her performances in Scenes from a Marriage (1973) and Face to Face (1976), and two Academy Award nominations for The Emigrants and Face to Face. Ullmann began her acting career as a stage actress in Norway during the mid-1950s. She continued to act in theatre for most of her career, and became noted for her portrayal of Nora in Henrik Ibsen's play A Doll's House, but became better known once she started to work with Swedish movie director Ingmar Bergman. She later acted, with acclaim, for 10 of his most-admired movies, including Persona (1966), The Passion of Anna (1969), Cries and Whispers (1972) and Autumn Sonata (1978), in which her co-actress, Ingrid Bergman, resumed her Swedish cinema career. She co-acted often with Swedish actor and fellow Bergman collaborator, Erland Josephson, with whom she made the Swedish television drama, Scenes from a Marriage (1973), which was also edited to feature-movie length and distributed theatrically. Ullmann acted with Laurence Olivier in A Bridge Too Far (1977), directed by Richard Attenborough.

Nominated more than 40 times for awards, including various lifetime achievement awards, she won the best actress prize three times from the National Society of Film Critics, three times from the National Board of Review, received three awards from the New York Film Critics Circle and a Golden Globe. During 1971, Ullmann was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Actress for the movie The Emigrants, and again during 1976 for the movie Face to Face. Ullmann made her New York City stage debut in 1975 also in A Doll's House. Appearances in "Anna Christie" and Ghosts followed, as well as the less than successful musical version of I Remember Mama. This show, composed by Richard Rodgers, experienced numerous revisions during a long preview period, then closed after 108 performances. She also featured in the widely deprecated musical movie remake of Lost Horizon during 1973. In 1980 Brian De Palma, who directed Carrie, wanted Liv Ullmann to play the role as Kate Miller in the erotic crime thriller Dressed to Kill and offered her the role, but she declined because of the violence. The role then went on to Angie Dickinson. In 1982 Ingmar Bergman wanted Ullmann to play the main role as Emelie Ekdahl in his last feature film, Fanny and Alexander, and wrote this role for her with this in mind. But Ullmann felt this role was too sad and declined. Liv Ullmann later stated in interviews that turning down the role was one of the few things she really regrets.

During 1984 she was chairperson of the jury at the 34th Berlin International Film Festival, and during 2002 chaired the jury of Cannes Film Festival. She introduced her daughter, Linn Ullmann, to the audience with the words: "Here comes the woman whom Ingmar Bergman loves the most". Her daughter was there to receive the Prize of Honour on behalf of her father; she would return to serve the jury herself during 2011. In 2003 Ullmann reprised her role for Scenes from a Marriage in Saraband (2003), Bergman's final telemovie. This was her comeback as an actress since her last role on the screen, in the Swedish movie Zorn (1994). Ullmann narrated the Canada–Norway co-produced animated short movie The Danish Poet (2006), which won the Academy Award for Animated Short Film at the 79th Academy Awards during 2007. In 2008 she was the head of the jury at the 30th Moscow International Film Festival. She published two autobiographies, Changing (1977) and Choices (1984). During 2012, she attended the International Indian Film Academy Awards in Singapore, where she was honored for her Outstanding Contributions to International Cinema and she also showed her movie on her relationship with Ingmar Bergman.

Ullmann's first film as a director was Sofie (1992), in which she directed her friend and former co-actor, Erland Josephson. She later directed the Bergman-composed movie Faithless (2000). Faithless garnered nominations for both the Palme d'Or and Best Actress at the Cannes Film Festival. During 2006 Ullmann announced that she had been forced to end her longtime wish of making a film based on A Doll's House. According to her statement, the Norwegian Film Fund was preventing her and writer Kjetil Bjørnstad from pursuing the project. Australian actress Cate Blanchett and British actress Kate Winslet had been cast intended in the main roles of the movie. She later directed Blanchett in the play A Streetcar Named Desire, by Tennessee Williams, at the Sydney Theatre Company in Sydney, Australia, which was performed September through October 2009, and then continued from 29 October to 21 November 2009 at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C., where it won a Helen Hayes Award for Outstanding Non-resident Production as well as actress and supporting performer for 2009. The play was also performed at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in Brooklyn, New York. In 2013 it was announced that Ullmann would direct a film adaptation of Miss Julie. The film, released in 2014, stars Jessica Chastain, Colin Farrell and Samantha Morton. It was widely praised by the Norwegian press after its premiere in September 2014.

GEORGE SAND – BIOGRAPHIES BY JOSEPH BARRY AND ANDRE MAUROIS

Is there a special category of writing – women writing? And who are the women who would be included in this category? George Sand, JK Rowling, Mme. de la Fayette, Simone de Beauvoir, Jane Austen, Virginia Woolf, George Eliot, Vicki Baum, Emily Bronte, Charlotte Bronte, Isabel Allende, Ronit Matalon? I, personally don't think that the writing by women is different from men's writing, in my cosmopolitan belief I wouldn't say even that there is a material difference between writing by Russian, French, Spanish, English or German authors. Of course, authors tend to write on subjects that they know most, but if you read Daniel Deronda or The Mill on the Floss would you know that they were written by a woman – George Eliot? Are the Bronte's sisters novels feminine in any way? And what about Harry Potter if you didn't know that it was written by a woman would you guess that? Some of the writings by Simone de Beauvoir are feminine, The Second Sex probably but not The Mandarins. George Sand's novels are very good, not excellent maybe as Balzac's or Zola's, but interesting and well written. However, what attracted me most was George Sand's personality, her life, her philosophy of life, her independence. She did not behave manly as people often write, she behaved independently, as only men behaved in the 19th century, but as women behave today so often. She managed her own life and did not rely on her husband or her lovers, she stayed with them as long as she loved them and she left them when she wanted to be free. I have read two biographies, many of her books, her correspondence with Alfred de Musset, I have seen many films on her life, and I believe that I can judge her personality quite well. She was "feminine" – good, considerate, caring, loving, but so can also be men – not machos but many men of today. And she did not care what society will say and how she will be judged, which is exactly like I believe a man or a woman should do – he should chose his own way regardless of the society's norms. She cared for the poors in an aristocratic society, she was intellectual and associated with some of the best authors and composers of her century, reminding us of Alma Mahler's life, but Sand was much more independent, she was a prominent author, and although she was ostracized by part of the society she had her own friends, and that is exactly like I did – telling overtly what is wrong in my society, in the business life, writing and teaching it, and yet I never missed friends, as I have now more friends than I ever had before. Ultimately, society respects independent persons – men or women, and George Sand was respected by her contemporaries, she was the precursor of women's independence, I would not say feminism, as she had a humane category of her own.

Amantine-Lucile-Aurore Dupin (1 July 1804 – 8 June 1876), best known by her pseudonym George Sand, was a French novelist and memoirist. She is equally well known for her much publicized romantic affairs with a number of artists, including the composer and pianist Frédéric Chopin and the writer Alfred de Musset. Sand wrote: "My name is not Marie-Aurore de Saxe, Marquise of Dudevant, as several of my biographers have asserted, but Amantine-Lucile-Aurore Dupin, and my husband, M. François Dudevant, claims no title: the highest rank he ever reached was that of infantry second lieutenant." Always known simply as "Aurore" she was born in Paris, but raised for much of her childhood by her grandmother, Marie-Aurore de Saxe, Madame Dupin de Francueil, at her grandmother's estate, Nohant, in the French province of Berry (see House of George Sand). Sand later used the setting in many of her novels. It has been said that her upbringing was quite liberal. Her father, Maurice Dupin, was the grandson of the Marshal General of France, Maurice, Comte de Saxe, an illegitimate son of Augustus II the Strong, King of Poland and a Saxon elector, and a cousin to the sixth degree to the kings of France Louis XVI, Louis XVIII and Charles X. Sand's mother, Sophie-Victoire Delaborde, was a commoner.

In 1822, at the age of 18, Sand married Casimir Dudevant (1795–1871), illegitimate son of Baron Jean-François Dudevant. She and Dudevant had two children: Maurice (1823–1889) and Solange (1828–1899). In early 1831, she left her husband and entered upon a four- or five-year period of "romantic rebellion." In 1835, she was legally separated from Dudevant and took her children with her. Sand conducted affairs of varying duration with Jules Sandeau (1831), Prosper Mérimée, Alfred de Musset (summer 1833 – March 1835), Louis-Chrysostome Michel, Pierre-François Bocage, Félicien Mallefille, Louis Blanc, and Frédéric Chopin (1837–1847). Later in life, she corresponded with Gustave Flaubert. Despite their obvious differences in temperament and aesthetic preference, they eventually became close friends. She engaged in an intimate friendship with actress Marie Dorval, which led to widespread but unconfirmed rumours of a lesbian affair. Letters written by Sand to Dorval made such references as "wanting you either in your dressing room or in your bed." Sand was also known for her implication and writings during the Paris Commune, where she took a position for the Versailles assembly against the "communards", urging them to take violent action against the "rebels".

A liaison with the writer Jules Sandeau heralded her literary debut. They published a few stories in collaboration, signing them "Jules Sand". Her first published novel, Rose et Blanche (1831), was written in collaboration with Sandeau. She subsequently adopted, for her first independent novel, Indiana (1832), the pen name that made her famous – George Sand. Drawing from her childhood experiences of the countryside, she wrote the pastoral novels La Mare au Diable (1846), François le Champi (1847–1848), La Petite Fadette (1849), and Les Beaux Messieurs Bois-Doré (1857). A Winter in Majorca described the period that she and Chopin spent on that island from 1838 to 1839. Her other novels include Indiana (1832), Lélia (1833), Mauprat (1837), Le Compagnon du Tour de France (1840), Consuelo (1842–1843), and Le Meunier d'Angibault (1845). Theatre pieces and autobiographical pieces include Histoire de ma vie (1855), Elle et Lui (1859, about her affair with Musset), Journal Intime (posthumously published in 1926), and Correspondence. Sand often performed her theatrical works in her small private theatre at the Nohant estate. In addition, Sand authored literary criticism and political texts. She wrote many essays and published works establishing her socialist position. Because of her early life, she sided with the poor and working class as well as women's rights. When the 1848 Revolution began, Sand started her own newspaper, which was published in a workers' co-operative. This allowed her to publish more political essays. She wrote: "I cannot believe in any republic that starts a revolution by killing its own proletariat." She was known well in far reaches of the world, and her social practices, her writings and her beliefs prompted much commentary, often by other luminaries in the world of arts and letters. A few excerpts demonstrate much of what was often said about George Sand: What a brave man she was, and what a good woman — Ivan Turgenev, The most womanly woman — Alfred de Musset, The most widely used quote of her own is: "There is only one happiness in life, to love and be loved." George Sand died at Nohant, near Châteauroux, in France's Indre département on 8 June 1876, at the age of 71 and was buried in the grounds of her home there. In 2003, plans that her remains be moved to the Panthéon in Paris resulted in controversy.

Sand's reputation came into question when she began sporting men's clothing in public, which she justified by the clothes being far sturdier and less expensive than the typical dress of a noblewoman at the time. In addition to being comfortable, Sand's male dress enabled her to circulate more freely in Paris than most of her female contemporaries, and gave her increased access to venues from which women were often barred, even women of her social standing. Also scandalous was Sand's smoking tobacco in public; neither peerage nor gentry had yet sanctioned the free indulgence of women in such a habit, especially in public (though Franz Liszt's paramour Marie d'Agoult smoked large cigars). These and other behaviors were exceptional for a woman of the early and mid-19th century, when social codes — especially in the upper classes — were of the utmost importance. As a consequence of many unorthodox aspects of her lifestyle, Sand was obliged to relinquish some of the privileges appertaining to a baroness, though the mores of the period did permit upper-class wives to live physically separate from their husbands, without losing face, provided the estranged couple exhibited no blatant irregularity to the outside world. Poet Charles Baudelaire was a contemporary critic of George Sand: "She is stupid, heavy and garrulous. Her ideas on morals have the same depth of judgment and delicacy of feeling as those of janitresses and kept women ... The fact that there are men who could become enamoured of this slut is indeed a proof of the abasement of the men of this generation." Other writers of the period, however, differed in their assessment. Flaubert, by no means an indulgent or forbearing critic, was an unabashed admirer. Honoré de Balzac, who knew Sand personally, once said that if someone thought George Sand wrote badly, it was because their own standards of criticism were inadequate. He also noted that her treatment of imagery in her works showed that her writing had an exceptional subtlety, having the ability to "virtually put the image in the word". George Sand's life was filmed extensively in the following films:

- A Song to Remember (1945), directed by Charles Vidor, starring Merle Oberon as George Sand and Cornel Wilde as Chopin.
- Song Without End (1960), also directed by Vidor (who died during production and direction was assumed by George Cukor), in which Dirk Bogarde starred as Franz Liszt; Patricia Morison played a cameo role as George Sand
- Notorious Woman (1974), a seven-part BBC miniseries starring Rosemary Harris as George Sand and George Chakiris as Chopin.
- Impromptu (1991), starring Judy Davis as George Sand and Hugh Grant as Chopin.
- Les Enfants du siècle (1999), starring Juliette Binoche as George Sand and Benoît Magimel as Alfred de Musset
- Chopin (2002), directed by Jerzy Antczak starring Danuta Stenka as George Sand and Piotr Adamczyk as Chopin.
- Sand... George en mal d'Aurore (2003), TV, directed by Françoise-Renée Jamet and Laurent Marocco, with the voice of Lambert Wilson

Review on Maurois' biography – Lelia ou la vie de George Sand, by Ludmila on March 1, 2003:

Andre Maurois has great esteem for George Sand (the "nom de plume" of Aurore Dupin de Dudevant), which he eloquently manifests in his biography of the great literary heroine of 19th Century France. I have been an avid fanatic of Madame Sand for quite a while, having read many of her novels (she was incredibly prolific, and so it must take many more years than the 25 which I have thus lived to read her entire oeuvre), as well as several biographies written about her. I read her "Histoire de Ma Vie" ("Story of My Life") a couple of years ago, for an Independent Study I was conducting during my years as an undergraduate, and I was absolutely fascinated by her life and her spirit, which she manifested in her novels. She led a life which many of her contemporaries considered "depraved," yet she always lived fearlessly and emotionally, according to her own inclinations and heart ("Never fear when your heart tells you what to do. . . the heart can never be wrong," she once wrote). I picked up Maurois' biography on George Sand recently, and I devoured it in a matter of days. His approach and style is somewhat antiquated (he wrote this book in the 50's, after all), but he nevertheless seems to have an uncanny understanding of Sand's life and ideas. I highly recommend his biography to anyone who is not too acquainted with Sand or her writings, but for the true Sand aficionado, I suggest that he or she read her autobiography before Maurois' biography. After all, who is most entitled and prepared to speak about her own life than Sand herself? Nevertheless, Maurois has written a good and thorough account of Sand's life. It is not one of those most commendable biographies, in which the reader believes that the writer must have known his or her subject personally, but it is a solid account of Sand's life, regardless. Although Maurois holds George Sand in high regard, he is not biased in his opinions regarding the authoress. . . in fact, at times he almost seems to pass judgement regarding her chaotic lifestyle and her tumultuous liaisons. For example, he portrays De Musset as more of a victim of Sand's indiscretions (her affair with the doctor who sought to cure De Musset of his infirmities, for example), than his own penchant for a life of debauchery. I would not go so far as to proclaim that Maurois is sexist, but he does seem, at times, to allow more liberties to the men in Sand's life than he does to Sand herself. He sometimes depicts Sand as a sort of vampiress, who devours her male counterparts, while seemingly disregarding their own vices. Sand had a few jilted lovers, yes, but she too was wounded in several romantic liaisons. Nevertheless, and in summary, Maurois renders a pretty accurate portrait of George Sand, which will surely inspire the reader to learn more about this fascinating and mysterious author, truly so far ahead of her time. . . George Sand lived the sort of life, both as a woman and as an artist, which was not generally not embraced during her lifetime. She paved a literary path for future female writers, such as Colette, Virginia Woolf, and Jane Austen, among countless others, who have carried on her legacy. . . Maurois acknowledges such, if we read between the lines. Well, it was not his intent to present his readers with a literary feminist treatise, but he wrote a really good biography about a woman who would influence future female authors to follow her example. . .

King's College – George Sand

In French Literature, the Enlightenment period, which sparked intellectual energies of the nation towards changes and reform was followed by the Romantic Movement which correlated with the return of the French Monarchy in 1815. During this period there was a conflict between revolutionary and reactionary thinking which was reflected in literature, and a radical, revolutionary female writer would emerge, George Sand. Sand would question the social norms that had entrapped women in specific gender roles and lifestyles. Controversy would follow this novelist and early feminist as she would attempt to live a lifestyle similar to the successful men in French society. Sometimes dressed as a man, seeking a writing career that would produce groundbreaking literature and financial stability, Sand would put to question all previously held notions of female independence. George Sand was raised for much of her childhood by her grandmother at the family estate, Nohant, in the French region of Berry, a setting used in many of her novels. There she would learn to read, write, play the piano, and ride horses. Sand was born Amandine Aurore Lucile Dupin in Paris to a father of aristocratic lineage and a common mother. Her father was Maurice Dupin, a retired lieutenant in the army of the republic and her mother was Sophie Delaborde, the daughter of a Paris bird fancier. Their marriage took place only a month before the birth of their child. In 1822, she married a baron, Cisimir Dudevant, who was the son of Baron Dudevant. For the first few years of their marriage Sand and her husband enjoyed a tranquil relationship living on the estate she had inherited from her grandmother, raising their two children, her son Maurice born in 1823, and her daughter Solange born in 1828. This peaceful existence between husband and wife ended after she found Cisimir's will, which contained all of his complaints about their marriage. In 1831, Sand and her husband came to an amicable separation by which her whole estate was surrendered to her husband with the stipulation that she should receive an allowance each year. With the end of her marriage she gained freedom and made no secret of her intention to use it to its fullest advantage.

After separating from her husband, Sand moved to Paris and publicly showcased her preference of wearing men's clothing, although she continued to dress as a woman for social occasions.

This male wardrobe enabled her to circulate more freely about Paris and increased her access to social venues that were usually denied to a woman of her social standing. Sand did not stop at dressing like a man, she began smoking cigars and would engage in numerous love affairs the way most famous men had done. After arriving in Paris, Sand started to write for Le Figaro, contributing Revue des Deux Mondes and La Republique and she was co-editor of Revue Indépendante. During this time in Paris, Sand would begin to associate with many artists, poets, philosophers and politicians. One such acquaintance, the writer Jules Sandeau would become her lover, and they would co-write a novel, Rose Et Blanche, under the pseudonym Jules Sand. As their relationship began to dissolve, Sand wrote Indiana by herself and used the pseudonym George Sand. Indiana, a story about a naïve abused love starved woman led to widespread critical attention and immediate fame. Sand immediately followed it with two novels Valentine and Leilia. Sand's own romantic life led to accusations of lesbianism and nymphomania due to her affairs with well known celebrities. She had passionate affairs with the poet Alfred de Musset, Franz Liszt, and the composer Frederic Chopin. The one documented affair Sand had with a woman did cause a scandal in Paris. She became lovers with Marie Dorval an admired actress, but this romance quickly subdued and they remained close friends, as Sand did with many of her former lovers. George Sand was a prolific writer who expressed a deep concern for human problems and strong feminist ideals. Sand would write over seventy novels, twenty four plays, ten volumes of autobiography, essays, book reviews, political pamphlets, and an estimated forty- thousand letters of which twenty-two thousand have been printed. Sand was one of the most widely read novelists of her time and she inspired many authors such as Walt Whitman, but at the same time was denounced by the Vatican which repeatedly put her novels on the list that no good Catholic should read. George Sand died on June 8, 1876 from intestinal cancer at her family's estate at Nohant surrounded by her children and grandchildren.

In terms of historical impact, George Sand's writing continues to appeal to audiences worldwide, specifically those in the feminist movement, who identify with her resolute determination to succeed both socially and economically as men have. An example of Sand's appeal is the George Sand Society, which is a cigar smoking women's club with chapters in New York and Los Angeles. In today's society, George Sand would not seem as out of place as she did in her own time. George Sand stood out in 19th century Europe by being a pants-wearing, economically independent woman, seeking romance; but this persona has become an acceptable part of the social norm for a single female in most of today's world. Although George Sand may not have the mainstream public appeal of a Jane Austen, she relates more to most of today's females than any other author of the 19th century.

The Life of George Sand, by Joseph Barry, comments by André Bandeira

Joseph Barry arrived in Paris, in 1945, with the American troops and never left. He fell in love with a woman, who was a man, who was credited to be an «homosexual», and who was dead for a long time, when he arrived, despite Victor Hugo phrasing at her burial that « she died, and she became immortal». What strikes me most in this biography, that is its honesty. The author gets carried away by the impetus of George Sand, but he doesn't pretend to make a romantic biography in the style of George Sand, Aurore Dupin. He just admires the character - probably he shoulders the crush that George Sand has imprinted in his foreign invader's heart - and then, he describes the case the best he can. The result is a very good one, which, I would say, seems to be enough for having an updated knowledge of her, beyond the snapshots of the modern totalitarian media. Who was George Sand, after all, in this biographer's perspective? George Sand appears to be an unpleasant typhoon of selfishness till the very end, when the time comes for her to disclose her soul. She dies, probably with stomach cancer, in terrible pain, counting one by one, her grand-children, after spending her final days, playing and tutoring each of them as a very classical grandmother would do, and rushing away from the time she lost being other things.

But it is not only George Sand who died with cancer. The whole France, which shot down 25.000 Paris communards, against the «Wall of the Federated», in Père Lachaise's cemetery, died with cancer, too. How could George Sand not sympathize with the miserable being killed by the different revolution crushers, in the streets of Paris? She was a descendent of Maurice of Saxe, a privileged woman in education and wealth, despite all the miseries in her personal conduct. She had no paradise on earth, but she could see outcasts who didn't even have the right to be in hell. How could she see otherwise? She saved four republican soldiers of being shot, after intervening by the side of Louis Napoléon. She saved other people, everyone who asked for her help, in face of imminent death. As an aristocrat she could indulge in the luxury of choosing the position of libertarian socialism, to be extracted gradually from democracy, as a picknick party among young lords, in Spring. She could imagine whatever, and figure it out as a political position. She even could write about it and stop the show, distracting, for moments, the real Destiny brokers, and even rescue from their claws, a few miserable ones. But she couldn't be one of them. So, what to do, when one cannot fill a never plenishable hole? Maybe compensate on the opposite side, the brute forces which loom on one side. Jesus didn't come for the virtuous. He came for the sinners. And this sinner, George Sand, was saved since the beginning of Times.

EMILE ZOLA – BIOGRAPHIES BY HENRI TROYAT, DENISE LE BLOND-ZOLA, HENRI MITTERAND

Emile Zola is my favorite author and dozens of pages in this book were written or quoted on Emile Zola, his life, his books, my commentaries, others' commentaries, Wikipedia entry, and so on. In this chapter I prefer to quote from the Encyclopedia Britannica's entry on Emile Zola. But I'll bring also entries on the biographers of Zola, mainly Henri Mitterand and Henri Troyat. Since this book deals extensively on biographies I'll expand on the life of Henri Troyat, his works, and his biographies. Troyat was THE BIOGRAPHER – the most renowned biographer, and I'll bring a long list on his biographies. I have also read many biographies by Troyat, who is with Andre Maurois my favorite biographer, both of them are French, both of them make us read the biographies as novels, identify with the personalities, understand the psychological motives.

Encyclopedia Britannica, Article written by: William J. Berg:

Émile Zola, in full Émile-Édouard-Charles-Antoine Zola (born April 2, 1840, Paris, died September 28, 1902, Paris), French novelist, critic, and political activist who was the most prominent French novelist of the late 19th century. He was noted for his theories of naturalism, which underlie his monumental 20-novel series Les Rougon-Macquart, and for his intervention in the Dreyfus Affair through his famous open letter, "J'accuse." Though born in Paris in 1840, Zola spent his youth in Aix-en-Provence in southern France, where his father, a civil engineer of Italian descent, was involved in the construction of a municipal water system. The senior Zola died in 1847, leaving Madame Zola and her young son in dire financial straits. In Aix, Zola was a schoolmate of the painter Paul Cézanne, who would later join him in Paris and introduce him to Édouard Manet and the Impressionist painters. Although Zola completed his schooling at the Lycée Saint-Louis in Paris, he twice failed the baccalauréat exam, which was a prerequisite to further studies, and in 1859 he was forced to seek gainful employment. Zola spent most of the next two years unemployed and living in abject poverty. He subsisted by pawning his few belongings and, according to legend, by eating sparrows trapped outside his attic window. Finally, in 1862 he was hired as a clerk at the publishing firm of Hachette, where he was later promoted to the advertising department. To supplement his income and make his mark in the world of letters, Zola began to write articles on subjects of current interest for various periodicals; he also continued to write fiction, a pastime he had enjoyed since boyhood. In 1865 Zola published his first novel, La Confession de Claude, a sordid, semiautobiographical tale that drew the attention of the public and the police and incurred the disapproval of Zola's employer. Having sufficiently established his reputation as a writer to support himself and his mother, albeit meagerly, as a freelance journalist, Zola left his job at Hachette to pursue his literary interests. (I often wonder what beneficiary are the hardships of a person, if Zola had not fail his exams he would have become a mediocre lawyer, because of his hardships and poverty he acquired the social consciousness, because his father was Italian he was sensitive to Dreyfus).

In the following years Zola continued his career in journalism while publishing two novels: Thérèse Raquin (1867), a grisly tale of murder and its aftermath that is still widely read, and Madeleine Féral (1868), a rather unsuccessful attempt at applying the principles of heredity to the novel. It was this interest in science that led Zola, in the fall of 1868, to conceive the idea of a large-scale series of novels similar to Honoré de Balzac's La Comédie humaine (The Human Comedy), which had appeared earlier in the century. Zola's project, originally involving 10 novels, each featuring a different member of the same family, was gradually expanded to comprise the 20 volumes of the Rougon-Macquart series. La Fortune des Rougon (The Rougon Family Fortune), the first novel in the series, began to appear in serial form in 1870, was interrupted by the outbreak of the Franco-German War in July, and was eventually published in book form in October 1871. Zola went on to produce these 20 novels—most of which are of substantial length—at the rate of nearly one per year, completing the series in 1893. In the 1860s and '70s Zola also defended the art of Cézanne, Manet, and the Impressionists Claude Monet, Edgar Degas, and Pierre-Auguste Renoir in newspaper articles. During this period he was a constant presence at weekly gatherings of the painters at various studios and cafés, where theories about the arts and their potential interrelationships were vociferously debated. Zola's friendship with Cézanne and the other artists was, however, irreparably damaged by the publication of his novel L'Oeuvre (1886; The Masterpiece), which depicts the life of an innovative painter who, unable to realize his creative potential, ends up hanging himself in front of his final painting. Cézanne, in particular, chose to see the novel as a thinly disguised commentary on his own temperament and talent. (Having read of course L'Oeuvre I cannot understand why Cezanne was offended, as the painter in the novel has a life of his own, Cezanne was able to realize his creative potential and would never have thought of committing suicide).

In 1870 Zola married Gabrielle-Alexandrine Meley, who had been his companion and lover for almost five years, and the young couple assumed the care of Zola's mother. In the early '70s Zola expanded his literary contacts, meeting frequently with Gustave Flaubert, Edmond Goncourt, Alphonse Daudet, and Ivan Turgenev, all successful novelists whose failures in the theatre led them to humorously refer to themselves as auteurs sifflés ("hissed authors"). Beginning in 1878 the Zola home in Médan, on the Seine River not far from Paris, served as a gathering spot for a group of the novelist's disciples, the best-known of whom were Guy de Maupassant and Joris-Karl Huysmans, and together they published a collection of short stories, Les Soirées de Médan (1880; Evenings at Médan). As the founder and most celebrated member of the naturalist movement, Zola published several treatises to explain his theories on art, including Le Roman expérimental (1880; The Experimental Novel) and Les Romanciers naturalistes (1881). Naturalism involves the application to literature of two scientific principles: determinism, or the belief that character, temperament, and, ultimately, behaviour are determined by the forces of heredity, environment, and historical moment; and the experimental method, which entails the objective recording of precise data in controlled conditions. If Zola's penchant for polemics and publicity led him to exaggerate his naturalist principles in his early writings, in later years, it can be said, rather, that controversy sought out the reluctant novelist. His publication of a particularly grim and sordid portrait of peasant life in La Terre in 1887 led a group of five so-called disciples to repudiate Zola in a manifesto published in the important newspaper Le Figaro. His novel La Débâcle (1892), which was openly critical of the French army and government actions during the Franco-German War (1870–71), drew vitriolic criticism from French and Germans alike. Despite Zola's undisputed prominence, he was never elected to the French Academy, although he was nominated on no fewer than 19 occasions. Although Zola's marriage to Alexandrine endured until his death, the author had a fourteen-year affair with Jeanne Rozerot, one of his wife's housemaids, beginning in 1888. Jeanne bore him his only children: Denise & Jacques, who were "recognized" by Madame Zola after her husband's death.

In 1898 Zola intervened in the Dreyfus Affair—that of a Jewish French army officer, Alfred Dreyfus, whose wrongful conviction for treason in 1894 sparked a 12-year controversy that deeply divided French society. At an early stage in the proceedings Zola had decided rightly that Dreyfus was innocent. On January 13, 1898, in the newspaper L'Aurore, Zola published a fierce denunciation of the French general staff in an open letter beginning with the words "J'accuse" ("I accuse"). He charged various high-ranking military officers and, indeed, the War Office itself of concealing the truth in the wrongful conviction of Dreyfus for espionage. Zola was prosecuted for libel and found guilty. In July 1899, when his appeal appeared certain to fail, he fled to England. He returned to France the following June when he learned that the Dreyfus case was to be reopened with a possible reversal of the original verdict. Zola's intervention in the controversy helped to undermine anti-Semitism and rabid militarism in France. (Zola, although he was an excellent writer, gained immortality because of the Dreyfus Affair, he was the conscience of France, as 42 years later De Gaulle was France's conscience in fighting a similar ultra-conservative regime of Petain, whose supporters deported the Jews to the death camps).

Zola's final series of novels, Les Trois Villes (1894–98; The Three Cities) and Les Quatre Évangiles (1899–1903; The Four Gospels), are generally conceded to be far less forceful than his earlier work. However, the titles of the novels in the latter series reveal the values that underlay his entire life and work: Fécondité (1899; Fecundity), Travail (1901; Work), Vérité (1903; Truth), and Justice (which, ironically, remained incomplete). Zola died unexpectedly in September 1902, the victim of coal gas asphyxiation resulting from a blocked chimney flue. Officially, the event was determined to be a tragic accident, but there were—and still are—those who believe that fanatical anti-Dreyfusards arranged to have the chimney blocked. At the time of his death, Zola was recognized not only as one of the greatest novelists in Europe but also as a man of action—a defender of truth and justice, a champion of the poor and the persecuted. At his funeral he was eulogized by Anatole France as having been not just a great man, but "a moment in the human conscience," and crowds of mourners, prominent and poor alike, lined the streets to salute the passing casket. In 1908 Zola's remains were transferred to the Panthéon and placed alongside those of Voltaire, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and Victor Hugo, other French authors whose works and deeds, like those of Zola, had changed the course of French history.

Although he produced some 60 volumes of fiction, theory, and criticism, in addition to numerous pieces of journalism, during his 40-year career, Zola is best known for his 20-volume series Les Rougon-Macquart, which is "the natural and social history of a family under the Second Empire." As the subtitle suggests, the naturalist goal of demonstrating the deterministic influence of heredity is fulfilled by tracing the lives of various members of the three branches of the Rougon-Macquart family. At the same time, the weight of historical moment is shown by limiting the action of the novels to one historical period, that of the Second Empire (1852–70), which was the reign of Napoleon III, the nephew and pale imitation of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Finally, Zola examines the impact of environment by varying the social, economic, and professional milieu in which each novel takes place. La Curée (1872; The Kill), for example, explores the land speculation and financial dealings that accompanied the renovation of Paris during the Second Empire. Le Ventre de Paris (1873; The Belly of Paris) examines the structure of the Halles, the vast central market-place of Paris, and its influence on the lives of its workers. The 10 steel pavilions that make up the market are compared alternately to a machine, a palace, and an entire city, thereby situating the market within a broader social framework. Son Excellence Eugène Rougon (1876; His Excellency Eugène Rougon) traces the machinations and maneuverings of cabinet officials in Napoleon III's government. L'Assommoir (1877; "The Club"; Eng. trans. The Drunkard), which is among the most successful and enduringly popular of Zola's novels, shows the effects of alcoholism in a working-class neighbourhood by focusing on the rise and decline of a laundress, Gervaise Macquart. Zola's use of slang, not only by the characters but by the narrator, and his vivid paintings of crowds in motion lend authenticity and power to his portrait of the working class. Nana (1880) follows the life of Gervaise's daughter as her economic circumstances and hereditary pendants lead her to a career as an actress, then a courtesan, professions underscored by a theatrical metaphor that extends throughout the novel, revealing the ceremonial falseness of the Second Empire. Au Bonheur des Dames (1883; Ladies' Delight) depicts the mechanisms of a new economic entity, the department store, and its impact on smaller merchants. The sweeping descriptions of crowds and dry-goods displays justify Zola's characterization of the novel as "a poem of modern activity."

Germinal (1885), which is generally acknowledged to be Zola's masterpiece, depicts life in a mining community by highlighting relations between the bourgeoisie and the working class. At the same time, the novel weighs the events of a miners' strike and its aftermath in terms of those contemporary political movements (Marxism, anarchism, trade unionism) that purport to deal with the problems of the proletariat. Zola's comparison of the coal mine to a devouring monster and his use of animal and botanical imagery to characterize the workers create a novel of epic scope that replicates, in modern terms, ancient myths of damnation and resurrection. A quite different work, L'Oeuvre (1886), explores the milieu of the art world and the interrelationship of the arts by means of the friendship between an Impressionist painter, Claude Lantier, and a naturalist novelist, Pierre Sandoz. Zola's verbal style mirrors the visual techniques of Impressionism in word-pictures of Paris transformed by varying effects of colour, light, and atmosphere. In La Terre (1887; Earth) Zola breaks with the tradition of rustic, pastoral depictions of peasant life to show what he considered to be the sordid lust for land among the French peasantry. In La Bête humaine (1890; The Human Beast) he analyzes the hereditary urge to kill that haunts the Lantier branch of the family, set against the background of the French railway system, with its powerful machinery and rapid movement. La Débâcle (1892; The Debacle) traces both the defeat of the French army by the Germans at the Battle of Sedan in 1870 and the anarchist uprising of the Paris Commune. Zola superimposes the viewpoints of numerous characters to capture the vividness of individual vision while at the same time obtaining an overall strategic sense of the war. Finally, in Le Docteur Pascal (1893) he uses the main character, the doctor Pascal Rougon, armed with a genealogical tree of the Rougon-Macquart family published with the novel, to expound the theories of heredity underlying the entire series. The Rougon-Macquart series thus constitutes a fictional family saga while providing a valuable sociological document of the events, institutions, and ideas that marked the rise of modern industrialism and the cultural changes it entailed. However, what popularity the novels maintain today is largely due to Zola's unique artistry, a poetry of machine and motion, vitalized by the individual viewpoint, yet structured by vast networks of imagery that capture the intense activity and alienation of modern industrial society. Zola's novels had an immense impact on Western literature of the 20th century, from the existentialist novel and the New Novel in France to the works of the muckrakers in the United States. In their striking combination of visuality and movement, Zola's novels can even be said to foreshadow the motion picture, for which they have proved admirably suited for adaptation; the pioneering version of La Bête humaine by Jean Renoir in 1938 and a big-budget rendition of Germinal by Claude Berri in 1993 are two examples. Above all, Zola's writings endure on account of his forthright portrayal of social injustice, his staunch defence of the downtrodden, and his unwavering belief in the betterment of the human condition through individual and collective action.

Henri Mitterand, a former fellow of the Ecole normale supérieure, agrégé de l'Université, docteur ès lettres (1969), Professor Emeritus at the Sorbonne Nouvelle, Professor Emeritus of French at Columbia, has edited the five volumes of Zola's Rougon-Macquart in the "Bibliothèque de la Pléiade" (éditions Gallimard) and also the fifteen volumes of Zola's Oeuvres complètes with Cercle du Livre précieux, Paris. He served as literary advisor for the publication of Zola's Correspondance, in ten volumes (Editions du CNRS and Presses de l'Université de Montréal). Mitterand is also the author of many books on Émile Zola and other 19th and 20th-century novelists as well as on broad issues such as the novel as a literary genre (Zola et le naturalisme, Zola, l'Histoire et la fiction, Le Discours du roman, Le Regard et le Signe, L'Illusion réaliste, Le Roman à l'oeuvre). In addition, he has published more than two hundred articles on literature and linguistics. He recently published a three-volume monumental biography of Zola (Paris, éditions Fayard: Grand Prize of the City of Paris, 2000; Prize for Literary Biography, Académie française, 2003). Mitterand is the founder of the Center for Research on Zola and Naturalism (Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique). He is the director of the new chronological edition of Zola's Oeuvres complètes (20 volumes, Nouveau Monde Editions, Paris; 10 volumes already published), and he is currently working on a book on Espace Romanesque. Mitterand is a Chevalier of the French Legion of Honor, a Commander in the French Order of Arts and Letters, and a Member of the Royal Society of Canada. He is the President of the Société littéraire des amis d'Emile Zola. (I do hope to finish reading Mitterand's monumental biography of Zola, which I read with sheer delight, but as I read in parallel other books in many languages, and write my own autobiography, I don't know when I'll finish it).

Henri Troyat (1 November 1911 – 2 March 2007) was a Russian-born French author, biographer, historian and novelist. Troyat was born Lev Aslanovich Tarasov, (Russian: Лев Асланович Тарасов, Lev Aslanovich Tarasov) in Moscow to parents of mixed heritage, including Armenian, Russian, German and Georgian. According to his autobiography he states that his surname is Armenian (Torossian), while his maternal grandmother was German and his maternal grandfather was of mixed Georgian and Armenian descent. His family fled Russia after the outbreak of the revolution. After a long exodus taking them to the Caucasus on to Crimea and later by sea to Istanbul and then Venice, the family finally settled in Paris in 1920, where young Troyat was schooled and later earned a law degree. The stirring and tragic events of this flight across half of Europe are vividly recounted by Troyat in Tant que la terre durera. His first marriage produced a son before ending in divorce. He later married the love of his life, a widow with a young daughter whom he raised as his own. Troyat received his first literary award, Le prix du roman populaire, at the age of twenty-four, and by twenty-seven, he was awarded the Prix Goncourt. He published more than 100 books, novels and biographies, among them those of Anton Chekhov, Catherine the Great, Rasputin, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Ivan the Terrible and Leo Tolstoy. Troyat's best-known work is La neige en deuil, which was adapted as an English-language film in 1956 under the title The Mountain. Troyat was elected as a member of the Académie française in 1959. At the time of his death, he was the longest-serving member. His biographies (all of them on Russian and French personalities) include the following books, some of them - perceived as masterpieces: 1940 : Dostoievski, 1946 : Pouchkine, 1952 : L'Étrange Destin de Lermontov, 1965 : Tolstoi, 1971 : Gogol, 1977 : Catherine la Grande (prix des Ambassadeurs 1978), 1979 : Pierre le Grand, 1981 : Alexandre I^{er}, 1982 : Ivan le Terrible, 1984 : Tchekhov, 1985 : Tourgueniev, 1986 : Gorki, 1988 : Flaubert, 1989 : Maupassant, 1990 : Alexandre II, le tsar libérateur (Alexandre II de Russie), 1991 : Nicolas II, 1992 : Zola, 1993 : Verlaine, 1994 : Baudelaire, 1995 : Balzac, 1996 : Raspoutine, 1997 : Juliette Drouet, 1998 : Terribles Tsarines, 1998 : Les Turbulences d'une grande famille (famille Lebaudy), 1999 : Nicolas I^{er}, 2001 : Marina Tsvetaeva, l'éternelle insurgée, 2002 : Paul I^{er}, le tsar mal aimé, 2004 : La Baronne et le musicien, Madame Von Meck et Tchaïkovski, 2004 : Alexandre III, le tsar des neiges, 2005 : Alexandre Dumas, le cinquième mousquetaire, 2006 : Pasternak, 2008 : Boris Godounov, 2010 : Trois mères, trois fils. Madame Baudelaire, Madame Verlaine, Madame Rimbaud, 2012 : Gontcharov. Troyat has also written many novels, which I have not read.

Troyat wrote more than 100 works, including novels, biographies and plays. Many of his biographies focused on major Russian figures, including Leo Tolstoy, Catherine the Great and Aleksander Pushkin. Troyat's fictional tales often were involved, epic sagas that drew comparisons to the novels of the 19th century. His works have been translated into English, Spanish, Hebrew and Chinese. His lost Russia was a continuing source of fascination and inspiration throughout his career. "Thanks to him, the Russian novel has become a bit French," French Culture Minister Renaud Donnedieu de Vabres said. President Jacques Chirac called Troyat a "giant of French letters." Troyat was inducted into the prestigious Academie Francaise in 1959, making him the most long-standing member of the group of 40 so-called "immortals" who safeguard the French language. "He was a born teller of stories, both true and invented," Maurice Druon, another academy member, wrote in Le Figaro newspaper. "That was what he lived and breathed for. A day without writing seemed like a sin to him." Troyat was born Lev Tarassov in Moscow in 1911. His family lost everything they had when they fled Russia during the 1917 Revolution. They wandered for many months, with stops including Istanbul and Venice, before settling in Paris in 1920. Troyat never returned to his native land, even after the fall of the Soviet Union, saying he wanted to keep alive the imaginary Russia he created out of childhood memories and dreams. "The snow is cleaner in my dreams," he once said.

Polls often ranked Troyat as the favorite writer of the French. He also won France's highest Legion of Honor ranking, the Grand Croix or Grand Cross. But Troyat said he cared little for glory. "Success means nothing," he once said, according to Le Figaro. "I know what I'm talking about; at the very beginning of my life, I saw my parents lose everything in a reversal of fortune, and I kept that lesson in mind." Troyat studied law as a young man, but he won early renown as a writer with the publication of his first novel, "Faux Jour" (False Light), when he was completing his mandatory French military service. His fifth novel, "L'Araigne" (The Spider), published when he was 27, won France's top literary prize, the Prix Goncourt. Many of Troyat's books were set in Russia; others were portraits of French families. He also wrote biographies of French writers, including Emile Zola, Honore de Balzac and Gustav Flaubert. Troyat remained prolific in his later years, publishing his final novel, "La Traque" (The Hunt), when he was 94. Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin said Troyat's works "fascinated thousands of readers for 70 years, and will continue to fascinate them." Troyat will be remembered forever mainly for his excellent biographies, as he is probably the best biographer, at least in the French language.

JEAN-PAUL SARTRE – BIOGRAPHY BY ANNIE COHEN-SOLAL

Sartre is one of my favorite authors, I enjoyed reading most of his novels, even several times, most of his plays, which I have also seen on stage, and of course his excellent biography by Annie Cohen-Solal. I even remember when I read it (not only Proust has memories). When I was almost fifty the Israeli Army decided that the non-combatant/pencil-pusher officers should serve in reserve in combatant missions, but as it was quite dangerous to give us combat weapons I was sent to be a GG – Gate Guard (not Gordon Gekko from Wall Street...). My unit was eager to receive me for a month reserve service as I did some quite good stuff, but they were compelled to agree, in the name of an equal burden for all the officers – pencil-pushers and combatants. By then I was already a Major and earned a very high salary (which has to be paid by the army for the month reserve), and so I guarded every night at the Gate of "somewhere in the desert" with an old rifle, and they explained to me what to do exactly if terrorists would attack the Gate. I was paid my salary that was ten times more than the salary of a citizen guard (there was a lot of unemployment in those days) with a combatant experience who would have fulfilled the mission much better than me. But an order is an order and I guarded at the gate for a whole month at nights and in the days I read the biography of Jean-Paul Sartre and heard the latest songs in the "London" album by Hava Alberstein my favorite singer until I knew them by heart. Well, probably there are not many Majors who guard gates (and read Sartre's biography), so I was quite "annoyed", as I don't want to use harsher words. But as I always try to find ways to improve "illogical, although very socialistic" situations, I sent a letter to a very high ranking xxx explaining to him the absurdity of the situation and suggested two possibilities – either give me a training of several months to make me a competent combat officer/Major or let me go back to my former unit that was craving for my service during the whole year. I said that I intend to complaint on the waste of the Defense budgets, paying ten times more for the same job, reassured them that it has nothing to do with an offence that a Major does the job of a corporal, that I understand their egalitarian logic, but I find it completely absurd that I would guard a gate when if something happens I would not have the training to cope with the situation and a tragedy might occur not only for me but for all those whom I am about to guard. As expected, I was not called anymore to this mission and my unit was delighted, my wife and children were delighted, my civilian tasks were delighted, and the budget of the Ministry of Defense increased much.

Sartre had a very hectic life, he was perceived as the ultimate intellectual, free thinker, had an open relation with Simone de Beauvoir, and wrote brilliant works, so modern, so humane, so depressing... I read Sartre only when I was in a very good mood, otherwise it would have been dangerous to my peace of mind to read such pessimistic novels and plays. His works are so captivating that you truly feel that you are Garcin or Ines in Huis Clos, and by the way the first performance of this play was in May 1944, a few weeks before D Day (and the day I was born) and a few months before Paris was liberated, but the mood of the French people under Nazi occupation fitted exactly the anxiety of the play. What a huge difference between the hell that Sartre describes in Huis Clos and the hell of Shaw in Man and Superman! And this despair is nothing in comparison to the despair in Le Sursis written in a stream of consciousness style. When a reader likes an author it is in many cases because he identifies with him. I identified fully with Hugo and Zola but identified only partly with the existensialist way of thinking preconized by Sartre and certainly not by Sartre's way of life. I often refer that authors whom I admire are family – Hugo, Zola, Arthur Miller, Marcel Pagnol, Sinclair Lewis, Remarque, Vargas Llosa, Ibsen, Cervantes, Moliere, Sophocles, Homer, Tolstoy, Lawrence, Shaw, Sobol, Tammuz, but certainly not – Sartre, Kafka, Pirandello, Strindberg, Garcia Marques, Thomas Mann, Brecht, Ionesco, Williams, Mahfouz, Dostoyevsky, Wilde, Racine, Shakespeare, Agnon... I like all of them but still I feel very close to the first ones and very distant to the others.

Existentialism is a term applied to the work of certain late 19th- and 20th-century European philosophers who, despite profound doctrinal differences, shared the belief that philosophical thinking begins with the human subject—not merely the thinking subject, but the acting, feeling, living human individual. While the supreme value of existentialist thought is commonly acknowledged to be freedom, its primary virtue is authenticity. In the view of the existentialist, the individual's starting point is characterized by what has been called "the existential attitude", or a sense of disorientation and confusion in the face of an apparently meaningless or absurd world. Many existentialists have also regarded traditional systematic or academic philosophies, in both style and content, as too abstract and remote from concrete human experience. Søren Kierkegaard is generally considered to have been the first existentialist philosopher, though he did not use the term existentialism. He proposed that each individual—not society or religion—is solely responsible for giving meaning to life and living it passionately and sincerely ("authentically"). Existentialism became popular in the years following World War II, and strongly influenced many disciplines besides philosophy, including theology, drama, art, literature, and psychology. The notion of the Absurd contains the idea that there is no meaning in the world beyond what meaning we give it. This meaninglessness also encompasses the amorality or "unfairness" of the world. This contrasts with the notion that "bad things don't happen to good people"; to the world, metaphorically speaking, there is no such thing as a good person or a bad person; what happens happens, and it may just as well happen to a "good" person as to a "bad" person. Because of the world's absurdity, at any point in time, anything can happen to anyone, and a tragic event could plummet someone into direct confrontation with the Absurd. The notion of the Absurd has been prominent in literature throughout history. Many of the literary works of Søren Kierkegaard, Samuel Beckett, Franz Kafka, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Eugène Ionesco, Luigi Pirandello, Jean-Paul Sartre, Joseph Heller and Albert Camus contain descriptions of people who encounter the absurdity of the world.

Existentialists oppose definitions of human beings as primarily rational, and, therefore, oppose positivism and rationalism. Existentialism asserts that people actually make decisions based on subjective meaning rather than pure rationality. The rejection of reason as the source of meaning is a common theme of existentialist thought, as is the focus on the feelings of anxiety and dread that we feel in the face of our own radical freedom and our awareness of death. Kierkegaard advocated rationality as means to interact with the objective world (e.g. in the natural sciences), but when it comes to existential problems, reason is insufficient: "Human reason has boundaries". Like Kierkegaard, Sartre saw problems with rationality, calling it a form of "bad faith", an attempt by the self to impose structure on a world of phenomena—"the Other"—that is fundamentally irrational and random. According to Sartre, rationality and other forms of bad faith hinder people from finding meaning in freedom. To try to suppress their feelings of anxiety and dread, people confine themselves within everyday experience, Sartre asserts, thereby relinquishing their freedom and acquiescing to being possessed in one form or another by "the Look" of "the Other" (i.e. possessed by another person—or at least one's idea of that other person). I admire works by Beckett, Kafka, Dostoyevsky, Ionesco, Pirandello, Sartre, Camus. I admit that in our lives there is a lot of absurdity, but I strongly oppose being governed by feelings of anxiety and dread, and I am really indifferent to the awareness of death. I think that freedom is the most important quality of humans, but think that our lives are a combination of rational and irrational considerations and events, and I view life as primarily positive and rational, rather than subjective. If I would have been irrational I would not write this book and spend my time reading easy best sellers and have fun, but as I imagine that my book would make an impact (I assume it although I might be completely wrong) I write it because I am rational and ultimately I want that my readers would be rational too and draw the right conclusions from my book. This is a decision based on objective meaning rather than subjective. I strongly oppose also Sartre's way of life having an open relationship with his companion Simone de Beauvoir. It may be fun to have an open relationship, more exhilarating, even more rewarding, but what about the tremendous merits of marriage: fidelity, children, grandchildren, peace of mind, security, love, kindness, sacrifice, building a family based on care, social and financial considerations, long-term companionship (Sartre claimed that he was the best companion of de Beauvoir but I beg to differ as it is impossible to have such relations without jealousy and spite).

Encyclopedia Britannica's article on Sartre written by Wilfrid Desan:

Jean-Paul Sartre, (born June 21, 1905, Paris, France—died April 15, 1980, Paris), French novelist, playwright, and exponent of Existentialism—a philosophy acclaiming the freedom of the individual human being. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1964, but he declined it. Sartre lost his father at an early age and grew up in the home of his maternal grandfather, Carl Schweitzer, uncle of the medical missionary Albert Schweitzer and himself professor of German at the Sorbonne. The boy, who wandered in the Luxembourg Gardens of Paris in search of playmates, was small in stature and cross-eyed. His brilliant autobiography, Les Mots (1963; Words), narrates the adventures of the mother and child in the park as they went from group to group—in the vain hope of being accepted—then finally retreated to the sixth floor of their apartment “on the heights where (the) dreams dwell.” “The words” saved the child, and his interminable pages of writing were the escape from a world that had rejected him but that he would proceed to rebuild in his own fancy. Sartre went to the Lycée Henri IV in Paris and, later on, after the remarriage of his mother, to the lycée in La Rochelle. From there he went to the prestigious École Normale Supérieure, from which he was graduated in 1929. Sartre resisted what he called “bourgeois marriage,” but while still a student he formed with Simone de Beauvoir a union that remained a settled partnership in life. Simone de Beauvoir's memoirs, Mémoires d'une jeune fille rangée (1958; Memoirs of a Dutiful Daughter) and La Force de l'âge (1960; The Prime of Life), provide an intimate account of Sartre's life from student years until his middle 50s. It was also at the École Normale Supérieure and at the Sorbonne that he met several persons who were destined to be writers of great fame; among these were Raymond Aron, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Simone Weil, Emmanuel Mounier, Jean Hippolyte, and Claude Lévi-Strauss. From 1931 until 1945 Sartre taught in the lycées of Le Havre, Laon, and, finally, Paris. Twice this career was interrupted, once by a year of study in Berlin and the second time when Sartre was drafted in 1939 to serve in World War II. He was made prisoner in 1940 and released a year later.

During his years of teaching in Le Havre, Sartre published La Nausée (1938; Nausea), his first claim to fame. This novel, written in the form of a diary, narrates the feeling of revulsion that a certain Roquentin undergoes when confronted with the world of matter—not merely the world of other people but the very awareness of his own body. According to some critics, La Nausée must be viewed as a pathological case, a form of neurotic escape. Most probably it must be appreciated also as a most original, fiercely individualistic, antisocial piece of work, containing in its pages many of the philosophical themes that Sartre later developed. Sartre took over the phenomenological method, which proposes careful, unprejudiced description rather than deduction, from the German philosopher Edmund Husserl and used it with great skill in three successive publications: L'Imagination (1936; Imagination: A Psychological Critique), Esquisse d'une théorie des émotions (1939; Sketch for a Theory of the Emotions), and L'Imaginaire: Psychologie phénoménologique de l'imagination (1940; The Psychology of Imagination). But it was above all in L'Être et le néant (1943; Being and Nothingness) that Sartre revealed himself as a master of outstanding talent. Sartre places human consciousness, or no-thingness (néant), in opposition to being, or thingness (être). Consciousness is not-matter and by the same token escapes all determinism. The message, with all the implications it contains, is a hopeful one; yet the incessant reminder that human endeavour is and remains useless makes the book tragic as well.

Having written his defense of individual freedom and human dignity, Sartre turned his attention to the concept of social responsibility. For many years he had shown great concern for the poor and the disinherited of all kinds. While a teacher, he had refused to wear a tie, as if he could shed his social class with his tie and thus come closer to the worker. Freedom itself, which at times in his previous writings appeared to be a gratuitous activity that needed no particular aim or purpose to be of value, became a tool for human struggle in his brochure L'Existentialisme est un humanisme (1946; Existentialism and Humanism). Freedom now implied social responsibility. In his novels and plays Sartre began to bring his ethical message to the world at large. He started a four-volume novel in 1945 under the title Les Chemins de la liberté, of which three were eventually written: L'Âge de raison (1945; The Age of Reason), Le Sursis (1945; The Reprieve), and La Mort dans l'âme (1949; Iron in the Soul, or Troubled Sleep). After the publication of the third volume, Sartre changed his mind concerning the usefulness of the novel as a medium of communication and turned back to plays. What a writer must attempt, said Sartre, is to show man as he is. Nowhere is man more man than when he is in action, and this is exactly what drama portrays. He had already written in this medium during the war, and now one play followed another: Les Mouches (produced 1943; The Flies), Huis-clos (produced 1944, published 1945; In Camera, or No Exit), Les Mains sales (1948; Crime passionnel, 1949; U.S. title, Dirty Hands; acting version, Red Gloves), Le Diable et le bon dieu (1951; Lucifer and the Lord), Nekrassov (1955), and Les Séquestrés d'Altona (1959; Loser Wins, or The Condemned of Altona). All the plays, in their emphasis upon the raw hostility of man toward man, seem to be predominantly pessimistic; yet, according to Sartre's own confession, their content does not exclude the possibility of a morality of salvation. Other publications of the same period include a book, Baudelaire (1947), a vaguely ethical study on the French writer and poet Jean Genet titled Saint Genet, comédien et martyr (1952; Saint Genet, Actor and Martyr), and innumerable articles that were published in Les Temps Modernes, the monthly review that Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir founded and edited. These articles were later collected in several volumes under the title Situations.

After World War II, Sartre took an active interest in French political movements, and his leanings to the left became more pronounced. He became an outspoken admirer of the Soviet Union, although he did not become a member of the Communist Party. In 1954 he visited the Soviet Union, Scandinavia, Africa, the United States, and Cuba. Upon the entry of Soviet tanks into Budapest in 1956, however, Sartre's hopes for communism were sadly crushed. He wrote in Les Temps Modernes a long article, "Le Fantôme de Staline," that condemned both the Soviet intervention and the submission of the French Communist Party to the dictates of Moscow. Over the years this critical attitude opened the way to a form of "Sartrian Socialism" that would find its expression in a new major work, Critique de la raison dialectique (1960; Eng. trans., of the introduction only, under the title The Problem of Method; U.S. title, Search for a Method). Sartre set out to examine critically the Marxist dialectic and discovered that it was not livable in the Soviet form. Although he still believed that Marxism was the only philosophy for the current times, he conceded that it had become ossified and that, instead of adapting itself to particular situations, it compelled the particular to fit a predetermined universal. Whatever its fundamental, general principles, Marxism must learn to recognize the existential concrete circumstances that differ from one collectivity to another and to respect the individual freedom of man. The Critique, somewhat marred by poor construction, is in fact an impressive and beautiful book, deserving of more attention than it has gained so far. A projected second volume was abandoned.

Instead, Sartre prepared for publication Les Mots, for which he was awarded the 1964 Nobel Prize for Literature, an offer that was refused.

From 1960 until 1971 most of Sartre's attention went into the writing of a four-volume study called Flaubert. Two volumes with a total of some 2,130 pages appeared in the spring of 1971. This huge enterprise aimed at presenting the reader with a "total biography" of Gustave Flaubert, the famous French novelist, through the use of a double tool: on the one hand, Karl Marx's concept of history and class and, on the other, Sigmund Freud's illuminations of the dark recesses of the human soul through explorations into his childhood and family relations. Although at times Sartre's genius comes through and his fecundity is truly unbelievable, the sheer volume of the work and the minutely detailed analysis of even the slightest Flaubertian dictum hamper full enjoyment. As if he himself were saturated by the prodigal abundance of his writings, Sartre moved away from his desk during 1971 and did very little writing. Under the motto that "commitment is an act, not a word," Sartre often went into the streets to participate in rioting, in the sale of left-wing literature, and in other activities that in his opinion were the way to promote "the revolution." Paradoxically enough, this same radical Socialist published in 1972 the third volume of the work on Flaubert, L'Idiot de la famille, another book of such density that only the bourgeois intellectual can read it. The enormous productivity of Sartre came herewith to a close. His mind, still alert and active, came through in interviews and in the writing of scripts for motion pictures. He also worked on a book of ethics. However, his was no longer the power of a genius in full productivity. Sartre became blind and his health deteriorated. In April 1980 he died of a lung tumour. His very impressive funeral, attended by some 25,000 people, was reminiscent of the burial of Victor Hugo, but without the official recognition that his illustrious predecessor had received. Those who were there were ordinary people, those whose rights his pen had always defended.

And from the Wikipedia:

While the broad focus of Sartre's life revolved around the notion of human freedom, he began a sustained intellectual participation in more public matters towards the end of the Second World War, around 1944-45. Prior to this—before the Second World War—he was content with the role of an apolitical liberal intellectual: "Now teaching at a lycée in Laon [...] Sartre made his headquarters the Dome café at the crossing of Montparnasse and Raspail boulevards. He attended plays, read novels, and dined [with] women. He wrote. And he was published." Sartre and his lifelong companion, de Beauvoir, existed, in her words, where "the world about us was a mere backdrop against which our private lives were played out". Sartre portrayed his own pre-war situation in the character Mathieu, chief protagonist in The Age of Reason, which was completed during Sartre's first year as a soldier in the Second World War. By forging Mathieu as an absolute rationalist, analyzing every situation, and functioning entirely on reason, he removed any strands of authentic content from his character and as a result, Mathieu could "recognize no allegiance except to [him]self", though he realized that without "responsibility for my own existence, it would seem utterly absurd to go on existing". Mathieu's commitment was only to himself, never to the outside world. Mathieu was restrained from action each time because he had no reasons for acting. Sartre then, for these reasons, was not compelled to participate in the Spanish Civil War, and it took the invasion of his own country to motivate him into action and to provide a crystallization of these ideas. It was the war that gave him a purpose beyond himself, and the atrocities of the war can be seen as the turning point in his public stance.

The war opened Sartre's eyes to a political reality he had not yet understood until forced into continual engagement with it: "the world itself destroyed Sartre's illusions about isolated self-determining individuals and made clear his own personal stake in the events of the time." Returning to Paris in 1941 he formed the "Socialisme et Liberté" resistance group. In 1943, after the group disbanded, Sartre joined a writers' Resistance group, in which he remained an active participant until the end of the war. He continued to write ferociously, and it was due to this "crucial experience of war and captivity that Sartre began to try to build up a positive moral system and to express it through literature". The symbolic initiation of this new phase in Sartre's work is packaged in the introduction he wrote for a new journal, Les Temps modernes, in October 1945. Here he aligned the journal, and thus himself, with the Left and called for writers to express their political commitment. Yet, this alignment was indefinite, directed more to the concept of the Left than a specific party of the Left. Sartre's philosophy lent itself to his being a public intellectual. He envisaged culture as a very fluid concept; neither pre-determined, nor definitely finished; instead, in true existential fashion, "culture was always conceived as a process of continual invention and re-invention." This marks Sartre, the intellectual, as a pragmatist, willing to move and shift stance along with events. He did not dogmatically follow a cause other than the belief in human freedom, preferring to retain a pacifist's objectivity. It is this overarching theme of freedom that means his work "subverts the bases for distinctions among the disciplines". Therefore, he was able to hold knowledge across a vast array of subjects: "the international world order, the political and economic organisation of contemporary society, especially France, the institutional and legal frameworks that regulate the lives of ordinary citizens, the educational system, the media networks that control and disseminate information. Sartre systematically refused to keep quiet about what he saw as inequalities and injustices in the world."

Sartre always sympathized with the Left, and supported the French Communist Party (PCF) until the 1956 Soviet invasion of Hungary. Following the Liberation the PCF were infuriated by Sartre's philosophy, which appeared to lure young French men and women away from the ideology of communism and into Sartre's own existentialism. From 1956 onwards Sartre rejected the claims of the PCF to represent the French working classes, objecting to its "authoritarian tendencies". In the late 1960s Sartre supported the Maoists, a movement that rejected the authority of established communist parties. However, despite aligning with the Maoists, Sartre said after the May events: "If one rereads all my books, one will realize that I have not changed profoundly, and that I have always remained an anarchist." He would later explicitly allow himself to be called an anarchist. In the aftermath of a war that had for the first time properly engaged Sartre in political matters, he set forth a body of work which "reflected on virtually every important theme of his early thought and began to explore alternative solutions to the problems posed there". The greatest difficulties that he and all public intellectuals of the time faced were the increasing technological aspects of the world that were outdating the printed word as a form of expression. In Sartre's opinion, the "traditional bourgeois literary forms remain innately superior", but there is "a recognition that the new technological 'mass media' forms must be embraced" if Sartre's ethical and political goals as an authentic, committed intellectual are to be achieved: the demystification of bourgeois political practices and the raising of the consciousness, both political and cultural, of the working class.

The struggle for Sartre was against the monopolising moguls who were beginning to take over the media and destroy the role of the intellectual. His attempts to reach a public were mediated by these powers, and it was often these powers he had to campaign against. He was skilled enough, however, to circumvent some of these issues by his interactive approach to the various forms of media, advertising his radio interviews in a newspaper column for example, and vice versa. The role of a public intellectual can lead to the individual placing himself in danger as he engages with disputed topics. In Sartre's case, this was witnessed in June 1961, when a plastic bomb exploded in the entrance of his apartment building. His public support of Algerian self-determination at the time had led Sartre to become a target of the campaign of terror that mounted as the colonists' position deteriorated. A similar occurrence took place the next year and he had begun to receive threatening letters from Oran, Algeria. Sartre wrote successfully in a number of literary modes and made major contributions to literary criticism and literary biography. His plays are richly symbolic and serve as a means of conveying his philosophy. The best-known, Huis-clos (No Exit), contains the famous line "L'enfer, c'est les autres", usually translated as "Hell is other people."^[77] Aside from the impact of Nausea, Sartre's major work of fiction was The Roads to Freedom trilogy which charts the progression of how World War II affected Sartre's ideas. In this way, Roads to Freedom presents a less theoretical and more practical approach to existentialism.

Despite their similarities as polemicists, novelists, adapters, and playwrights, Sartre's literary work has been counterposed, often pejoratively, to that of Camus in the popular imagination. In 1948 the Roman Catholic Church placed Sartre's oeuvre on the Index Librorum Prohibitorum \(List of Prohibited Books\). The internationally acclaimed biography of Sartre in celebration of the 100th anniversary of his birth. The first volume in the Lives of the Left series, Annie Cohen-Solal's Sartre is a remarkable achievement. "A sensation" upon its initial publication in France, as the New York Times reported, Sartre was subsequently translated into sixteen languages and went on to become an international bestseller, appealing to the broadest audience. First published in the United States in 1987, it is the definitive biography of a man and an age, an intimate portrait of a complex life. A major accomplishment of this biography is that it places Sartre in the context of history while at the same time reassessing the full import of his literary and political accomplishments. Discovering untold aspects of Sartre's private and political life, Cohen-Solal weaves together all the elements of an exceptional career. From the fascinating description of his hitherto-unknown father to the painful last moments of Sartre's own declining years, this is biography on the grandest scale, fully deserving of the praise it has received.

Annie Cohen-Solal is a French academic and writer. Born in pre-independence Algeria, she is part of the Jewish diaspora that left that country for France during the Algerian War of Independence. Her most famous work is a biography of Jean-Paul Sartre, Sartre: A Life, which has been translated into sixteen languages. The French edition of her book about the rise of American artists from the 19th to the 20th century, Un jour ils auront des peintres (English title: Painting American), was awarded the Prix Bernier by the Académie des Beaux-Arts. From 1989 to 1993, Cohen-Solal served as Cultural Counselor at the French Embassy in the United States. She has taught at New York University, the University of Berlin, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and the École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales in Paris. Cohen-Solal is a Professor of American studies at the Université de Caen as well as Visiting Scholar at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore (Maryland). In 2009, at the French Consulate in New York, she was presented with the title of Chevalier dans l'ordre national de la Légion d'Honneur (Knight of the 'National Order of the Legion of Honor'), the highest decoration in France, by Ambassador Pierre Vimont. In Spring 2010, Cohen-Solal published Leo and His Circle: The Life of Leo Castelli, a cultural biography of Leo Castelli, America's most influential art dealer, which was awarded the ArtCurial Prize for the best book on contemporary art. Annie Cohen-Solal lives in Paris and Cortona (Italy). We bring here also a Lecture on Jean-Paul Sartre by Annie Cohen-Solal at Cornell on October 24, 2008 – all the world was in turmoil because it was the peak of the Great Recession, but at Cornell Cohen-Solal lectured about Sartre. I don't think that anybody read more than a hundred books about this Great Recession and The Future of Capitalism and has read most of the works by Sartre and of course his biography, how can one exist and cope in such two opposite worlds? I hope that my book will give the answer to this enigma...

Jul 10, 2015 Harry Allagree rated the biography:

For all its 600 or so pages, I'd be hard pressed to think of a book which I've enjoyed reading more than this one! In a very surface way I've been intrigued with Jean-Paul Sartre since the late 1950's when we were introduced to him & his thought in our seminary Contemporary Philosophy course. We spent some time on his writings, but were never challenged, nor did I ever take the initiative, to read any of his works. We relied on snippets from them. I wish now that I'd pursued him more vigorously. It would've prevented me from some very unwarranted assumptions about him & what he was about, which have lasted until I read this astounding biography. Annie Cohen-Solal presents an incredible portrait of a man whom I think I would have very much enjoyed meeting & speaking with. Perhaps a quote of Sartre's, spoken in 1978, two years before he died at age 74, with which Cohen-Solal concludes the biography in a way summarizes what Sartre was all about: "One day, my life will end, but I don't want it to be burdened with death. I want that my death never enter my life, nor define it, that I be always a call to life." The author's account details how very much Sartre was "a call to life" as a philosopher, novelist, playwright, political figure, and most of all the global champion of causes of those oppressed. He valued truth, knowledge & generosity. He was ever thirsty for new insights from other people. He was also offbeat & quirky as a human being, often even contradictory. He was also humble. His way with women was legendary & it's remarkable that, for never marrying, he was able to sustain multiple close relationships/friendships for more years than many marriages last! He drank, he smoked: he actually was his own worst enemy & ruined his eyesight & health ultimately. He was personable. He loved young people. And was indefatigable in his fighting for human rights & dignity. Many have called him the greatest intellectual of the 20th century. We could profit from such a one today!

5/1987 - Roger Kimball - A review of Annie Cohen-Solal's Sartre biography:

Jean-Paul Sartre was born to a solidly bourgeois family in Thiviers, France, in June 1905, a little over a year after his parents were married. His father, Jean-Baptiste, was an officer in the French navy and had been educated at the École Polytechnique; his mother, Anne-Marie Schweitzer (cousin of the great doctor and humanitarian, Albert), came from an old and well-to-do Alsatian family. Jean-Baptiste died in 1906, when Jean-Paul was fifteen months old, and Anne-Marie soon took her infant son to live with her father Charles Schweitzer, whom Sartre evokes in largely affectionate terms in The Words, the much-admired autobiography of his early years. Though Sartre claims to have “loathed” his childhood, he remembers his time in the Schweitzer household as years of coddled freedom and happiness when he was the clever center of everyone’s world.

The center was displaced in 1917 when his mother married Joseph Mancy, a former schoolmate of the unfortunate Jean-Baptiste, and moved with him to La Rochelle. Sartre remembers his stepfather—when he bothers to recall him at all—with a mixture of contempt and bitterness; not that Mancy was cruel or worthy of contempt, but he had committed the unpardonable sins of disrupting Sartre’s world and dividing his mother’s attentions.

From the beginning, Sartre enjoyed the privileged education of his class. Early on, his grandfather Schweitzer encouraged his curiosity and interest in reading. Sartre was precocious, adept at music, acting, and languages, though indifferent at best in mathematics. At the prestigious École Normale Supérieure, he studied philosophy, taking first place in his agrégation in 1929. (A fellow philosophy student he met that year, Simone de Beauvoir, took a close second.) But, as Annie Cohen-Solal shows in her newly translated biography,^[1] if Sartre was a brilliant student, he was hardly a model one. She remarks that at school Sartre was the “fearsome instigator of all the revues, all the jokes, all the scandals”—“scandals,” it seems, that were hardly confined to the harmless expression of youthful high spirits. Once, for example, Sartre took it upon himself to send a letter to the police accusing a fellow student of having murdered a woman, the wife of a diplomat, whose body had recently been found; another of his “pranks” resulted in the principal of the school resigning. As Miss Cohen-Solal notes, “this image of a provoking, disrespectful, subversive Sartre recurs again and again, like a leitmotif, throughout his life.”

Indeed, reading Sartre, one gathers that coming to terms with the philosopher turned out to be far more difficult than Miss Cohen-Solal had reckoned. The book opens at an auction in Paris in 1984 when several manuscripts by Sartre were up for sale. Miss Cohen-Solal confesses her displeasure at the spectacle, noting that “it’s not pleasant to see our most cherished symbolic values brutally priced, exhibited, sold, and bundled off by anonymous gentlemen in gray suits.” But as the biography unfolds, the author of those “most cherished symbolic values” emerges as a deeply troubling—not to say downright distasteful—character.

Having already written a well-received biography of Sartre’s friend, the French Communist writer Paul Nizan, Miss Cohen-Solal would seem to be well placed for the task of telling the story of Sartre’s life. She is thoroughly steeped in the ethos of post-World-War-II French intellectual culture—Sartre’s culture—and anyone interested in the characters and passions that determined Sartre’s life and times will consult her book with profit. She candidly recounts the highlights of Sartre’s long career, outlining the circumstances and reception of his chief works and pausing to detail the various intrigues and political battles that absorbed so large a part of his life.

Considered as an intellectual biography, however, Sartre has its share of weaknesses. For one thing, it provides scant discussion of Sartre’s explicitly philosophical work. Miss Cohen-Solal is surely right that Being and Nothingness is “a key to Sartre’s entire life and works,” but her biography does little to illuminate the main themes of that central text. Then, too, Miss Cohen-Solal’s narrative gifts are not large. Her book displays a formidable amount of research and an intimate acquaintance with Sartre’s oeuvre, especially his literary and political writings and his correspondence, but she has not succeeded in weaving this wealth of material into a coherent narrative. What we get is a series of more or less imperfectly related episodes, not a continuous story, and this makes it sometimes difficult to follow the chronology and changing dramatis personae of Sartre’s life.

Miss Cohen-Solal also has a penchant for overwriting of the puffy, book-blurb variety, which tends to compromise one's faith in her critical judgment. About The Words, for example, which won Sartre the Nobel Prize in 1964, she proclaims that "it is a powerful, seductive book that seizes the reader with contrasting strategies, excites him, ravishes him, and then, finally, abandons him, traumatized, defenseless, in a state of shock." Well, The Words is certainly a good book; some consider it Sartre's single most accomplished work. But really: "ravishes," "abandons," "traumatized," "shock"! Is a litany fit for the fate of the Sabine women appropriate to describe Sartre's often rather lugubrious story of his first twelve years?

Furthermore, Sartre is marred by some unfortunate ideological tics. Miss Cohen-Solal can be quite critical of Sartre's political and personal follies, but throughout the book she indulges in what one might call reflex feminism and a species of anti-bourgeois animus akin to Sartre's own sentiments about the class that spawned him. Describing some remarks made at Jean-Baptiste and Anne-Marie's traditional wedding ceremony, for example, she pauses to assure us that "at a time when the division of roles between man and woman—his, the mind; hers, the heart—was still quite rigid, this speech did not shock the audience." And commenting on Sartre's teaching abilities, she notes that "thanks to him, his students acquired keen critical minds, a strong sense of responsibility, clear perceptions of class struggle and of racism, and an acceptance of otherness; they had demystified madness and other taboos, as well as marriage, private property, and the other symbols of bourgeois life. In short, they had truly confronted otherness to the detriment of all fictitious hierarchies, all useless conventions."

Given such clichés, which recur throughout the book, one is not surprised that Miss Cohen-Solal should wax ecstatic over Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir's famous "open" relationship. "For several generations, this couple would become a model to emulate, a dream of lasting complicity, an extraordinary success since, apparently, it managed to reconcile the unreconcilable: the two partners remained free, equal, and honest with each other." One has to wonder, though, how happy—and, indeed, how honest—that relationship really was. Yes, Sartre told Beauvoir right off that his credo was "travel, polygamy, transparency." But what does "transparency" mean here? Is it more than an excuse for self-indulgence, a form of selfishness masquerading as ruthless honesty? And was Beauvoir pleased with her consort's "open unlimited harem"? Did she savor his letters graphically describing his sex life with other women? Was she really as free from jealousy and the bourgeois vice of "possessiveness" as she sometimes liked to pretend? Several passages in this book suggest otherwise.

But there is no doubt Miss Cohen-Solal regards Simone de Beauvoir as an ideal woman. In fact, in many ways, the real hero of these pages is not Jean-Paul Sartre but Simone de Beauvoir. Describing her as Sartre's "convinced yet autonomous disciple, a feminist" ("autonomous" and "feminist," especially when they occur together, are Miss Cohen-Solal's highest words of praise), she is at pains to portray Beauvoir as the patient mistress of every situation, generous but uncompromising, a stabilizing influence on her erratic and self-destructive partner.

Nor is there any doubt that Sartre needed such a steady hand. Sartre is full of descriptions of its subject's excesses. In one typical passage, Miss Cohen-Solal tells us that Sartre's life had been more or less equally divided between, on the one hand, intense socializing—trips, rich meals, heavy drinking, drugs, and tobacco—and, on the other, the monastic austerity of a rigid work schedule. Work till noon at Rue Bonaparte. Twelve-thirty: one hour of appointments, scheduled by his secretary. One-thirty: back at Rue Bonaparte, with Beauvoir, Michelle, or some other woman Two hours over a heavy meal, washed down with a quart of red wine. Punctually, at three-thirty, he would stop in mid-sentence, push away the table, get up, and run back to his desk at Rue Bonaparte When he felt really sick, and the doctor prescribed rest, he would opt for a compromise: less tobacco and fewer drugs for a week His diet, over a period of twenty-four hours included two packs of cigarettes and several pipes stuffed with black tobacco, more than a quart of alcohol—wine, beer, vodka, whisky, and so on—two hundred milligrams of amphetamines, fifteen grams of aspirin, several grams of barbiturates, plus coffee, tea, rich meals.

Such a routine is of course a prescription for disaster, and one is surprised only that it wasn't until 1954 that Sartre suffered his first collapse, the result of acute arterial hypertension. A few years later, he reportedly almost killed himself by taking ever-increasing doses of the then-fashionable stimulant corydrane to help him finish the Critique of Dialectical Reason. And by the time that Sartre died in 1980, at the age of seventy-five, he had already been leading something of a posthumous existence for several years. Since childhood, writing had been Sartre's obsession, his raison d'être, his life. Yet after 1973 he was almost totally blind and could neither read nor write. In short order, a series of strokes and a battery of other ailments reduced him to the pathetic, devastated creature that Simone de Beauvoir describes in such excruciating detail in Adieux: A Farewell to Sartre, her memoir of the philosopher's last years.

In the spate of memoirs, interviews, and recollections about Sartre that have appeared since his death—of which Beauvoir's Adieux is only the best known—Sartre's friends are at pains to proclaim his generosity and kindness. There is no doubt that he could be both kind and generous, especially to the female members of what Miss Cohen-Solal calls his "family." But he was also capable of what can only be called wanton viciousness. As extraordinary as Sartre's circle of friends and acquaintances was, even more extraordinary is the catalogue of people with whom he quarreled and broke. From Raymond Aron and Alberto Giacometti to Maurice Merleau-Ponty and Albert Camus, Sartre seems to have delighted in the drama of breaking friendships. Perhaps the most notorious rift came in 1952 when Sartre ran an exceedingly hostile review of Camus's The Rebel in Les Temps modernes. Camus, understandably upset by the review, wrote his old friend a chilly letter that opened with the formal salutation: "Monsieur le Directeur." Instead of responding to Camus privately, Sartre published an open letter in the magazine, a letter that Miss Cohen-Solal is surely correct in describing as one of the "most cruel and violent texts he had ever written." "My dear Camus," Sartre began, "our friendship was not easy, but I will miss it. If you end it today, that doubtless means it had to end."

Your combination of dreary conceit and vulnerability always discouraged people from telling you unvarnished truths Tell me, Camus, for what mysterious reasons may your works not be discussed without taking away humanity's reasons for living? . . . How serious you are, and yet, to use one of your old words, how frivolous! And suppose you are wrong? Suppose your book simply attested to your ignorance of philosophy? Suppose it consisted of hastily assembled and secondhand knowledge? ... Are you so afraid of being challenged? . . . But I don't dare advise you to consult Being and Nothingness. Reading it would seem needlessly arduous to you: you detest the difficulties of thought.

None of this, however, prevented Sartre from penning a fulsome eulogy when Camus died in 1960: apparently, his friends remained enemies only so long as they were capable of being rivals.

From an early age, Sartre was convinced he would become a great writer, enjoying a "great writer's life, as it appears from books." And "as for the content of that life," Sartre wrote in his notebook in 1939, it can be easily imagined: there were solitude and despair, passions, great undertakings, a long period of painful obscurity (though I slyly shortened it in my dreams, in order not to be too old when it ended), and then glory, with its retinue of admiration and love In a word, I'd have liked to be sure of becoming a great man later on, so as to be able to live my youth as a great man's youth [T]hough I couldn't be sure, I behaved as if I must become one—and was extremely conscious of being the young Sartre, in the same way that people speak of the young Berlioz or the young Goethe.

Yet despite his conviction of potential greatness, Sartre's success was not immediate. The early Thirties proved to be a fallow and frustrating period. Sartre's ambition was boundless, but his life was very definitely bounded; except for a year spent in Berlin in 1933 to study the philosophy of Edmund Husserl, he was confined to teaching in the provinces and to suffering the rejection of his literary efforts.

His literary career began to blossom only in 1938 when Nausea—which many consider his best and most original novel—and The Wall were published by the Nouvelle Revue Française. As Miss Cohen-Solal informs us, it was Sartre's publisher, the legendary Gaston Gallimard, who came up with the title Nausea. The book was published to great critical acclaim, and had an extraordinary influence, helping to inaugurate that dour literary-philosophical amalgam that came to be called "existentialism." The title "Nausea" is perfect, of course, for no other word sums up so graphically the hero Roquentin's generalized disgust at existence; and one cannot help wondering if the book's—and Sartre's—career would have been different had he published it under any of the titles he adopted when working on the manuscript: Factum on Contingency, Essay: On the Loneliness of the Mind, Melancholia, or finally—when asked for a more descriptive title—The Extraordinary Adventures of Antoine Roquentin. Somehow, none has the makings of a literary vogue.

Of course, Sartre's budding career was upset in September, 1939, when Germany invaded Poland. Sartre was mobilized and served as an army meteorologist in a succession of small towns near Strasbourg. His duties were far from arduous, however, and Sartre found that he had more time than ever for reading and writing.^[2] His relative tranquility was interrupted briefly when the Germans overran the fabled Maginot Line in May, 1940. Sartre was captured in June as his company retreated in the face of the German onslaught and was a prisoner of war until the following spring. Miss Cohen-Solal titles her chapter dealing with Sartre's experience as a prisoner of war "A Lofty Captivity," and one needn't read far into the chapter to discover why. Sartre apparently spent most of his time reading and talking about philosophy—he first encountered Heidegger's major work, Being and Time, in prison camp, for example—and even began writing plays. No doubt there were austerities and humiliations to be borne in Stalag XII D. But Sartre seems to have regarded the very extremity of the situation as an inducement to authenticity and the exercise of freedom. Typical is his later comment that "in the Stalag I rediscovered a form of collective life I had not experienced since the École Normale—in other words, I was happy." Indeed, Sartre's whole reaction to his months as a prisoner says a great deal about his notions of freedom, authenticity, and the merits of the "collective life" he dreamed of. About the latter, for example, he enthusiastically touts the lack of doors on the toilets because in the face of such a lack of privacy "the notion of an elite disappears."

Nevertheless, one cannot forbear noting that Sartre's "happiness" at the "collective life" in prison camp did not prevent him from feigning illness in order to get into the infirmary among the privileged, from lying about his occupation to get moved to the artists' barracks, or from escaping from the camp with false papers at the first opportunity in March, 1941. Yet it is part of the Sartrean hauteur that we should find him explaining to Beauvoir years later that he "did not really want to" leave the camp but felt he had to "just to prove a point."

What are we to make of such comments? What do they tell us about Sartre's character, about his understanding of freedom, of "collective life"? Miss Cohen-Solal suggests Sartre remembers his war experiences "with the tenderness of the fetishist." Perhaps so. Certainly, his recollections say something about the depth of his anti-bourgeois sentiments. And it is perfectly in keeping with his posture as the Disaffected Writer that when he returns to Paris he should write, disappointedly, that he had "rejoined bourgeois society, where I would have to learn to live once again 'at a respectful distance.' This sudden agoraphobia betrayed my vague feeling of regret for the collective life from which I had been forever severed." How much more attractive were those toilets without doors! Eventually, Sartre was able to transform his "vague feeling of regret" into open nostalgia, writing after the Liberation that "We were never as free as under the German Occupation" because the very fact of oppression made every "just thought" a "real conquest."

There is something not only bizarre but almost obscene about Sartre's haughty descriptions of his happy days as a prisoner of war. Yet they effectively epitomize his extreme view of freedom and authenticity as a kind of campaign by the individual against the strictures of society. As Iris Murdoch put it in her early, exceptionally lucid, book on the philosopher, for Sartre "the simple virtues of human intercourse become forms of insincerity. Only reflection and freedom are desired as ends and yet these turn out to be without content."

Despite—or perhaps because of—the disruption of the war, the early Forties were among Sartre's most productive years, in quality if not quantity. He published Being and Nothingness and The Flies in 1943, No Exit in 1944, started Les Temps modernes in 1945, delivered his famous lecture "Existentialism is a Humanism" in 1946, and on and on. It was at this time that Sartre emerged as a world figure, becoming by the late Forties the prolific bellwether of intellectual fashion. The Forties also marked the beginning of Sartre's emergence as a radical political spokesman. As Miss Cohen-Solal observes, Sartre's political activity in the late Forties "shows us a Sartre and company intoxicated like all revolutionary leaders who read, in the increasing number of their supporters, the nearly sacred sanction of reality." Raymond Aron generously characterized Sartre's politics as a species of "revolutionary romanticism." But Sartre's hardened political confrères put it more bluntly when they speak of his "prattle." As one fellow radical remarked, "despite his lucidity, [Sartre] lived in a world that was totally isolated from reality.... He was very much involved in the play and movement of ideas, but not so much in events No, he was never terribly interested in the world."

Sartre is often described as a Communist. In fact, though, his politics were anything but systematic or coherent. Despite the friendly visits to Mao, to Khrushchev, to Castro, to Tito, to Ché Guevara, despite his declaration after returning from Russia in 1954 that "there is a total freedom of criticism in the USSR," despite his endless pamphleteering and proselytizing for Communist causes, Sartre was motivated primarily not by a commitment to the Party but by what Beauvoir proudly described as "anti-bourgeois anarchism." As Sartre himself assured his readers in the Fifties, "I swore to the bourgeoisie a hatred that would die only with me." Indeed, as Leszek Kolakowski observes in Main Currents of Marxism, Sartre oscillated between identification with the Communists and violent hostility towards them At every stage, however, he endeavored to preserve his own reputation as a "Leftist," and even to represent himself and his philosophy as the embodiment of "Leftism" par excellence. Consequently, even when attacking the Communists and reviled by them he made a point of directing far more vehement attacks against the forces of reaction, the bourgeoisie, or the United States Government.... His whole political activity was vitiated by fear of being in the typical situation of an intellectual condemning events that he has no power to influence; in short, his was that of a politician manqué, cherishing unfulfilled ambitions to be on the "inside."

By the Sixties, being "inside" politically meant proclaiming solidarity with the Third World, and it was then that Sartre became widely identified with "Third World" causes from Mao's China to Latin America. But here, too, it is important to recognize that his commitment to the causes he championed was largely a matter of posturing and rhetoric. He had no trouble writing a glowing preface for Frantz Fanon's The Wretched of the Earth, a book that the historian Paul Johnson has called "the most influential of all terrorist handbooks," or blithely declaring "I believe in illegality" in La Cause de peuple, a self-described "revolutionary, proletarian, communist paper." In 1973, he even admitted his deep interest in the Baader-Meinhof Group: "a real revolutionary group," he exclaimed, though one that had "started a little too soon." But what did all Sartre's sympathy for the dispossessed amount to? As the French writer Pascal Bruckner observes in The Tears of the White Man, his brilliant study of Western attitudes toward the Third World, some of Sartre's political activism—most notably, his opposition to the French government during the Algerian conflict—demanded real courage; but for the most part, Sartre's "solidarity" with the Third World was hardly more than an impotent, and self-congratulatory, moralism. "Sartre's attitude toward the Third World was a strange mixture of masochism and indifference," Bruckner writes.

Sartre declared that the West was rotten, but after this beginning, was concerned only with the West. He made peace with his conscience after paying a little tithe of guilt.... He wasted a great part of his talent in the esthetics of violence and Stalinism, and with regard to the Third World, ended up showing himself to be not only dogmatic, but inconsequential. The hard-liner was in reality a deserter. Let us remember that he came close to justification of the massacre of Israeli athletes by members of the PLO in 1972. He gave way before revolutionary regimes, just as he gave way to the Maoists, giving his name to ideas and actions that went against his innermost convictions. But, deep down, he did not take them seriously. This follower of the Third World did not accept it unless it fulfilled the familiar role of the victim from whom he had nothing to learn. This preacher of universal involvement, this maniacal devotee of petitions, had no real affection for anyone but members of his own tribe.

The real key to Sartre's character—the key that Miss Cohen-Solal occasionally glimpses but fails to make adequate use of—is his intellectualizing aestheticism, his tendency to dissolve reality in a play of abstract philosophical or political categories. It is in this sense, for example, that we must understand his admission that he tended to regard words as "the quintessence of things." "The truth is," Sartre wrote in a revealing passage from The War Diaries, "I treat my feelings as ideas: with an idea, one pushes it till it cracks—or finally becomes 'what it really was.'" And in fact, Sartre could be quite ruthless about exposing his own failings and selfish motives. But there is pretense even here, for as he noted in The Words, "I am always ready to criticize myself, provided I'm not forced to." The game of self-examination—for it was never more than a game—is merely part of the cynical, anti-bourgeois charade. Again, The Words offers sterling examples of the procedure:

At the age of thirty, I executed the masterstroke of writing in Nausea—quite sincerely, believe me—about the bitter unjustified existence of my fellowmen and exonerating my own. I was Roquentin; I used him to show, without complacency, the texture of my life Later, I gaily demonstrated that man is impossible; I was impossible myself and differed from the others only by the mandate to give expression to that impossibility, which was thereby transfigured and became my most personal possibility, the object of my mission, the springboard of my glory. I was a prisoner of that obvious contradiction, but I did not see it, I saw the world through it. Fake to the marrow of my bones and hoodwinked, I joyfully wrote about our unhappy state. Dogmatic though I was, I doubted everything except that I was the elect of doubt. I built with one hand what I destroyed with the other, and I regarded anxiety as the guarantee of my security; I was happy.

As Miss Cohen-Solal's biography makes clear, Sartre regarded such confessional exercises as a form of exoneration, as if cleverly analyzing one's failings somehow absolved one of their consequences. There is no doubt Jean-Paul Sartre was one of the most gifted writers of his generation; Miss Cohen-Solal reminds us that he was also one of its greatest monsters.

LEV TOLSTOY – BIOGRAPHY BY HENRI TROYAT

Tolstoy is one of my favorite authors, by far the best Russian author. In my youth I read most of his novels, but in my diary I write at the age of 17: "I have read The Death of Ivan Ilyich by Tolstoy in French. Tolstoy starts to torment me, he is too much right. Those types of men are dangerous to society, it is dangerous to hear or read them. It is therefore good that society caused him troubles when he was alive. The greatest tragedy with him is that he is right and tells the truth. Truth tellers are dangerous to society, which is why they should be denounced. That is what Johnson states in his essay On Toleration. Society will condemn those types without my intervention. Would I want to reform the ethics of modern society, like Tolstoy does, but why should I do it? Why should I tell society what not to do? Should I believe in Tolstoy? Epicurus said long before him that a man should enjoy life and why should I believe Tolstoy and not Epicurus? It is true that my inner voice tells me that this life is negative, but I shouldn't forget that this inner voice stems from the education that I have received but who says that my parents are right? Nobody can state who is right." In the film "Me against Myself", I, at the age of 17, condemn/denounce Tolstoy and all those who stand for social justice and say that society is right when it persecutes him. So why should an old man like me be surprised that society (and I himself as a youngster) denounce me as a whistleblower? Tolstoy made me think when I was a teenager what is ethics, why are truth tellers "dangerous" to society, should we denounce and persecute them? Fifty years later when rereading my diary I noticed what a tremendous change has occurred in my life's philosophy, how I was metamorphosed from a materialist hawk to an ethicist dove. And me at the age of 17 would have denounced me at the age of 57 when I published my first academic books and novel on ethics. Probably the seeds that Tolstoy, Zola and Hugo were sowing at the age of 17 and onwards fought in my inner soul my natural materialist tendency and the society norms prevailing in Israel and the Western world and finally succeeded to influence my career in business and made me choose a new ethical career. I reached the same conclusion as Tolstoy that ethics depends on a sensitivity (I would add coming from sufferance), developed over a lifetime, to particular people and specific situations.

Leo Tolstoy, Tolstoy also spelled Tolstoi, Russian in full Lev Nikolayevich, Graf (count) Tolstoy (born August 28, 1828, Yasnaya Polyana, Tula province, Russian Empire—died November 7, 1910, Astapovo, Ryazan province), Russian author, a master of realistic fiction and one of the world's greatest novelists. Tolstoy is best known for his two longest works, War and Peace (1865–69) and Anna Karenina (1875–77), which are commonly regarded as among the finest novels ever written. War and Peace in particular seems virtually to define this form for many readers and critics. Among Tolstoy's shorter works, The Death of Ivan Ilyich (1886) is usually classed among the best examples of the novella. Especially during his last three decades Tolstoy also achieved world renown as a moral and religious teacher. His doctrine of nonresistance to evil had an important influence on Gandhi. Although Tolstoy's religious ideas no longer command the respect they once did, interest in his life and personality has, if anything, increased over the years. Most readers will agree with the assessment of the 19th-century British poet and critic Matthew Arnold that a novel by Tolstoy is not a work of art but a piece of life; the Russian author Isaak Babel commented that, if the world could write by itself, it would write like Tolstoy. Critics of diverse schools have agreed that somehow Tolstoy's works seem to elude all artifice. Most have stressed his ability to observe the smallest changes of consciousness and to record the slightest movements of the body. What another novelist would describe as a single act of consciousness, Tolstoy convincingly breaks down into a series of infinitesimally small steps. According to the English writer Virginia Woolf, who took for granted that Tolstoy was "the greatest of all novelists," these observational powers elicited a kind of fear in readers, who "wish to escape from the gaze which Tolstoy fixes on us." Those who visited Tolstoy as an old man also reported feelings of great discomfort when he appeared to understand their unspoken thoughts. It was commonplace to describe him as godlike in his powers and titanic in his struggles to escape the limitations of the human condition. Some viewed Tolstoy as the embodiment of nature and pure vitality, others saw him as the incarnation of the world's conscience, but for almost all who knew him or read his works, he was not just one of the greatest writers who ever lived but a living symbol of the search for life's meaning.

The scion of prominent aristocrats, Tolstoy was born at the family estate, about 130 miles (210 kilometres) south of Moscow, where he was to live the better part of his life and write his most-important works. His mother, Mariya Nikolayevna, née Princess Volkonskaya, died before he was two years old, and his father Nikolay Ilich, Graf (count) Tolstoy, followed her in 1837. His grandmother died 11 months later, and then his next guardian, his aunt Aleksandra, in 1841. Tolstoy and his four siblings were then transferred to the care of another aunt in Kazan, in western Russia. Tolstoy remembered a cousin who lived at Yasnaya Polyana, Tatyana Aleksandrovna Yergolskaya ("Aunt Toinette," as he called her), as the greatest influence on his childhood, and later, as a young man, Tolstoy wrote some of his most-touching letters to her. Despite the constant presence of death, Tolstoy remembered his childhood in idyllic terms. His first published work, Detstvo (1852; Childhood), was a fictionalized and nostalgic account of his early years. Educated at home by tutors, Tolstoy enrolled in the University of Kazan in 1844 as a student of Oriental languages. His poor record soon forced him to transfer to the less-demanding law faculty, where he wrote a comparison of the French political philosopher Montesquieu's The Spirit of Laws and Catherine the Great's nakaz (instructions for a law code). Interested in literature and ethics, he was drawn to the works of the English novelists Laurence Sterne and Charles Dickens and, especially, to the writings of the French philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau; in place of a cross, he wore a medallion with a portrait of Rousseau. But he spent most of his time trying to be comme il faut (socially correct), drinking, gambling, and engaging in debauchery. After leaving the university in 1847 without a degree, Tolstoy returned to Yasnaya Polyana, where he planned to educate himself, to manage his estate, and to improve the lot of his serfs. Despite frequent resolutions to change his ways, he continued his loose life during stays in Tula, Moscow, and St. Petersburg. In 1851 he joined his older brother Nikolay, an army officer, in the Caucasus and then entered the army himself. He took part in campaigns against the native peoples and, soon after, in the Crimean War (1853–56).

In 1847 Tolstoy began keeping a diary, which became his laboratory for experiments in self-analysis and, later, for his fiction. With some interruptions, Tolstoy kept his diaries throughout his life, and he is therefore one of the most copiously documented writers who ever lived. Reflecting the life he was leading, his first diary begins by confiding that he may have contracted a venereal disease. The early diaries record a fascination with rule-making, as Tolstoy composed rules for diverse aspects of social and moral behaviour. They also record the writer's repeated failure to honour these rules, his attempts to formulate new ones designed to ensure obedience to old ones, and his frequent acts of self-castigation. Tolstoy's later belief that life is too complex and disordered ever to conform to rules or philosophical systems perhaps derives from these futile attempts at self-regulation. Concealing his identity, Tolstoy submitted Childhood for publication in Sovremennik ("The Contemporary"), a prominent journal edited by the poet Nikolay Nekrasov. Nekrasov was enthusiastic, and the pseudonymously published work was widely praised. During the next few years Tolstoy published a number of stories based on his experiences in the Caucasus, including "Nabeg" (1853; "The Raid") and his three sketches about the Siege of Sevastopol during the Crimean War: "Sevastopol v dekabre mesyatse" ("Sevastopol in December"), "Sevastopol v maye" ("Sevastopol in May"), and "Sevastopol v avguste 1855 goda" ("Sevastopol in August"; all published 1855–56). The first sketch, which deals with the courage of simple soldiers, was praised by the tsar. Written in the second person as if it were a tour guide, this story also demonstrates Tolstoy's keen interest in formal experimentation and his lifelong concern with the morality of observing other people's suffering. The second sketch includes a lengthy passage of a soldier's stream of consciousness (one of the early uses of this device) in the instant before he is killed by a bomb. In the story's famous ending, the author, after commenting that none of his characters are truly heroic, asserts that the hero of my story—whom I love with all the power of my soul...who was, is, and ever will be beautiful—is the truth. Readers ever since have remarked on Tolstoy's ability to make such "absolute language," which usually ruins realistic fiction, aesthetically effective.

After the Crimean War Tolstoy resigned from the army and was at first hailed by the literary world of St. Petersburg. But his prickly vanity, his refusal to join any intellectual camp, and his insistence on his complete independence soon earned him the dislike of the radical intelligentsia. He was to remain throughout his life an "archaist," opposed to prevailing intellectual trends. In 1857 Tolstoy traveled to Paris and returned after having gambled away his money. After his return to Russia, he decided that his real vocation was pedagogy, and so he organized a school for peasant children on his estate. After touring western Europe to study pedagogical theory and practice, he published 12 issues of a journal, Yasnaya Polyana (1862–63), which included his provocative articles "Progress i opredeleniye obrazovaniya" ("Progress and the Definition of Education"), which denies that history has any underlying laws, and "Komu u kogu uchitsya pisat, krestyanskim rebyatam u nas ili nam u krestyanskikh rebyat?" ("Who Should Learn Writing of Whom: Peasant Children of Us, or We of Peasant Children?"), which reverses the usual answer to the question. Tolstoy married Sofya (Sonya) Andreyevna Bers, the daughter of a prominent Moscow physician, in 1862 and soon transferred all his energies to his marriage and the composition of War and Peace. Tolstoy and his wife had 13 children, of whom 10 survived infancy. Tolstoy's works during the late 1850s and early 1860s experimented with new forms for expressing his moral and philosophical concerns. To Childhood he soon added Otrochestvo (1854; Boyhood) and Yunost (1857; Youth). A number of stories centre on a single semiautobiographical character, Dmitry Nekhlyudov, who later reappeared as the hero of Tolstoy's novel Resurrection. In "Lyutsern" (1857; "Lucerne"), Tolstoy uses the diary form first to relate an incident, then to reflect on its timeless meaning, and finally to reflect on the process of his own reflections. "Tri smerti" (1859; "Three Deaths") describes the deaths of a noblewoman who cannot face the fact that she is dying, of a peasant who accepts death simply, and, at last, of a tree, whose utterly natural end contrasts with human artifice. Only the author's transcendent consciousness unites these three events.

"Kholstomer" (written 1863; revised and published 1886; "Kholstomer: The Story of a Horse") has become famous for its dramatic use of a favourite Tolstoyan device, "defamiliarization"—that is, the description of familiar social practices from the "naive" perspective of an observer who does not take them for granted. Readers were shocked to discover that the protagonist and principal narrator of "Kholstomer" was an old horse. Like so many of Tolstoy's early works, this story satirizes the artifice and conventionality of human society, a theme that also dominates Tolstoy's novel Kazaki (1863; The Cossacks). The hero of this work, the dissolute and self-centred aristocrat Dmitry Olenin, enlists as a cadet to serve in the Caucasus. Living among the Cossacks, he comes to appreciate a life more in touch with natural and biological rhythms. In the novel's central scene, Olenin, hunting in the woods, senses that every living creature, even a mosquito, "is just such a separate Dmitry Olenin as I am myself." Recognizing the futility of his past life, he resolves to live entirely for others.

Happily married and ensconced with his wife and family at Yasnaya Polyana, Tolstoy reached the height of his creative powers. He devoted the remaining years of the 1860s to writing War and Peace. Then, after an interlude during which he considered writing a novel about Peter the Great and briefly returned to pedagogy (bringing out reading primers that were widely used), Tolstoy wrote his other great novel, Anna Karenina. These two works share a vision of human experience rooted in an appreciation of everyday life and prosaic virtues.

War and Peace

Voyna i mir (1865–69; War and Peace) contains three kinds of material—a historical account of the Napoleonic wars, the biographies of fictional characters, and a set of essays about the philosophy of history. Critics from the 1860s to the present have wondered how these three parts cohere, and many have faulted Tolstoy for including the lengthy essays, but readers continue to respond to them with undiminished enthusiasm. The work’s historical portions narrate the campaign of 1805 leading to Napoleon’s victory at the Battle of Austerlitz, a period of peace, and Napoleon’s invasion of Russia in 1812. Contrary to generally accepted views, Tolstoy portrays Napoleon as an ineffective, egomaniacal buffoon, Tsar Alexander I as a phrasemaker obsessed with how historians will describe him, and the Russian general Mikhail Kutuzov (previously disparaged) as a patient old man who understands the limitations of human will and planning. Particularly noteworthy are the novel’s battle scenes, which show combat as sheer chaos. Generals may imagine they can “anticipate all contingencies,” but battle is really the result of “a hundred million diverse chances” decided on the moment by unforeseeable circumstances. In war as in life, no system or model can come close to accounting for the infinite complexity of human behaviour. Among the book’s fictional characters, the reader’s attention is first focused on Prince Andrey Bolkonsky, a proud man who has come to despise everything fake, shallow, or merely conventional. Recognizing the artifice of high society, he joins the army to achieve glory, which he regards as truly meaningful. Badly wounded at Austerlitz, he comes to see glory and Napoleon as no less petty than the salons of St. Petersburg. As the novel progresses, Prince Andrey repeatedly discovers the emptiness of the activities to which he has devoted himself. Tolstoy’s description of his death in 1812 is usually regarded as one of the most-effective scenes in Russian literature. The novel’s other hero, the bumbling and sincere Pierre Bezukhov, oscillates between belief in some philosophical system promising to resolve all questions and a relativism so total as to leave him in apathetic despair. He at last discovers the Tolstoyan truth that wisdom is to be found not in systems but in the ordinary processes of daily life, especially in his marriage to the novel’s most-memorable heroine, Natasha. When the book stops—it does not really end but just breaks off—Pierre seems to be forgetting this lesson in his enthusiasm for a new utopian plan. In accord with Tolstoy’s idea that prosaic, everyday activities make a life good or bad, the book’s truly wise characters are not its intellectuals but a simple, decent soldier, Natasha’s brother Nikolay, and a generous pious woman, Andrey’s sister Marya. Their marriage symbolizes the novel’s central prosaic values.

The essays in War and Peace, which begin in the second half of the book, satirize all attempts to formulate general laws of history and reject the ill-considered assumptions supporting all historical narratives. In Tolstoy’s view, history, like battle, is essentially the product of contingency, has no direction, and fits no pattern. The causes of historical events are infinitely varied and forever unknowable, and so historical writing, which claims to explain the past, necessarily falsifies it. The shape of historical narratives reflects not the actual course of events but the essentially literary criteria established by earlier historical narratives. According to Tolstoy’s essays, historians also make a number of other closely connected errors. They presume that history is shaped by the plans and ideas of great men—whether generals or political leaders or intellectuals like themselves—and that its direction is determined at dramatic moments leading to major decisions. In fact, however, history is made by the sum total of an infinite number of small decisions taken by ordinary people, whose actions are too unremarkable to be documented. As Tolstoy explains, to presume that grand events make history is like concluding from a view of a distant region where only treetops are visible that the region contains nothing but trees. Therefore Tolstoy's novel gives its readers countless examples of small incidents that each exert a tiny influence—which is one reason that War and Peace is so long. Tolstoy's belief in the efficacy of the ordinary and the futility of system-building set him in opposition to the thinkers of his day. It remains one of the most-controversial aspects of his philosophy.

Anna Karenina

In Anna Karenina (1875–77) Tolstoy applied these ideas to family life. The novel's first sentence, which indicates its concern with the domestic, is perhaps Tolstoy's most famous: "All happy families resemble each other; each unhappy family is unhappy in its own way." Anna Karenina interweaves the stories of three families, the Oblonskys, the Karenins, and the Levins. The novel begins at the Oblonskys, where the long-suffering wife Dolly has discovered the infidelity of her genial and sybaritic husband Stiva. In her kindness, care for her family, and concern for everyday life, Dolly stands as the novel's moral compass. By contrast, Stiva, though never wishing ill, wastes resources, neglects his family, and regards pleasure as the purpose of life. The figure of Stiva is perhaps designed to suggest that evil, no less than good, ultimately derives from the small moral choices human beings make moment by moment. Stiva's sister Anna begins the novel as the faithful wife of the stiff, unromantic, but otherwise decent government minister Aleksey Karenin and the mother of a young boy, Seryozha. But Anna, who imagines herself the heroine of a romantic novel, allows herself to fall in love with an officer, Aleksey Vronsky. Schooling herself to see only the worst in her husband, she eventually leaves him and her son to live with Vronsky. Throughout the novel, Tolstoy indicates that the romantic idea of love, which most people identify with love itself, is entirely incompatible with the superior kind of love, the intimate love of good families. As the novel progresses, Anna, who suffers pangs of conscience for abandoning her husband and child, develops a habit of lying to herself until she reaches a state of near madness and total separation from reality. She at last commits suicide by throwing herself under a train. The realization that she may have been thinking about life incorrectly comes to her only when she is lying on the track, and it is too late to save herself.

The third story concerns Dolly's sister Kitty, who first imagines she loves Vronsky but then recognizes that real love is the intimate feeling she has for her family's old friend, Konstantin Levin. Their story focuses on courtship, marriage, and the ordinary incidents of family life, which, in spite of many difficulties, shape real happiness and a meaningful existence. Throughout the novel, Levin is tormented by philosophical questions about the meaning of life in the face of death. Although these questions are never answered, they vanish when Levin begins to live correctly by devoting himself to his family and to daily work. Like his creator Tolstoy, Levin regards the systems of intellectuals as spurious and as incapable of embracing life's complexity. Both War and Peace and Anna Karenina advance the idea that ethics can never be a matter of timeless rules applied to particular situations. Rather, ethics depends on a sensitivity, developed over a lifetime, to particular people and specific situations. Tolstoy's preference for particularities over abstractions is often described as the hallmark of his thought. Upon completing Anna Karenina, Tolstoy fell into a profound state of existential despair, which he describes in his Ispoved (1884; My Confession). All activity seemed utterly pointless in the face of death, and Tolstoy, impressed by the faith of the common people, turned to religion. Drawn at first to the Russian Orthodox church into which he had been born, he rapidly decided that it, and all other Christian churches, were corrupt institutions that had thoroughly falsified true Christianity. Having discovered what he believed to be Christ's message and having overcome his paralyzing fear of death, Tolstoy devoted the rest of his life to developing and propagating his new faith. He was excommunicated from the Russian Orthodox church in 1901. (Which strengthen my conviction that social awareness, faith of the common people, pursuit of truth, liberty, and ethics, никогда/"nikagda"/never can comply with fundamentalist/orthodox religion, neoliberalism, conservatism, and that probably Jesus would have also been, as Spinoza and Tolstoy, excommunicated/banned from his Christian congregation, as he was from his Jewish).

With the notable exception of his daughter Aleksandra, whom he made his heir, Tolstoy's family remained aloof from or hostile to his teachings. His wife especially resented the constant presence of disciples, led by the dogmatic V.G. Chertkov, at Yasnaya Polyana. Their once happy life had turned into one of the most famous bad marriages in literary history. The story of his dogmatism and her penchant for scenes has excited numerous biographers to take one side or the other. Because both kept diaries, and indeed exchanged and commented on each other's diaries, their quarrels are almost too well documented. Tormented by his domestic situation and by the contradiction between his life and his principles, in 1910 Tolstoy at last escaped incognito from Yasnaya Polyana, accompanied by Aleksandra and his doctor. In spite of his stealth and desire for privacy, the international press was soon able to report on his movements. Within a few days, he contracted pneumonia and died of heart failure at the railroad station of Astapovo. In contrast to other psychological writers, such as Dostoyevsky, who specialized in unconscious processes, Tolstoy described conscious mental life with unparalleled mastery. His name has become synonymous with an appreciation of contingency and of the value of everyday activity. Oscillating between skepticism and dogmatism, Tolstoy explored the most-diverse approaches to human experience. Above all, his greatest works, War and Peace and Anna Karenina, endure as the summit of realist fiction. Gary Saul Morson

Review on Tolstoy's biography by Troyat, by Cipriano on June 3, 2001

Tolstoy once wrote in his diary "Nobody will ever understand me." I can imagine that many biographers have been tormented by those words as they tried to compile and collate information about the extraordinary life of this great "lion" of writers. Troyat has done a remarkable job of this daunting monumental task, and his book ought to be considered essential reading for anyone who wants to understand the lifelong inner struggle that seemed to fuel the creative genius of Leo Tolstoy. As others have commented, it truly does read with the pace and interest of a sweeping epic novel, and there doesn't seem to be any possible chronological gap that could be missing. It's all here: Tolstoy's ancestry, the early loss of both his parents, his military youth in the Caucasus, his bouts with profligacy, his fickle literary friendships, his blunderous courtship and tumultuous (to put it mildly) marriage with Sofya Behrs... and all of his day-to-day glaring contradictory theories that remind us of Herzen's assessment of him: "He oversteps the limits. His brain does not take time to digest the impressions it absorbs." Everything is here: his vacillating acceptance and rejection of earthly comfort, his never ending search for some form of self-imposed suffering to atone for his affluence, his frustrating envy of all who had the good fortune of being unfortunate... his ultimate rejection of a fortune. In my opinion, Leo Tolstoy was the greatest writer the world has ever produced. I've read other biographies of him, and consider Troyat's to be the best for many reasons, not the least of which is his selective restraint with detail. It's obvious that he probably read upwards of a million pages in order to give us this 900, and the finished product is never tedious. His look at Tolstoy is unbiased, he does not try to canonize him. It takes a great man to have every stone of his life upturned like this, and yet emerge as a hero. Tolstoy does!

Review by Thomas Fortenberry on October 23, 1998

Henri Troyat surely deserves every award known to biographers. The man is a genius. This is lucky for us, because Tolstoy's complexity demands genius to even comprehend it. But comprehend it Troyat does. As Doubleday said of Troyat about this book, he possesses "a combination of talents almost Tolstoyan in breadth and scope." How else can you define an author so wonderfully in tune with his subject but by the very definition of that subject? The strength of this book is its depth and scope. It covers everything from Tolstoy's birth to death, and I mean everything: The young nobleman obsessed with charity, the artistic ecstasy, the sexual scandals and insatiability, the marriage and the children, and yet the saintliness of the philosopher and theologian, monk and hermit. Troyat amazingly covers the entirety of Tolstoy's life and works. It is an entire world revealed, in infinite detail, to its horizons and then beyond. (800 pages and, no, that is not large type) This tale of Leo Tolstoy proves the man is every bit as large as his legend, and so much more. Every page is filled with breathtaking revelations, touching and frightening displays, family secrets and public explosions, and intimate looks behind every deed of the man in the very words of his own hand. This book is psychology, philosophy, theology, anthropology, poetry, truth, and on yes, biography so incredibly well-written it reads better than most novels. M. Troyat, my hat is off to you. Thank you for one of the most enjoyable and informative reads of my life.

Notes extracts on Tolstoy/Troyat's biography by Edmund Wilson, February 25, 1971

What M. Troyat has put together is a record of Tolstoy's life from the copious letters, diaries, and memoirs of Lyov Nikolaevich himself, his wife, his children, and his friends. Has ever an eminent writer been so documented by written evidence? The number of members of the family who kept diaries seems from our point of view incredible. One of the daughters, Tanya, started hers at twelve. The conflict between Tolstoy and his wife over Chertkov, against whom she developed, not, it would seem, without cause, a mania of jealousy, over the right to publish her husband's writings, on which she was partly dependent for the income to support the family, and over the possession of his later diaries, in which she felt she had been maligned—all this has been pieced together in a depressing but absorbing narrative. The comic aspects of Lyov Nikolaevich's life from the moment of his religious conversion are too obvious and too well-known to be described here at length. While preaching chastity, poverty, and the inescapable obligation to share the manual labor of the muzhik, he continued to give his wife pregnancies, most of them resulting in children, up through the age of seventy; to live comfortably among his family, with a secretary and a doctor in attendance; and although he did learn to make shoes and sometimes worked in the fields, to occupy himself chiefly with the production, subject to Chertkov's censorship, of his innumerable religious tracts. In all this, despite his profession of humility, there was certainly a fair amount of vanity.

Once for all [he had written at twenty-five] I must accustom myself to the idea that I am an exceptional being, one who is ahead of his period, and who is by temperament absurd, unsociable and always dissatisfied.... I have been lying to myself in imagining that I have friends, that there were people who understood me. A mistake! I have never met a single man who was morally as good as I am, who has always in every situation been drawn, as I have been, to the good. Who, like me, is always ready to sacrifice everything for this ideal. It is on this account that I find no society in which I feel at home. He was later to speak much of his imperfections, but, even discounting the stock reproaches that women make to their husbands, it is possible to sympathize with the Countess, Sofia Andreevna, when she complains of Tolstoy's "vanity, his desire for glory, the need to have himself talked about as much as possible." He unloads everything on me [she writes in her diary], everything without exception: the children, the management of the properties, his relations with people, his business affairs, the household, the publishers. He scorns me for taking care of all that, he shuts himself up in his egoism and constantly criticizes me. And what does he do himself? He goes for walks, he rides, writes a little, does whatever he pleases, does nothing whatever for the family and enjoys the profits of everything: of his daughter's help, of his comfort, of the adulation that is squandered on him, of my submission to him and the trouble I take for him. And the glory, this insatiable thirst for glory to which he has sacrificed everything and continues to sacrifice everything!

In all this, on the part of Tolstoy, there was evidently a certain perversity. He liked to make people uncomfortable by reminding them at the dinner table that not everyone could enjoy these luxuries. "Why," he demanded in the course of one of their parlor games, "must Ustyusha, Alyona, Peter, etc. [the servants] cook, prepare things, sweep, clear away, serve, while the gentlemen eat, stuff themselves, go to the water closet and eat again?" One of the relatives he liked best and who interested him most was a cousin, Alexandrina Tolstoya, who was a maid of honor to one of the grand duchesses. When he made his discovery, by revelation, of what he regarded as the true Christianity, he harangued her insultingly for her Orthodox faith: "Whether rightly or wrongly, I consider your faith as a work of the Devil, uniquely conceived to deprive humanity of the salvation promised by Christ." He recalled this letter after sending it, but wrote another in a not very different vein: I understand that any woman can desire her salvation, but then, if she is a true Christian, she will begin by dissociating herself from the Court, from the world; she will go to matins, she will fast, she will save herself as best she can. How has a courtier's situation come to be a diploma of theology? It is comic in the highest degree! It is as if he had discovered only late in life that the church depends on the state and the state on the police and the army, and that hence all run counter to the teachings of Jesus; and as if he were reprobating other people for not having always known and acted on this.

Is it Tolstoy's notion that Alexandrina, rather remarkably intelligent though she evidently was, would be ready to give up her social position and the Orthodox ritual she had been practicing all her life for the extremely subversive doctrines of her now fanatical cousin? And how much of his gospel of asceticism and his gesture of stripping himself of his property may not have been due to the impulse to worry and exasperate his wife? When he was asked to give land to his peasants, he was able to protest that he was powerless, since everything now was in the name of the Countess. When people wrote him complaining that he was not living up to his principles, he would reply that he was sorry, that he was deeply embarrassed, but was fatally caught in the web of his family and other obligations. At the time of the terrible famine of 1891-2, not far from the Tolstoy estate, he at first took the attitude that there were plenty of people who were ready to feed the starving out of pride in the name of benefactors and in order to prevent them from revolting; whereas the fundamentally important thing, for the purpose of combatting the famine, was not to give the people bread, but "to love the hungry as well as the fed." And yet as the misery grew worse and more people were dying of hunger, he was unable to remain indifferent and, contrary to what he thought were his principles, he undertook to organize effective relief and in this he was aided by the Countess and his daughters. He fought for and financed the Doukhobors, who were then being persecuted for their refusal to serve in the army; and though he would not take part in political and social reforms, he was in general opposed to suppression by the government and insisted on the paramount importance of obeying one's individual conscience. He was perhaps a kind of Protestant at the same time that his aspirations to saintliness were quite those of a Russian holy man. It is evidence of his great vitality, of his extraordinary insight into other personalities, and of his genuine if intermittent efforts toward nobility of moral character that he should have been able to command, to the end of his long life, so much reverence as well as admiration. All this M. Troyat has got into his book compactly and without much commentary. (It should be mentioned that the Dial Press has published a translation by Ann Dunnigan of The Last Year of Leo Tolstoy by V.F. Bulgakov. Bulgakov was Tolstoy's last secretary, and he shows how, up to the agonies of the final moments, the family went on performing the familiar rituals of Russian life, the celebration of days sacred to the saint after whom one had been named, the amusements such as “post office” and chess, the enjoyment of music and the discussion of literature, and the entertainment of guests on a scale which to us seems quite staggering.)

In college I read translations of “The Kreutzer Sonata” and “Master and Man,” and although I was rather impressed by the latter, the absurdity of the former and the bleakness of both discouraged me from further reading of Tolstoy. When, however, I was studying Russian after a trip to the Soviet Union, I sat down to War and Peace. I came to it under favorable circumstances. I was then living alone in the country in Connecticut beside the small Mianus River. I was buried in a fairly large forest with not another house in sight. I would begin to read or write after dinner and not go to bed till four in the morning. It was winter, and the only drive was covered with snow. I could imagine myself perfectly in the country house of the Bolkonskys, when the smooth and worldly official, Prince Kuragin, is coming to present his worthless son for the hand of the Princess Maria, whom he wants to marry for her money, and her father, the laconic old Prince, whose attitude toward the Kuragins is anything but cordial, makes his servant put back on the road, in order to obstruct their arrival, the snow that has just been removed in their honor. I was surprised to find the book so amusing: the scene at the death of Pierre’s father and the episode of debauchery with the bear. The atmosphere was anything but bleak. And the vitality of the characters was amazing. Tolstoy is perhaps—in a less caricatured way from those of either Dickens or Proust—the greatest mimic in fiction, and this is something that cannot be brought over in translation. Though I did not always know which syllable of a Russian word should be stressed and could not have read a page aloud correctly, the voices of the characters, in my winter solitude, seemed to come right out of the pages and to animate my little house: the dry brusquery of the old Bolkonsky, compelling his son, Prince Andrei, to acknowledge the failure of his marriage: “Ploxo delo, a?” “Chto ploxo?” “Zhena!” (“Bad business, eh?” “What is bad?” “Wife!”); the wheedling diplomacy of the old Kuragin, who tries to reassure the grasping elder princess by calling her “Moya golubushka” (“my dear little dove”); the girlish high spirits of Natasha, more or less transformed by Constance Garnett into a proper little English girl such as one finds in the drawings of Du Maurier, with her gay and rather infantile family. “Smotrite na papà” (“Look at papa”), cried Natasha for all the ballroom to hear ... (completely forgetting that she was dancing with a grown-up), bending her curly head to her knees and filling the whole room with her ringing laugh.... “Batyushka-to nash! Orel!” (“Our Father! An eagle!”) exclaimed the nurse loudly from a doorway. And the invidious often comic contrast between the characters when they are speaking their formal French, and when they relapse into their good old blunt Russian. The only possible objection to War and Peace has been made by Dmitri Mirsky: that it is something of an idealized idyl of the life of the old nobility, of the author’s grandparents and parents, the mother whom he never knew, the father who died while he was still a child. The closer he comes to his own experience the more he is bound to be biased by the moral problems he is forced to confront.

I do not know how much the foreign reader of Tolstoy is aware, in Anna Karenina, of the issue that Tolstoy is raising between the life of the Karenins and Vronskys in St. Petersburg, and that of Levin and Kitty in the country outside Moscow. For young people, especially young women, the shade of contempt that the author feels toward the people of Petersburg may not be perceptible at all. The affair of Anna and Vronsky may seem simply a romantic though tragic love story. Yet it is plain that Anna’s creator does not take a lenient view of Anna, so beautiful but so immoral: she is damned by the Biblical epigraph; and Vronsky is made little short of ridiculous. Through a reckless desire to excel, he has broken the back of his mare in the races, as he is later to do with Anna; he bungles an attempt at suicide in which it seems evident that he has only half wanted to succeed; and, after Anna's effective self-destruction, he goes off in the train with nothing worse than a toothache, to the war against the Turks, of which Tolstoy did not approve. A stern moral judgment is half-hidden in this partly seductive story.

Childhood, Adolescence, and Youth, all written when Tolstoy was in his twenties, are in the main autobiographical, but are mixed with elements of fiction. They are remarkable and very interesting but in certain ways rather unsympathetic. Yet what is unsympathetic is due to Tolstoy's instinct for telling the truth about himself. His characteristic traits are seen to have emerged very early. His reaction to being made to speak French—bound up with his reaction against mere elegance—when he is reprimanded by his sister's governess for speaking Russian instead of French, makes him want to chatter in Russian; and he loathes a later French tutor, who disapproved of him and punished him severely. In our country, the people of a certain class [he writes in Youth], who love in a beautiful way, not only talk to other people about their love, but invariably, talk about it in French. It sounds strange and absurd to say so, but I am sure that there have been many people of a certain society, especially the women, whose love for their friends, their husbands, their children would be quite annihilated if they were forbidden to talk about them in French. This prejudice against the French was probably reinforced later as a result of the Crimean war, in which Tolstoy as a young man took part, when the Russians were beaten by the French and the English. A certain exhibitionism in Tolstoy's religious attitude is illustrated thus early in his story of his first confession, which has taken place in the narrator's home, but which he feels obliged to supplement when, after lying in bed at night and remembering a sin which he has failed to acknowledge, he gets up early and goes to the monastery in order to discharge the duty of confessing it. The priest is at morning mass and cannot attend to him at once, and while waiting in a rather bare and shabby anteroom, "which spoke to me clearly of some new and up to now unknown life, of a solitary life of prayer and quiet and peaceful happiness, 'The months pass, the years pass,' I thought, 'he is always alone, he is always at peace, he always feels that his conscience is clean before God and that his prayers are heard by Him.' " This impulse toward asceticism continues to be felt but it has always kept a certain dramatic character, a certain desire to be known as acting out these gestures of humility. One may note here also the scene in one of the uncontinued beginnings of the projected novel on the Decembrist conspirators, in which a man of fifty-two, going to church on Maundy Thursday, remembers how once, at the age of twelve, he had felt a temptation to interrupt the mass by crowing like a cock and is obliged to make an effort to dismiss such buffooneries, which even now haunt him as impulses, and recognize his sins and pray. It is this kind of impious self-assertion, later masked as apostolic vocation, that is seen to develop to immense proportions in the later years of Tolstoy's life and that makes his professions and behavior, so insulting and troublesome to his wife and which result in his excommunication, rather suspect as a demonstration of saintliness. He was obviously disappointed at never being penalized by the government, which for once in his case showed good sense. He longed to be imprisoned, a martyr.

What confronted Tolstoy now that he seemed to have disposed of all other obligations and to have attained all personal goals was the degraded position of the muzhiks. And then there was the question of salvation. The gulf between the peasants and the educated classes in Russia was so wide that it presented to the Russian intellectuals and Westernized landowners a problem that, if they tried to think seriously about it, made them reformers or revolutionaries, or filled them with despair or stunned them. From Chernyshevsky, with his novel Chto Delat'?, to Lenin's political program with the same title, What To Do?, this question was reiterated through the nineteenth century and during the later revolutionary period. Tolstoy echoed it in Tak Chto-zhe Nam Delat'? in connection with his exploration of the misery of the Moscow poor. This question, as put by Tolstoy, sent a vibration through all the West from Gandhi to Jane Addams.

There were poverty and degraded people everywhere, but in the West it was easier for the comfortable classes to be callous to this state of things or to contribute to occasional charities, and, except in the case of the American Negroes, the gulf was not so wide, even after the emancipation of the serfs, between the educated people and the peasants, as it continued to be in Russia.

One must always remember this appalling disproportion in connection with Russian literature and history. Among the great writers, Turgenev, abandoning his estates, left Russia, except for short visits, in order to live in the West and made fun of the Russian idealists who thought that the salvation of Russia was coming “out of the peasants’ overcoat”; Chekhov, the grandson of a serf, was occupied mostly with the educated classes, but gave horrible pictures of the peasantry. Tolstoy tried to be a muzhik and denounced all art, including his own, which could not be understood by the peasant; the lower classes had to be gradually educated. Tolstoy, in his schools for his peasants, had of course tried to do this in a very small way. What a terribly long distance there was to go is shown by the slow results of education in the Soviet schools. Tolstoy’s relapse into religion, in a belief, as the only hope, in the example of the virtuous and benevolent man, seems a throwing up of hands in despair at the spectacle of so much evil, of which the abasement of so many human beings constituted a large part. Tolstoy found himself now in the unusual, for a great writer perhaps the unprecedented, situation of having everything he could possibly want in a material way and having realized, in a literary way, all of his possible ambitions. He had a title and a distinguished ancestry and an extensive country estate, no adverse parental pressures, an attractive and intelligent wife, first-rate intellectual powers, and an imaginative genius which had enabled him to produce two masterpieces of fiction that were bringing in a good deal of money: when he heard of his former colleagues’ receiving important official appointments, he would sometimes remark ironically that “though he had not himself earned a Generalship in the artillery, he had at any rate won a Generalship in literature.”

But he had served in the war against Shamil and had nearly been killed by a shell, he had fought in the Crimean warfare, and had declined or disregarded three crosses for valor; he had had innumerable women; he had seen all he wanted to see of Western Europe. He had acted as an Arbiter of the Peace, after the liberation of the serfs, with such an impartial justice as to infuriate many of his fellow nobles; he had instituted and directed a school for the peasants’ children on a system of his own creation. He was, although sensitive, physically strong. It is no wonder—though so rare a phenomenon—that, having experienced and accomplished so much at a relatively early age, he should ask himself, as he does in A Confession, what there was to hope for and aim at next. Life at last has confronted him with a great blank. How is this blank to be filled? There is no further way to excel save through some effort of spiritual ennoblement. The difference between Tolstoy’s great early novels and his so much less satisfactory late ones is due to his having been able, in the former, to split up his own complicated personality into the several personalities of his characters—as in Pierre Bezukhov, Prince André, and Nicholas Rostov—each true to its own laws and each more or less of a piece. When he falls back on dramatizing his own mixed nature in an attempt to reduce it to something more easily acceptable, he produces such relatively implausible creations as Ivan Ilyich, Father Sergius, and Prince Nekhlyudov.

Resurrection is more impressive because it deals with actuality, a situation much less of fantasy. It seems to me an underrated book. It has become a critics’ cliché to say that it is by no means equal to its more celebrated predecessors. It was begun in December, 1889, twelve years after Anna Karenina, but not finished till 1899, when the author made it ready to be published for the purpose of raising money to finance the journey to Canada of the heretical sect of the Doukhobors, who refused to serve in the army. Tolstoy said of the novel that he did not have time to make it what it ought to be; but what he seems to have meant was not that he did not have time to polish and prune it but that he ought to have brought it closer to his conception of the kind of thing that could be easily understood by an unsophisticated audience. Prince Nekhlyudov has to sit on a jury and finds himself in the position of judging a peasant girl with whom he has had a love affair and who has since then lapsed into prostitution and is now accused wrongly of having robbed and poisoned a merchant. Nekhlyudov offers to marry her, but she cannot take this seriously; and most of the rest of the story consists of his persistent attempts to rectify the judicial error. These take us through a whole panorama of tsarist officialdom, which gives Tolstoy an excellent opportunity to exploit his inexhaustible interest in how different kinds of people behave and live. He even includes a group of young revolutionaries, of whose projects he disapproves but whose point of view he is able to understand.

These judges and generals and rebels open up for Tolstoy a whole new department of contemporary life. Resurrection takes you closer to the machinery of the government than anything he has written before. In the end, Nekhlyudov succeeds in getting his girl's sentence commuted—hardly a possibility under the present Soviet regime—but he insists on following her to Siberia. We get a vividly imagined picture of an elderly general and his wife who have been assigned to duty there—another instance of Tolstoy's success in presenting the life of a family existing under special conditions. Nekhlyudov's former love finds an admirer better suited to her than he is; and Nekhlyudov discovers the New Testament, which he borrows from one of the prisoners. Tolstoy was contemplating a sequel which should show Nekhlyudov's subsequent struggles to lead a truly Christian life, but this sequel was never written. His own problems, one supposes, overwhelmed him. The title of this novel involves a kind of play on words that does not come out in translation. "Voskresenia" means both "Sunday" and "resurrection," and the satirical accounts of the Orthodox services, one of them in a prison chapel, are intended by Tolstoy to contrast with Nekhlyudov's real voskresenia when he is brought to it by the words of Jesus.

Tolstoy's moral principles come into play in his treatment of Nicholas I, who is made a detestable figure: he acquires a respectable young girl as his mistress and, while enjoying a conviction of righteousness for having abolished capital punishment, thinks nothing of virtually condemning to death by making him run a gauntlet of beatings, a student who has struck his professor. But a fragment and an omitted chapter of the manuscript, unpublished at the time of Tolstoy's death, show how his preoccupation with the lives of different kinds of families led him away from this bitter portrait. He began to become interested in the Royal Family and he seems to be trying to explain how Nicholas got to be what he was. This additional matter has also unaccountably been omitted from the selective Soviet edition. It is illuminating, by the way, to compare the texts published by Chertkov in Germany, which show in brackets what the censorship would not allow, with the recent English edition of Babi Yar, which shows omissions imposed by the Soviet censor. The effect is very much the same. In the one case, what is removed is everything derogatory to the Tsar; in the second, everything that unpleasantly reflects on the recent procedures of the Soviet government. In all Tolstoy's talk about love and God, it is a little hard to know what he means by either. He does not seem very much to love others; and what is his communion with God? He is more impressive when, at the time of the famine—though, as he said, in violation of his principles—he is saving the lives of the starving, or when he is compromising with his children and with Sophie Andreevna, to the last of whom he owed so much. For the rest, the cult of love and God seems often, as with Father Sergius, an arid self-directed exercise that simply raises the worshipper in his own esteem.

REMBRANDT – BIOGRAPHY/NOVEL BY GLADYS SCHMITT

Rembrandt was the first painter that I liked, read arts books on his works, and a biography on his life. When I was a teenager, long before I adored the Impressionists I admired Rembrandt, and later on the Renaissance painters, especially after I studied for a whole year, when I was 17, at the Hebrew University - The Art of Renaissance in Italy. The life of Rembrandt is fascinating, while the life of most of the Impressionists is rather boring, not the Post Impressionists of course – Van Gogh, Gauguin and Toulouse-Lautrec. If I was a painter I would paint as Rembrandt as he managed to depict life in the most vivid way in his paintings and portraits. He painted historical events, as The Stoning of Saint Stephen (1625) – Musée des Beaux-Arts, Lyon, Descent from the Cross (1634) – Oil on canvas, 158 × 117 cm, looted from the Landgrave of Hesse-Kassel (or Hesse-Cassel), Germany in 1806, currently Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg, Belshazzar's Feast (1635) – National Gallery, London, Aristotle Contemplating a Bust of Homer (1653) – Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, Bathsheba at Her Bath (1654) – The Louvre, Paris, Ahasuerus and Haman at the Feast of Esther (1660) – Pushkin Museum, Moscow, The Conspiracy of Claudius Civilis (1661) – Nationalmuseum, Stockholm (Claudius Civilis led a Dutch revolt against the Romans) (most of the cut up painting is lost, only the central part still exists). Rembrandt painted also contemporary events as The Anatomy Lesson of Dr. Nicolaes Tulp (1632) – Mauritshuis, The Hague, The Night Watch, formally The Militia Company of Captain Frans Banning Cocq (1642) – Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, Syndics of the Drapers' Guild (Dutch De Staalmeesters, 1662) – Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, The Jewish Bride (1665) – Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam. Rembrandt painted portraits as Jacob de Gheyn III (1632) – Dulwich Picture Gallery, London, Artemisia (1634) – Oil on canvas, 142 × 152 cm, Museo del Prado, Madrid, Boaz and Ruth (1643) aka The Old Rabbi Old Man – Woburn Abbey/Gemaldegalerie, Berlin, Old Man with a Gold Chain ("Old Man with a Black Hat and Gorget") (c. 1631) Art Institute of Chicago, Portrait of Dirck van Os (1662) - Joslyn Art Museum, Omaha, Nebraska. Rembrandt painted also many self-portraits, as Self-Portrait with Beret and Turned-Up Collar (1659), National Gallery of Art, Self-Portrait, 1629; Indianapolis Museum of Art, Indianapolis, Self-portrait as a young man, 1634, Uffizi, Florence, Self-portrait wearing a white feathered bonnet, 1635, Buckland Abbey, Devon, Self Portrait, oil on canvas, 1652. Kenwood House, London, Self Portrait at the age of 63 - Dated 1669, the year he died, though he looks much older in other portraits. National Gallery, London.

Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn (15 July 1606 – 4 October 1669) was a Dutch painter and etcher. He is generally considered one of the greatest painters and printmakers in European art and the most important in Dutch history. His contributions to art came in a period of great wealth and cultural achievement that historians call the Dutch Golden Age when Dutch Golden Age painting, although in many ways antithetical to the Baroque style that dominated Europe, was extremely prolific and innovative, and gave rise to important new genres in painting. Having achieved youthful success as a portrait painter, Rembrandt's later years were marked by personal tragedy and financial hardships. Yet his etchings and paintings were popular throughout his lifetime, his reputation as an artist remained high, and for twenty years he taught many important Dutch painters. Rembrandt's greatest creative triumphs are exemplified especially in his portraits of his contemporaries, self-portraits and illustrations of scenes from the Bible. His self-portraits form a unique and intimate biography, in which the artist surveyed himself without vanity and with the utmost sincerity. In his paintings and prints he exhibited knowledge of classical iconography, which he molded to fit the requirements of his own experience; thus, the depiction of a biblical scene was informed by Rembrandt's knowledge of the specific text, his assimilation of classical composition, and his observations of Amsterdam's Jewish population. Because of his empathy for the human condition, he has been called "one of the great prophets of civilization."

In a letter to Huygens, Rembrandt offered the only surviving explanation of what he sought to achieve through his art: the greatest and most natural movement, translated from de meeste en de natuurlijkste beweegelijkheid. The word "beweechgelickhijt" is also argued to mean "emotion" or "motive." Whether this refers to objectives, material or otherwise, is open to interpretation; either way, critics have drawn particular attention to the way Rembrandt seamlessly melded the earthly and spiritual. Earlier 20th century connoisseurs claimed Rembrandt had produced over 600 paintings, nearly 400 etchings and 2,000 drawings. More recent scholarship, from the 1960s to the present day (led by the Rembrandt Research Project), often controversially, has winnowed his oeuvre to nearer 300 paintings. His prints, traditionally all called etchings, although many are produced in whole or part by engraving and sometimes drypoint, have a much more stable total of slightly under 300. It is likely Rembrandt made many more drawings in his lifetime than 2,000, but those extant are more rare than presumed. Two experts claim that the number of drawings whose autograph status can be regarded as effectively "certain" is no higher than about 75, although this is disputed. The list was to be unveiled at a scholarly meeting in February 2010. At one time about ninety paintings were counted as Rembrandt self-portraits, but it is now known that he had his students copy his own self-portraits as part of their training. Modern scholarship has reduced the autograph count to over forty paintings, as well as a few drawings and thirty-one etchings, which include many of the most remarkable images of the group. Some show him posing in quasi-historical fancy dress, or pulling faces at himself. His oil paintings trace the progress from an uncertain young man, through the dapper and very successful portrait-painter of the 1630s, to the troubled but massively powerful portraits of his old age. Together they give a remarkably clear picture of the man, his appearance and his psychological make-up, as revealed by his richly weathered face.

In his portraits and self-portraits, he angles the sitter's face in such a way that the ridge of the nose nearly always forms the line of demarcation between brightly illuminated and shadowy areas. A Rembrandt face is a face partially eclipsed; and the nose, bright and obvious, thrusting into the riddle of halftones, serves to focus the viewer's attention upon, and to dramatize, the division between a flood of light—an overwhelming clarity—and a brooding duskiness. In a number of biblical works, including The Raising of the Cross, Joseph Telling His Dreams and The Stoning of Saint Stephen, Rembrandt painted himself as a character in the crowd. Durham suggests that this was because the Bible was for Rembrandt "a kind of diary, an account of moments in his own life." Among the more prominent characteristics of Rembrandt's work are his use of chiaroscuro, the theatrical employment of light and shadow derived from Caravaggio, or, more likely, from the Dutch Caravaggisti, but adapted for very personal means. Also notable are his dramatic and lively presentation of subjects, devoid of the rigid formality that his contemporaries often displayed, and a deeply felt compassion for mankind, irrespective of wealth and age. His immediate family—his wife Saskia, his son Titus and his common-law wife Hendrickje—often figured prominently in his paintings, many of which had mythical, biblical or historical themes. See also: List of paintings by Rembrandt and List of drawings by Rembrandt.

Rembrandt painted the large painting The Militia Company of Captain Frans Banning Cocq between 1640 and 1642. This picture was called De Nachtwacht by the Dutch and The Night Watch by Sir Joshua Reynolds because by the 18th century the picture was so dimmed and defaced that it was almost indistinguishable, and it looked quite like a night scene. After it was cleaned, it was discovered to represent broad day—a party of musketeers stepping from a gloomy courtyard into the blinding sunlight. The piece was commissioned for the new hall of the Kloveniersdoelen, the musketeer branch of the civic militia. Rembrandt departed from convention, which ordered that such genre pieces should be stately and formal, rather a line-up than an action scene. Instead he showed the militia readying themselves to embark on a mission (what kind of mission, an ordinary patrol or some special event, is a matter of debate). Contrary to what is often said, the work was hailed as a success from the beginning. Parts of the canvas were cut off (approximately 20% from the left hand side was removed) to make the painting fit its new position when it was moved to Amsterdam town hall in 1715; the Rijksmuseum has a smaller copy of what is thought to be the full original composition; the four figures in the front are at the centre of the canvas. The painting is now in the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam.

The most notable collections of Rembrandt's work are at Amsterdam's Rijksmuseum, including The Night Watch and The Jewish Bride, the Mauritshuis in The Hague, the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, the National Gallery in London, Gemäldegalerie in Berlin, Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister in Dresden, The Louvre, Nationalmuseum, Stockholm, and Schloss Wilhelmshöhe in Kassel. The Royal Castle in Warsaw displays two paintings by Rembrandt from Lanckoroński collection in a separate, dedicated room of Renaissance Courtier Lodgings. Notable collections of Rembrandt's paintings in the USA are in the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Frick Collection in New York City, and the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. The Rembrandt House Museum in central Amsterdam in the house he bought at the height of his success has furnishings that are mostly not original, but period pieces comparable to those Rembrandt might have had, and paintings reflecting Rembrandt's use of the house for art dealing. His printmaking studio has been set up with a printing press, where replica prints are printed. The museum has a few Rembrandt paintings, many loaned, but an important collection of his prints, a good selection of which are on rotating display. All major print rooms have large collections of Rembrandt prints, although as some exist in only a single impression, no collection is complete. The degree to which these collections are displayed to the public, or can easily be viewed by them in the print room, varies greatly. I have visited several times most of the collections of Rembrandt's works at the leading museums: Amsterdam's Rijksmuseum, the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Frick Collection in New York City, and the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C, the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, the National Gallery in London, Gemäldegalerie in Berlin, The Louvre in Paris, and other museums in Europe. In my humble opinion, it is impossible to grasp the genius of Rembrandt with photos of his paintings, you have to see the paintings at the Museums, with proper light, and after restoration.

It is said Vincent Van Gogh stood and stared at a Rembrandt painting in the Louvre and said, "This man must have lived and died many times to be able to paint like this." I can not believe how little information on-line there is on "Rembrandt" by Gladys Schmitt. It took adding the author's name to find it on Goodreads. I have read just about every book you can imagine on great artists. Fiction, non-fiction, fictionalized, you name it. All I have to say is, this book is the best one of them all. If you want to climb into Rembrandt's life, share his unusual surroundings, interact with his companions, experience the ups and downs of his artistic life, this book is the way to do it. Yes, the details are fantastic. It's as if Schmitt was a regular guest at Rembrandt's studio. But more importantly, Schmitt captures the spirit of the times and of the man. Personally I think Rembrandt is the best painter that ever lived. I, like Van Gogh, have stood and stared at his paintings (in the Art Institute in Chicago) and marvelled. One painting I went to over and over again, hoping against hope that it would still be there. I felt like the man portrayed in the painting could walk right out of it. I could sense his mood by the nuanced crease in his forehead. His intensity by the glare of his brown eyes. Sense his dignity by the arch in his back. His position by the fabulous silk of his attire and the plume in his gold helmet. When I encounter an artist like Rembrandt, my first thought is, "How did he do it?" How does a human being reach such fabulous heights of mastery? If you'd like to know how Rembrandt achieved his, this book will inform you. Schmitt writes: "In his pursuit of the ultimate he had cheated himself of what every dolt, every mediocrity had taken and enjoyed." Follow Rembrandt to the heights of the ultimate in this book. Fair warning: you will leave this world behind while you do.

An extract from the novel by Gladys Schmitt:

He was only four years old when the Spanish had come to besiege his own city; and he could never be sure, when he looked back on that protracted agony, what he could take for a real memory and what had come alive for him because he had heard it recounted a hundred times as reason for thanksgiving at a full table. Had he really stood on the walls and seen the country between the battlements and the yellowish water swarming with the ranks of the black-beards, settled as thick as horseflies on a piece of summer meat? Had he heard them shout up that not a sparrow could get in or out of the city now, or had somebody told it to him afterwards, aping their crazy Dutch? He was sure he could remember the taste of the malt-cake that everybody had eaten after the last of the bread was gone: teeth covered with a sticky coating and tongue cleaving to the roof of the mouth were sensations a man was not likely to make up. He probably could not actually recall the rats, the cats, the dogs, the flesh of sick horses, for his mother told them she had never named the meat and had done whatever she could to obliterate the nature of the creature before she put it on the plate. Nettles, plantain, timothy grass, leaves and bark of trees, boiled leather--these too he had eaten, folding his hands over the board while his father, without irony, had invited the Lord to be a guest at the meal and had finished off the grace with a prayer for the coming of the navy of the Prince of Orange, which was rumored to lie just out of sight beyond the wild stretch of dunes outside the westward wall.

Six months that siege had lasted, and he remembered it mostly as a great, tired silence; the recollection came upon him like a sickness whenever he read in Ecclesiastes, "And the mourners go about the streets." Pestilence had come to work hand in hand with starvation, and no man rose from his bed without asking himself which of those he loved had died in the night. There was not even any weeping--nobody had the strength for weeping--and every utterance, from "God rest his soul" to "Go pick up your toys" came out on a sigh. One thing he was sure he could remember: his mother and he and some of the neighbor women and their children--so cadaverously like what hung on the Spanish gibbets that it seemed strange they should be moving about-- went to the cemetery, the only place left as yet unstripped, to eat the grass and ivy from the graves. As they ate, they had kept up a strange, psalmlike murmur, half speech, half chanting; and his persistent curiosity to know what they had been saying had driven him to ask his mother about it in later, better days. "Ah, do you remember that?" she said. "We asked them to forgive us for taking what was theirs. We kept the wind from a neighboring town where thousands were being put to the sword. That Harmen Gerritszoon or any other man should have come alive and whole out of those times was a proof of God's kindness to His little ones; otherwise they would certainly have perished or been warped into Devil's children, taking in fear as they did with every breath and choking on the curdle of fear in their mother's milk.

The dead had had a watery sleep of it in the weeks before the deliverance. The little navy of the Prince of Orange was the sole remaining hope of Leyden, since the army and the Prince's brother Louis had been slaughtered in the mud at the battle of Mookerheyde. There was only one way to bring the fleet up to the battlements: they sallied out by night and smashed their dykes, so that the sea came in upon the land and the ships were borne in over the dunes and villages on the encroaching flood. Those ships had come over drowned crops and farmsteads, past balconies and steeple and floating houses--but they had come. And what had ruined the land had also devoured the invader; for months after the inundation the receding waters had yielded up the corpses of the Spanish veterans--hundreds had been caught before they could make good their flight. With such a beginning, who would be foolish enough to hanker after more than the good God had provided? That the Spaniard should have marched away, that the sea should have seeped back into its appointed place, that the drowned meadows and villages should have had their resurrection was enough and more than enough. Harmen Gerritszoon considered himself blessed in the possession of a fine mill, a good house, and a kitchen garden flourishing in what had once been waterlogged country outside the city walls. Adding "van Rijn" to his name was only a prudent measure taken for the sake of his customers; to pretend that he had gotten himself knighted by some Papist king in a foreign court was alien to his nature and his history. His cup ran over, goodness and mercy had followed him, and he would have considered it a sacrilege to ask for anything beyond the bounty in his hands.

Not that he saw the world as uniformly benign, washed in the tepid gleam of an easy piety. Nobody could know the fullness of the light without having looked into the shadow; and there were shadows in his own family that neither he nor his wife tried to hide from themselves. Gerrit, the eldest and the handsomest of the children who had stayed with him, was an almost helpless cripple; both his shins had been shattered when he swerved under the weight of a sack of barley and toppled over the side of the stairs. And Gerrit was not one of those whose spirits sweeten with affliction: his face, startlingly out of keeping with the soft and sunny curls around it, was greyed and hollowed, and his lips were as wry as if he had a perpetual bad taste in his mouth. Adriaen was healthy and well-married and solidly set up as a shoemaker in a decent shop; but because his ailing elder brother had been given much by necessity, and his gifted younger brother Rembrandt even more by the parents' choice, he felt himself cheated. Every now and again he let it be known that if he had been enrolled at the university he would never have abandoned it to waste time on crayons and paint-pots.

RACHEL – BIOGRAPHY BY CLAUDE DUFRESNE – LA DIVINE TRAGEDIE

I discovered Rachel after reading her biography. I heard of course of Rachel, but knew very little about her life, basically that she was born to a very poor Jewish family, had a fantastic talent as tragedienne especially in Phedre by Racine, that she had many lovers, and died very young. But in her biography I discovered an admirable person, that made a tremendous impact on the theater – as her acting style was characterized by clear diction and economy of gesture, which represented a major change from the exaggerated style of those days, as society was beginning to demand the highly emotional, realistic, instinctual acting styles of the Romantics. I hate exaggeration in theater and in life in general, unless it is for seeing 50+ films in 10 days at the Haifa Film Festival, 30+ plays, films, museums, concerts, & operas in 10 days at a visit in Paris, or writing day and night in 18 days a 5 acts momentous play "Nelly Doron". I saw in films how actors played before Rachel and it seems really ridiculous, but I do not need films for that as the Israeli/Russian actors who founded the Israeli Theater in Habimah played like that for 50 years, and only in "Sabras" theaters as the Cameri you could enjoy "modern" acting without all the mannerism of the old school. Rachel was the first actress that experienced modern acting (as usual "modern" for me starts somewhere in the 19th century), as Ibsen was the father of modern theater, and Antonioni, Fellini and La nouvelle vague were the precursors of modern films.

To all the xenophobic French people, the old bourgeoisie, the anti-Dreyfusards, and the Petainists (luckily enough, most of the Frenchmen at least today are open-minded and xenophiles) I would say how is it, if you hate so much strangers, that some of the most talented personalities/icons in France in the last two centuries were not born in France or their parents and grandparents were foreigners – Rachel and Sarah Bernhard were Jewish and I'll not write here once again about the immense contribution of Jews to France – I have done it at length in my survey on Modern Literature. But let us give other examples – Zola's father was Italian, Duma's grandmother was an African slave, Heinrich Heine was German, Chopin was Pole, Offenbach was German, Marie Curie was Pole, Stravinsky was Russian, Diaghilev was Russian, Yves Montand was Italian, Luis Mariano was Spanish, Dalida was Egyptian/Italian, Edith Piaf's mother and grandparents were Italian and Moroccan. Charles Aznavour is Armenian, Georges Moustaki and Guy Beart are Egyptian/Jews, Camus was a pied-noir Algerian of Spanish descent, Ionesco was Romanian, Beckett was Irish, Nana Mouskouri is Greek, Zinedine Yazid Zidane is from Algerian descent, Picasso was Spanish, Vlaminck was Flemish, Van Gogh was Dutch, Brancusi – Romanian, Picabia's father was Cuban, Utrillo's father was apparently Spanish, Marc Chagall was born in Belarus, Jacques Lipchitz was born in Lithuania, Max Ernst was born in Germany, Giacometti was Swiss, Vasarely was born in Hungary, Balthus was born in Poland. Can there be more Frenchmen than Zola and Dumas? More French than Offenbach's operas, yet he was a Jewish German. Can there be a more French singer than Yves Montand, yet he was Italian, than Aznavour, yet he is Armenian. Van Gogh is Provence par excellence, yet he was Dutch. And so Rachel the most French actress was the daughter of a Swiss Jewish pedlar.

We'll compare here the entries/articles on Rachel, the French actress, by Wikipedia, Encyclopedia Britannica, and Lyndon Orr, as the difference of presentation is really amazing.

Elisabeth "Eliza/Élisa" Rachel Félix (also Elizabeth-Rachel Félix), better known only as Mademoiselle Rachel (February 21, 1821 – January 3, 1858), was a French actress. She became a prominent figure in French society, and was the mistress of, among others, Napoleon III and Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul Bonaparte. Efforts by newspapers to publish pictures of her on her deathbed led to the introduction of privacy rights into French law. Rachel Félix was born Elisa Félix on February 28, 1821, in Mumpf, Rheinfelden, Aargau. Her father, Jacob Félix, was a peddler and her mother, Esther Hayer, was a Bohemian dealer in second-hand clothes. She had four sisters (Sarah, Rebecca, Dinah, and Leah) and one brother, Raphael. As a child, Félix earned money singing and reciting in the streets. She arrived in Paris in 1830 intending to become an actress. She took elocution and singing lessons, eventually studying under the instruction of the musician Alexandre-Étienne Choron and Saint-Aulaire. She also took dramatic arts classes at the Conservatoire. She debuted in La Vendéenne in January 1837, at the Théâtre du Gymnase. Delestre-Poirson, the director, gave her the stage name Rachel, which she chose to keep in her private life. Rachel was described as a very serious and committed student. She was admired for her intelligence, work ethic, diction, and ability to act. Auditioning in March, 1838, she starred in Pierre Corneille's Horace at the Théâtre-Français at the age of 17. During this time she also began a liaison with Louis Véron, the former director of the Paris Opera, which became the subject of much gossip. From 1838 to 1842, she lived in a third-floor apartment in Paris's Galerie Véro-Dodat. Her fame spread throughout Europe after success in London in 1841, and she was often associated with the works of Racine, Voltaire, and Corneille. She toured Brussels, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. Though French classical tragedy was no longer popular at the time Rachel entered the stage of Comédie-Française, she remained true to her classical roots, arousing audiences with a craving for the tragic style of writers like Corneille, Racine and Molière. She created the title role in Eugène Scribe's Adrienne Lecouvreur. Her acting style was characterized by clear diction and economy of gesture; she evoked a high demand for classical tragedy to remain on the stage. This represented a major change from the exaggerated style of those days, as society was beginning to demand the highly emotional, realistic, instinctual acting styles of the Romantics. Félix completely rejected the Romantic Drama movement happening in nineteenth-century France. She was best known for her portrayal of the title role in Phèdre. Eliza Rachel, as the actress was also known, was reportedly a great tragedienne.

Félix became the mistress of Napoleon I's son, Alexandre Joseph Count Colonna-Walewski, and together they had a son, Alexandre Colonna-Walewski, in 1844. He entered the diplomatic service and died at his post in Turin in 1898. After an affair with Arthur Bertrand, Félix left for England. There she briefly had an affair with Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, later Napoleon III, as well as with Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul Bonaparte. Her second son, Gabriel-Victor Félix, was never acknowledged by Bertrand. He became a navy man and died in the Congo in 1889. Rachel never married, although she had many lovers. When Walewski upbraided her for not remaining faithful to him, she retorted, "I am as I am; I prefer renters to owners." Félix's health declined after a long tour of Russia. She died of tuberculosis in Le Cannet, Alpes-Maritimes, France. Upon her deathbed, she wrote many farewell letters to her sons, family members, lovers, colleagues and theatre connections at Comédie-Française. She is buried in a mausoleum in the Jewish part of Père Lachaise Cemetery and Avenue Rachel in Paris was named after her. The English theatre critic James Agate published a biography of her in 1928, which echoes the anti-Semitism of his day. A modern account of her life and legacy by Rachel Brownstein was published in 1995. The character Vashti in Charlotte Brontë's novel Ilchester was based on Félix, whom Brontë had seen perform in London. The raschel knitting-machine is according to the OED also named after her, and so is a face powder in light tannish colour, used in artificial light.

RACHEL (1821-1858), French actress, whose real name was Elizabeth Felix, the daughter of poor Jew pedlars, was born on the 28th of February 1821, at Mumpf, in the canton of Aargau, Switzerland. At Reims she and her elder sister, Sophia, afterwards known as Sarah, joined a troupe of Italian children who made their living by singing in the cafes, Sarah singing and Elizabeth, then only four years of age, collecting the coppers. In 1830 they came to Paris, where they sang in the streets, Rachel giving such patriotic songs as the Parisienne and the Marseillaise with a rude but precocious energy which evoked special admiration and an abundant shower of coppers. Etienne Choron, a famous teacher of singing, was so impressed with the talents of the two sisters that he undertook to give them gratuitous instruction, and after his death in 1833 they were received into the Conservatoire. Rachel made her first appearance at the Gymnase in Paul Duport's La Vendéenne on the 4th of April 1837, with only mediocre success. But on the 12th of June in the following year she succeeded, after great difficulty, in making a début at the Théâtre Français, as Camille in Corneille's Horace, when her remarkable genius at once received general recognition. In the same year she played Roxane in Racine's Bajazet, winning a complete triumph, but it was in Racine's Phèdre, which she first played on the 21st of January 1843, that her peculiar gifts were most strikingly manifested. Her range of characters was limited, but within it she was unsurpassable. She excelled particularly in the impersonation of evil or malignant passion, in her presentation of which there was a majesty and dignity which fascinated while it repelled. By careful training her voice, originally hard and harsh, had become flexible and melodious, and its low and muffled notes under the influence of passion possessed a thrilling and penetrating quality that was irresistible. In plays by contemporary authors she created the characters of Judith and Cleopatra in the tragedies of Madame de Girardin, but perhaps her most successful appearance was in 1849 in Scribe and Legouv  s Adrienne Lecouvreur, which was written for her. In 1841 and in 1842 she visited London, where her interpretations of Corneille and Racine were the sensation of the season. In 1855 she made a tour in the United States with comparatively small success, but this was after her powers, through continued ill-health, had begun to deteriorate. She died of consumption at Cannet, near Nice, on the 4th of January 1858, and was buried in the Jewish part of the cemetery of Père Lachaise in Paris. Jules G. Rachel by Lyndon Orr Outside of the English-speaking peoples the nineteenth century witnessed the rise and triumphant progress of three great tragic actresses. The first two of these—Rachel Felix and Sarah Bernhardt—were of Jewish extraction; the third, Eleanor Duse, is Italian. All of them made their way from pauperism to fame; but perhaps the rise of Rachel was the most striking. In the winter of 1821 a wretched peddler named Abraham—or Jacob—Felix sought shelter at a dilapidated inn at Mumpf, a village in Switzerland, not far from Basel. It was at the close of a stormy day, and his small family had been toiling through the snow and sleet. The inn was the lowest sort of hovel, and yet its proprietor felt that it was too good for these vagabonds. He consented to receive them only when he learned that the peddler's wife was to be delivered of a child. That very night she became the mother of a girl, who was at first called Elise. So unimportant was the advent of this little waif into the world that the burgomaster of Mumpf thought it necessary to make an entry only of the fact that a peddler's wife had given birth to a female child. There was no mention of family or religion, nor was the record anything more than a memorandum.

Under such circumstances was born a child who was destined to excite the wonder of European courts—to startle and thrill and utterly amaze great audiences by her dramatic genius. But for ten years the family—which grew until it consisted of one son and five daughters—kept on its wanderings through Switzerland and Germany. Finally, they settled down in Lyons, where the mother opened a little shop for the sale of second-hand clothing. The husband gave lessons in German whenever he could find a pupil. The eldest daughter went about the cafes in the evening, singing the songs that were then popular, while her small sister, Rachel, collected coppers from those who had coppers to spare. Although the family was barely able to sustain existence, the father and mother were by no means as ignorant as their squalor would imply. The peddler Felix had studied Hebrew theology in the hope of becoming a rabbi. Failing this, he was always much interested in declamation, public reading, and the recitation of poetry. He was, in his way, no mean critic of actors and actresses. Long before she was ten years of age little Rachel—who had changed her name from Elise—could render with much feeling and neatness of eloquence bits from the best-known French plays of the classic stage. The children's mother, on her side, was sharp and practical to a high degree. She saved and scrimped all through her period of adversity. Later she was the banker of her family, and would never lend any of her children a sou except on excellent security. However, this was all to happen in after years.

When the child who was destined to be famous had reached her tenth year she and her sisters made their way to Paris. For four years the second-hand clothing-shop was continued; the father still taught German; and the elder sister, Sarah, who had a golden voice, made the rounds of the cafes in the lowest quarters of the capital, while Rachel passed the wooden plate for coppers. One evening in the year 1834 a gentleman named Morin, having been taken out of his usual course by a matter of business, entered a BRASSERIE for a cup of coffee. There he noted two girls, one of them singing with remarkable sweetness, and the other silently following with the wooden plate. M. Morin called to him the girl who sang and asked her why she did not make her voice more profitable than by haunting the cafes at night, where she was sure to meet with insults of the grossest kind. "Why," said Sarah, "I haven't anybody to advise me what to do." M. Morin gave her his address and said that he would arrange to have her meet a friend who would be of great service to her. On the following day he sent the two girls to a M. Choron, who was the head of the Conservatory of Sacred Music. Choron had Sarah sing, and instantly admitted her as a pupil, which meant that she would soon be enrolled among the regular choristers. The beauty of her voice made a deep impression on him. Then he happened to notice the puny, meager child who was standing near her sister. Turning to her, he said: "And what can you do, little one?" "I can recite poetry," was the reply. "Oh, can you?" said he. "Please let me hear you." Rachel readily consented. She had a peculiarly harsh, grating voice, so that any but a very competent judge would have turned her away. But M. Choron, whose experience was great, noted the correctness of her accent and the feeling which made itself felt in every line. He accepted her as well as her sister, but urged her to study elocution rather than music.

She must, indeed, have had an extraordinary power even at the age of fourteen, since not merely her voice but her whole appearance was against her. She was dressed in a short calico frock of a pattern in which red was spotted with white. Her shoes were of coarse black leather. Her hair was parted at the back of her head and hung down her shoulders in two braids, framing the long, childish, and yet gnome-like face, which was unusual in its gravity. At first she was little thought of; but there came a time when she astonished both her teachers and her companions by a recital which she gave in public. The part was the narrative of Salema in the "Abufar" of Ducis. It describes the agony of a mother who gives birth to a child while dying of thirst amid the desert sands. Mme. de Barviera has left a description of this recital, which it is worth while to quote: While uttering the thrilling tale the thin face seemed to lengthen with horror, the small, deep-set black eyes dilated with a fixed stare as though she witnessed the harrowing scene; and the deep, guttural tones, despite a slight Jewish accent, awoke a nameless terror in every one who listened, carrying him through the imaginary woe with a strange feeling of reality, not to be shaken, off as long as the sounds lasted. Even yet, however, the time had not come for any conspicuous success. The girl was still so puny in form, so monkey-like in face, and so gratingly unpleasant in her tones that it needed time for her to attain her full growth and to smooth away some of the discords in her peculiar voice.

Three years later she appeared at the Gymnase in a regular debut; yet even then only the experienced few appreciated her greatness. Among these, however, were the well-known critic Jules Janin, the poet and novelist Gauthier, and the actress Mlle. Mars. They saw that this lean, raucous gutter-girl had within her gifts which would increase until she would be first of all actresses on the French stage. Janin wrote some lines which explain the secret of her greatness: All the talent in the world, especially when continually applied to the same dramatic works, will not satisfy continually the hearer. What pleases in a great actor, as in all arts that appeal to the imagination, is the unforeseen. When I am utterly ignorant of what is to happen, when I do not know, when you yourself do not know what will be your next gesture, your next look, what passion will possess your heart, what outcry will burst from your terror-stricken soul, then, indeed, I am willing to see you daily, for each day you will be new to me. To-day I may blame, to-morrow praise. Yesterday you were all-powerful; to-morrow, perhaps, you may hardly win from me a word of admiration. So much the better, then, if you draw from me unexpected tears, if in my heart you strike an unknown fiber; but tell me not of hearing night after night great artists who every time present the exact counterpart of what they were on the preceding one.

It was at the Theatre Francais that she won her final acceptance as the greatest of all tragedians of her time. This was in her appearance in Corneille's famous play of "Horace." She had now, in 1838, blazed forth with a power that shook her no, less than it stirred the emotions and the passions of her hearers. The princes of the royal blood came in succession to see her. King Louis Philippe himself was at last tempted by curiosity to be present. Gifts of money and jewels were showered on her, and through sheer natural genius rather than through artifice she was able to master a great audience and bend it to her will. She had no easy life, this girl of eighteen years, for other actresses carped at her, and she had had but little training. The sordid ways of her old father excited a bitterness which was vented on the daughter. She was still under age, and therefore was treated as a gold-mine by her exacting parents. At the most she could play but twice a week. Her form was frail and reed-like. She was threatened with a complaint of the lungs; yet all this served to excite rather than to diminish public interest in her. The newspapers published daily bulletins of her health, and her door was besieged by anxious callers who wished to know her condition. As for the greed of her parents, every one said she was not to blame for that. And so she passed from poverty to riches, from squalor to something like splendor, and from obscurity to fame. Much has been written about her that is quite incorrect. She has been credited with virtues which she never possessed; and, indeed, it may be said with only too much truth that she possessed no virtues whatsoever. On the stage while the inspiration lasted she was magnificent. Off the stage she was sly, treacherous, capricious, greedy, ungrateful, ignorant, and unchaste. With such an ancestry as she had, with such an early childhood as had been hers, what else could one expect from her?

She and her old mother wrangled over money like two pickpockets. Some of her best friends she treated shamefully. Her avarice was without bounds. Some one said that it was not really avarice, but only a reaction from generosity; but this seems an exceedingly subtle theory. It is possible to give illustrations of it, however. She did, indeed, make many presents with a lavish hand; yet, having made a present, she could not rest until she got it back. The fact was so well known that her associates took it for granted. The younger Dumas once received a ring from her. Immediately he bowed low and returned it to her finger, saying: "Permit me, mademoiselle, to present it to you in my turn so as to save you the embarrassment of asking for it." Mr. Vandam relates among other anecdotes about her that one evening she dined at the house of Comte Duchatel. The table was loaded with the most magnificent flowers; but Rachel's keen eyes presently spied out the great silver centerpiece. Immediately she began to admire the latter; and the count, fascinated by her manners, said that he would be glad to present it to her. She accepted it at once, but was rather fearful lest he should change his mind. She had come to dinner in a cab, and mentioned the fact. The count offered to send her home in his carriage.

"Yes, that will do admirably," said she. "There will be no danger of my being robbed of your present, which I had better take with me." "With pleasure, mademoiselle," replied the count. "But you will send me back my carriage, won't you?" Rachel had a curious way of asking every one she met for presents and knickknacks, whether they were valuable or not. She knew how to make them valuable. Once in a studio she noticed a guitar hanging on the wall. She begged for it very earnestly. As it was an old and almost worthless instrument, it was given her. A little later it was reported that the dilapidated guitar had been purchased by a well-known gentleman for a thousand francs. The explanation soon followed. Rachel had declared that it was the very guitar with which she used to earn her living as a child in the streets of Paris. As a memento its value sprang from twenty francs to a thousand. It has always been a mystery what Rachel did with the great sums of money which she made in various ways. She never was well dressed; and as for her costumes on the stage, they were furnished by the theater. When her effects were sold at public auction after her death her furniture was worse than commonplace, and her pictures and ornaments were worthless, except such as had been given her. She must have made millions of francs, and yet she had very little to leave behind her. Some say that her brother Raphael, who acted as her personal manager, was a spendthrift; but if so, there are many reasons for thinking that it was not his sister's money that he spent. Others say that Rachel gambled in stocks, but there is no evidence of it. The only thing that is certain is the fact that she was almost always in want of money. Her mother, in all probability, managed to get hold of most of her earnings.

Much may have been lost through her caprices. One instance may be cited. She had received an offer of three hundred thousand francs to act at St. Petersburg, and was on her way there when she passed through Potsdam, near Berlin. The King of Prussia was entertaining the Russian Czar. An invitation was sent to her in the shape of a royal command to appear before these monarchs and their guests. For some reason or other Rachel absolutely refused. She would listen to no arguments. She would go on to St. Petersburg without delay. "But," it was said to her, "if you refuse to appear before the Czar at Potsdam all the theaters in St. Petersburg will be closed against you, because you will have insulted the emperor. In this way you will be out the expenses of your journey and also the three hundred thousand francs." Rachel remained stubborn as before; but in about half an hour she suddenly declared that she would recite before the two monarchs, which she subsequently did, to the satisfaction of everybody. Some one said to her not long after: "I knew that you would do it. You weren't going to give up the three hundred thousand francs and all your travelling expenses."

"You are quite wrong," returned Rachel, "though of course you will not believe me. I did not care at all about the money and was going back to France. It was something that I heard which made me change my mind. Do you want to know what it was? Well, after all the arguments were over some one informed me that the Czar Nicholas was the handsomest man in Europe; and so I made up my mind that I would stay in Potsdam long enough to see him." This brings us to one phase of Rachel's nature which is rather sinister. She was absolutely hard. She seemed to have no emotions except those which she exhibited on the stage or the impish perversity which irritated so many of those about her. She was in reality a product of the gutter, able to assume a demure and modest air, but within coarse, vulgar, and careless of decency. Yet the words of Jules Janin, which have been quoted above, explain how she could be personally very fascinating. In all Rachel's career one can detect just a single strand of real romance. It is one that makes us sorry for her, because it tells us that her love was given where it never could be openly required.

During the reign of Louis Philippe the Comte Alexandre Walewski held many posts in the government. He was a son of the great Napoleon. His mother was that Polish countess who had accepted Napoleon's love because she hoped that he might set Poland free at her desire. But Napoleon was never swerved from his well-calculated plans by the wish of any woman, and after a time the Countess Walewska came to love him for himself. It was she to whom he confided secrets which he would not reveal to his own brothers. It was she who followed him to Elba in disguise. It was her son who was Napoleon's son, and who afterward, under the Second Empire, was made minister of fine arts, minister of foreign affairs, and, finally, an imperial duke. Unlike the third Napoleon's natural half-brother, the Duc de Moray, Walewski was a gentleman of honor and fine feeling. He never used his relationship to secure advantages for himself. He tried to live in a manner worthy of the great warrior who was his father. As minister of fine arts he had much to do with the subsidized theaters; and in time he came to know Rachel. He was the son of one of the greatest men who ever lived. She was the child of roving peddlers whose early training had been in the slums of cities and amid the smoke of bar-rooms and cafes. She was tainted in a thousand ways, while he was a man of breeding and right principle. She was a wandering actress; he was a great minister of state. What could there be between these two?

George Sand gave the explanation in an epigram which, like most epigrams, is only partly true. She said: "The count's company must prove very restful to Rachel." What she meant was, of course, that Walewski's breeding, his dignity and uprightness, might be regarded only as a temporary repose for the impish, harsh-voiced, infinitely clever actress. Of course, it was all this, but we should not take it in a mocking sense. Rachel looked up out of her depths and gave her heart to this high-minded nobleman. He looked down and lifted her, as it were, so that she could forget for the time all the baseness and the brutality that she had known, that she might put aside her forced vivacity and the self that was not in reality her own. It is pitiful to think of these two, separated by a great abyss which could not be passed except at times and hours when each was free. But theirs was, none the less, a meeting of two souls, strangely different in many ways, and yet appealing to each other with a sincerity and truth which neither could show elsewhere. The end of poor Rachel was one of disappointment. Tempted by the fact that Jenny Lind had made nearly two million francs by her visit to the United States, Rachel followed her, but with slight success, as was to be expected. Music is enjoyed by human beings everywhere, while French classical plays, even though acted by a genius like Rachel, could be rightly understood only by a French-speaking people. Thus it came about that her visit to America was only moderately successful. She returned to France, where the rising fame of Adelaide Ristori was very bitter to Rachel, who had passed the zenith of her power. She went to Egypt, but received no benefit, and in 1858 she died near Cannes. The man who loved her, and whom she had loved in turn, heard of her death with great emotion. He himself lived ten years longer, and died a little while before the fall of the Second Empire.

VERDI – BIOGRAPHIES BY PETER SOUTHWELL-SANDER – VERDI HIS LIFE & TIME AND BY CLAUDIO CASINI IN ITALIAN

The philosopher Isaiah Berlin ranked Verdi in the 'naïve' category. It is probably my destiny to like most "naïve" writers – Emile Zola, painters - Renoir, and composers - Verdi. I am probably not sophisticated enough to appreciate James Joyce, Picasso and Wagner, my tastes are more "vulgar", "commonplace", popular. In cuisine – I prefer steaks and schnitzels to escargots and crabs, I prefer water to wine, in pop music I prefer Paul Anka to the Beatles, in sitcoms I prefer the Golden Girls to Seinfeld. Only in drama I am sophisticated enough to prefer Ionesco, Duerrenmatt, Sartre, Pinter, Strindberg, Shakespeare, Racine, Corneille, Lope de Vega, Pirandello, Lorca, Chekhov, Ibsen, Goethe, Brecht, O'Neill, Sophocles, Sobol, but even then I am also "naïve" as I appreciate and love also Feydeau, Rostand, Pagnol, Arthur Miller, Moliere, Odets, Kishon, Schnitzler, Anski, Williams, Aristophanes, Courteline, Goldoni, Mamet, Niel Simon, Albee, Ziegfeld Follies-styled revue, My Fair Lady, Oklahoma, South Pacific, The King and I, Seven Brides to Seven Brothers, Hello Dolly, Hair, Annie Get Your Gun, The Sound of Music, and Offenbach's operettas Orphée aux enfers (1858), La belle Hélène (1864), La vie parisienne (1866), La Grande-Duchesse de Gérolstein (1867) and La Périhole (1868)...

Not only in drama, in films also – my favorite cineasts are Ingmar Bergman, Antonioni, Fellini, La nouvelle vague, Jean Renoir, Elia Kazan, Fritz Lang, David Lean, Ken Loach, Billy Wilder, Woody Allen, Richard Attenborough, Milos Forman, Stanley Kramer, Sidney Lumet, Alan Pakula, Roman Polanski, Steven Spielberg, Francis Coppola, Sergei Eisenstein, Luis Bunuel, Pedro Almodovar, the Greek Theo Angelopoulos, the Portuguese Manoel de Oliveira who made films even at the age of 104, the Indian Satyajit Ray, the Israeli excellent directors since 2000, but I am also very fond of Frank Capra, Claude Berri, Charlie Chaplin, Clint Eastwood, Ernst Lubitsch, Otto Preminger, Rouben Mamoulian, Tony Richardson, some Indian films with Raj Kapoor, some Spanish films – La violetera, Joselito..., some Greek films with Aliki, films by Menahem Golan, Vittorio de Sica, the Austrian trilogy of Sissi, French films with Fernandel...

Personally, I don't agree at all to categorize authors, cineasts, and composers to "naïve" and "sophisticated". Verdi is by far a better composer than Wagner, Renoir is by far a better painter than Picasso, and Zola is by far a better author than Joyce. Greatness is achieved when a composer, painter or author, a cineast, playwright or philosopher, succeeds in moving you extremely emotionally and rationalistically – if quite all the paintings by Picasso leave you indifferent he is not as good as Renoir who moves me to tears, if Joyce's Ulysses does not move you at all – he is not as good as Zola who captivates you from the first moment, if Wagner's operas irritates you to the extreme – while Verdi's operas delight you to the extreme, he is not as good as Verdi. Aristotle is by far a better philosopher than Kant, as I understand and identify with him. Bergman and Capra are both great directors as Scenes from a Marriage and It's a Wonderful Life both make you cry and move you extremely, even that quite all the experts would say that Bergman is better – but not for me. Feydeau makes you laugh "sophisticately" not less than Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing – and so both are for me excellent playwrights and I enjoy seeing their plays in the same way. I admire Gaudi and cannot appreciate Gothic architecture, and so for me Gaudi is a better architect. I would also say that my son's architecture – Joseph Cory/Geotectura moves me much more than the Bauhaus architecture, and therefore for me he is a much better architect than Walter Gropius, but his wife Alma Mahler would disagree.

So, am I objective or subjective in my judgements? Frankly, I couldn't care less – I am writing an autobiography on all the topics that interest me, so even if 99% of the experts would disagree with me, this book is my book, my beliefs, my tastes, my philosophy of life. I adore Verdi, and so most of the opera lovers, much more than what they love Wagner, I may be populist, naïve, I am also willing to consider that I don't like Wagner because he was an anti-Semite (but I like Ken Loach and Theodorakis although they loathe Israel), while Verdi composed Nabucco on the sorrows of the Hebrews and compared it to the sorrows of the enslaved Italians. That I like Zola because he wrote J'accuse, but here there is not even a case because Joyce also loved very much Jews and his leading protagonist in Ulysses is a Jew. I am quite sure that Picasso loved much more Jews (he hated Nazism and Fascism – Guernica...) than Renoir, who was a notorious anti-Semite and denounced Pissarro's family as part of "that Jewish race of tenacious cosmopolitans and draft-dodgers who come to France only to make money". Renoir and Degas were anti-Dreyfusards, while Monet, Signac and Pissarro were Dreyfusards (and so was the Norwegian Grieg who refused in 1899 to come to play in Paris because of France's injustice to Dreyfus, and for that he was ostracized by some of his old friends). I prefer Renoir to Pissarro although the first was anti-Semitic and the second was Jew, as cultural preferences have nothing to do with social biases. Back to Verdi from this digression (I am becoming worse than Cervantes who in Don Quijote digresses all the time, yet his book is a masterpiece, but I excuse those digressions as "stream of consciousness", which shows that Cervantes was as modern as Sartre and Joyce).

I wrote extensively in this book on Verdi, Rigoletto that I know by heart, and many of his operas. I bring herebelow extracts from Wikipedia's entry on Verdi and others, but I would like to start with a paragraph from Casini's Verdi on Macbeth, the opera which I have seen in 2010 in Dresden and made me discover a Verdi that I did not know before, certainly a Verdi who is much more different than the Verdi of Rigoletto, La Traviata, Il Trovatore, Nabucco, Aida...: "La novita di Macbeth consiste nel fatto che Verdi adopero lo schema convenzionale del melodramma in maniera oggettiva e spregiudicata, piegandolo a rappresentare un dramma barbarico nella maniera piu realistica possibile, piu vicina, per Verdi, al modello tragico di Shakespeare. L'impegno imponeva un concetto rivoluzionario del canto, rispetto a quel che esso era nel melodramma italiano." Macbeth's novelty consists in the fact that Verdi depicts the story in an objective way, representing this barbaric drama in the most realistic way, much closer to Shakespeare's tragic model. Macbeth disclosed a revolutionory concept, which was quite new.

Giuseppe Fortunino Francesco Verdi (10 October 1813 – 27 January 1901) was an Italian composer of operas. Verdi was born near Busseto to a provincial family of moderate means, and developed a musical education with the help of a local patron. Verdi came to dominate the Italian opera scene after the era of Bellini, Donizetti and Rossini, whose works significantly influenced him, becoming one of the pre-eminent opera composers in history. In his early operas Verdi demonstrated a sympathy with the Risorgimento movement which sought the unification of Italy. He also participated briefly as an elected politician. The chorus "Va, pensiero" from his early opera Nabucco (1842), and similar choruses in later operas, were much in the spirit of the unification movement, and the composer himself became esteemed as a representative of these ideals. An intensely private person, Verdi however did not seek to ingratiate himself with popular movements and as he became professionally successful was able to reduce his operatic workload and sought to establish himself as a landowner in his native region. He surprised the musical world by returning, after his success with the opera Aida (1871), with three late masterpieces: his Requiem (1874), and the operas Otello (1887) and Falstaff (1893). His operas remain extremely popular, especially the three peaks of his 'middle period': Rigoletto, Il trovatore and La traviata, and the bicentenary of his birth in 2013 was widely celebrated in broadcasts and performances. Verdi was committed to the publisher Giovanni Ricordi for an opera—which became Stiffelio—for Trieste in the Spring of 1850; and, subsequently, following negotiations with La Fenice, developed a libretto with Piave and wrote the music for Rigoletto (based on Victor Hugo's Le roi s'amuse) for Venice in March 1851. This was the first of a sequence of three operas (followed by Il trovatore and La traviata) which were to cement his fame as a master of opera. The failure of Stiffelio (attributable not least to the censors of the time taking offence at the taboo subject of the supposed adultery of a clergyman's wife and interfering with the text and roles) incited Verdi to take pains to rework it, although even in the completely recycled version of Aroldo (1857) it still failed to please. Rigoletto, with its intended murder of royalty, and its sordid attributes, also upset the censors. Verdi would not compromise:

What does the sack matter to the police? Are they worried about the effect it will produce?...Do they think they know better than I?...I see the hero has been made no longer ugly and hunchbacked!! Why? A singing hunchback...why not?...I think it splendid to show this character as outwardly deformed and ridiculous, and inwardly passionate and full of love. I chose the subject for these very qualities...if they are removed I can no longer set it to music. Verdi substituted a Duke for the King, and the public response and subsequent success of the opera all over Italy and Europe fully vindicated the composer. Aware that the melody of the Duke's song "La donna è mobile" ("Woman is fickle") would become a popular hit, Verdi excluded it from orchestral rehearsals for the opera, and rehearsed the tenor separately. Verdi and his mistress Strepponi moved into Sant'Agata on 1 May 1851. May also brought an offer for a new opera from La Fenice, which Verdi eventually realised as La traviata. That was followed by an agreement with the Rome Opera company to present Il trovatore for January 1853. Verdi now had sufficient earnings to retire, should he have wished to do so. He had reached a stage where he could develop his operas as he wished, rather than be dependent on commissions from third parties. Il trovatore was in fact the first opera he wrote without a specific commission (apart from Oberto). At around the same time he began to consider creating an opera from Shakespeare's King Lear. After first (1850) seeking a libretto from Cammarano (which never appeared), Verdi later (1857) commissioned one from Antonio Somma, but this proved intractable, and no music was ever written. Verdi began work on Il trovatore after the death of his mother in June 1851. The fact that this is "the one opera of Verdi's which focuses on a mother rather than a father" is perhaps related to her death. In the winter of 1851–52 Verdi decided to go to Paris with Strepponi where he concluded an agreement with the Opéra to write what became Les vêpres siciliennes, his first original work in the style of grand opera. In February 1852, the couple attended a performance of Alexander Dumas fils's play, The Lady of the Camellias; Verdi immediately began to compose music for what would later become La traviata.

After his visit to Rome for Il trovatore in January 1853, Verdi worked on completing La traviata, but with little hope of its success, due to his lack of confidence in any of the singers engaged for the season. Furthermore, the management insisted that the opera be given a historical, not a contemporary setting. The premiere in March 1853 was indeed a failure: Verdi wrote: "Was the fault mine or the singers'? Time will tell." Subsequent productions (following some rewriting) throughout Europe over the following two years fully vindicated the composer; Roger Parker has written "Il trovatore consistently remains one of the three or four most popular operas in the Verdian repertoire: but it has never pleased the critics". Having achieved some fame and prosperity, Verdi began in 1859 to take an active interest in Italian politics. His early commitment to the Risorgimento movement is difficult to estimate accurately; in the words of the music historian Philip Gossett "myths intensifying and exaggerating [such] sentiment began circulating" during the nineteenth century. An example is the claim that when the "Va, pensiero" chorus in Nabucco was first sung in Milan, the audience, responding with nationalistic fervour, demanded an encore. As encores were expressly forbidden by the government at the time, such a gesture would have been extremely significant. But in fact the piece encored was not "Va, pensiero" but the hymn "Immenso Jehova". The growth of the "identification of Verdi's music with Italian nationalist politics" perhaps began in the 1840s. In 1848, the nationalist leader Giuseppe Mazzini, (whom Verdi had met in London the previous year) requested Verdi (who complied) to write a patriotic hymn. The opera historian Charles Osborne describes the 1849 La battaglia di Legnano as "an opera with a purpose" and maintains that "while parts of Verdi's earlier operas had frequently been taken up by the fighters of the Risorgimento...this time the composer had given the movement its own opera" It was not until 1859 in Naples, and only then spreading throughout Italy, that the slogan "Viva Verdi" was used as an acronym for Viva Vittorio Emanuele Re D'Italia (Viva Victor Emmanuel King of Italy), (who was then king of Sardinia). After Italy was unified in 1861, many of Verdi's early operas were increasingly re-interpreted as Risorgimento works with hidden Revolutionary messages that perhaps had not been originally intended by either the composer or his librettists. The first performance of Falstaff took place at La Scala on 9 February 1893. For the first night, official ticket prices were thirty times higher than usual. Royalty, aristocracy, critics and leading figures from the arts all over Europe were present. The performance was a huge success; numbers were encored, and at the end the applause for Verdi and the cast lasted an hour. That was followed by a tumultuous welcome when the composer, his wife and Boito arrived at the Grand Hotel de Milan. Even more hectic scenes ensued when he went to Rome in May for the opera's premiere at the Teatro Costanzi, when crowds of well-wishers at the railway station initially forced Verdi to take refuge in a tool-shed. He witnessed the performance from the Royal Box at the side of King Umberto.

Not all of Verdi's personal qualities were amiable. John Rosselli concluded after writing his biography that "I do not very much like the man Verdi, in particular the autocratic rentier-cum-estate owner, part-time composer, and seemingly full-time grumbler and reactionary critic of the later years", yet admits that like other writers, he must "admire him, warts and all...a deep integrity runs beneath his life, and can be felt even when he is being unreasonable or wrong." Budden suggests that "With Verdi...the man and the artist on many ways developed side by side." Ungainly and awkward in society in his early years, "as he became a man of property and underwent the civilizing influence of Giuseppina,...[he] acquired assurance and authority." He also learnt to keep himself to himself, never discussing his private life and maintaining when it suited his convenience legends about his supposed 'peasant' origins, his materialism and his indifference to criticism. Mendelsohn describes the composer as "an intensely private man who deeply resented efforts to inquire into his personal affairs. He regarded journalists and would-be biographers, as well as his neighbors in Busseto and the operatic public at large, as an intrusive lot, against whose prying attentions he needed constantly to defend himself." The writer Friedrich Schiller (four of whose plays were adapted as operas by Verdi) distinguished two types of artist in his 1795 essay On Naïve and Sentimental Poetry. The philosopher Isaiah Berlin ranked Verdi in the 'naïve' category – "They are not...self-conscious. They do not...stand aside to contemplate their creations and express their own feelings....They are able...if they have genius, to embody their vision fully." (The 'sentimentals' seek to recreate nature and natural feelings on their own terms – Berlin instances Wagner – "offering not peace, but a sword."). Verdi's operas are not written according to an aesthetic theory, or with a purpose to change the tastes of their audiences. In conversation with a German visitor in 1887 he is recorded as saying that, whilst "there was much to be admired in [Wagner's operas] Tannhäuser and Lohengrin...in his recent operas [Wagner] seemed to be overstepping the bounds of what can be expressed in music. For him "philosophical" music was incomprehensible." Although Verdi's works belong, as Rosselli admits "to the most artificial of genres...[they] ring emotionally true: truth and directness make them exciting, often hugely so." That is not to say his operas did not come as great innovations. What sounds to a modern listener as derivative of the bel canto, his first major success, Nabucco, came as a something entirely new. Never before had opera been so harmonically complex and direct. No longer was there the empty vocal display of the bel canto period composers. Granted, there is a significant amount of vocal fireworks, but they exist for the purpose of drama, not to show off singers. Aside from this, his use of the chorus was entirely new. Before Nabucco, an opera's chorus was limited to be only a background voice, another instrument. In Nabucco, this is abolished; he uses the chorus as character, to show the suffering and consensus of the people. The famous "Va, pensiero" is an example of this. The first of his "big three" operas, Rigoletto, followed by La Traviata, and ending with Il Trovatore, also was revolutionary. In a letter to Rigoletto's librettist, Francesco Maria Piave, he says, "I conceived Rigoletto almost without arias, without finales but only an unending string of duets." And that it is. Rigoletto is one of, if not the earliest operas to abandon the traditional distinction between the sung aria, and the more speech-like recitative. After these three operas, his works took an increasing amount of time to finish, were significantly longer, and more masterfully orchestrated. His last three works: the Requiem, Otello and Falstaff, are perceived more mature, more Wagner-like, more profound.

Verdi's operas are frequently staged around the world. The Operabase listings for 2013–2014 show La traviata as the most performed opera during this period (659 performances). Other Verdi operas in the top 20 are Rigoletto (8th place, 445 performances), Aida (12th place, 304 performances), Nabucco (16th place, 304 performances) and Il trovatore (18th place, 232 performances). All of his operas are available in recordings in a number of versions, and on DVD – Naxos Records offers a complete boxed set. Modern productions may differ substantially from those originally envisaged by the composer. Jonathan Miller's 1982 version of Rigoletto for English National Opera, set in the world of modern American mafiosi, received critical plaudits. But the same company's staging in 2002 of Un ballo in maschera as A Masked Ball, directed by Calixto Bieito, including "satanic sex rituals, homosexual rape, [and] a demonic dwarf", got a general critical thumbs down. Meanwhile, the music of Verdi can still evoke a range of cultural and political resonances. Excerpts from the Requiem were featured at the memorial service for Diana, Princess of Wales in 1997. On 12 March 2011 during a performance of Nabucco at the Opera di Roma celebrating 150 years of Italian unification, the conductor Riccardo Muti paused after "Va pensiero" and turned to address the audience (which included the then Italian Prime Minister, Silvio Berlusconi) to complain about cuts in state funding of culture; the audience then joined in a repeat of the chorus. In 2014, the pop singer Katy Perry appeared at the Grammy Award wearing a dress designed by Valentino, embroidered with the music of "Dell'invito trascorsa e già l'ora" from the start of La traviata. The bicentenary of Verdi's birth in 2013 was celebrated in numerous events around the world, both in performances and broadcasts.

WARREN BUFFETT – BIOGRAPHIES BY ALICE SCHROEDER – THE SNOWBALL AND ROBERT G. HAGSTROM – THE WARREN BUFFETT WAY

The businessman whom I admire most is Warren Buffett. Indeed, if he did not exist we should have invented him, as he is most ethical, has a very progressive ideology of business, he is minded to social justice, and he has vowed to donate 99% of his wealth back to the community. When my students told me that one does not gain anything from being ethical and gave me as examples the solutions of quite all my case studies and my examples of crooked or "agnostic" businessmen who succeeded and nothing happened to them in spite of being crooks, I always used to tell them that the richest man in the world is Warren Buffett who made his fortune ethically, proving by that that Ethics Pays, and that you can be ethical and yet be very rich. The problem is of course that for every Warren Buffett and the likes (not very many...) there are thousands of crooked businessmen who corrupt politicians and civil servants, employees and regulators, who cause the worse crises ever and that nothing happens to them – on the contrary they get richer from the crises because the governments bail them out and those who pay for their crimes are the ethical people and the 99% of the population who have a shrinking percentage of the GDP. We, in Israel, know Buffett quite well because he purchased one of our best companies Iscar, and he is one of the most popular personalities in Israel. Being ethical does not mean being a moron, and Buffett proved that, though ethical and honest, he is very astute, shrewd, and clever, and that those qualities are not self-contradictory. The most trite expression is that business ethics is an oximoron – Warren Buffett is the living proof of the contrary, and I wish him to live at least 30 more years, as his children are not businessmen, and I am much afraid that when he goes to Paradise he would find there not 72 virgins, nor 72 honest politicians, nor 72 ethical tycoons, maybe 7 or 6 or 5 or 4 or 3 or 2 or 1..., and unfortunately none on earth!

Warren Edward Buffett (born August 30, 1930) is a wealthy American investor and businessman. Buffett has amassed an enormous fortune from astute investments, particularly through his company Berkshire Hathaway. In 2008, Buffett was ranked by Forbes as the richest person in the world with an estimated net worth of approximately $62 billion. Despite his immense wealth, Buffett is famous for his unpretentious and frugal lifestyle. He continues to live in the same suburban house in Omaha he bought in 1957 for $31,500. His chairman's salary from Berkshire Hathaway of $100,000 per annum is extremely modest by corporate American standards. Buffett is also a notable philanthropist, having pledged to give away 99% of his fortune to philanthropic causes. "Warren Buffett is not easy to describe. Physically, he is unremarkable, with looks often described as grandfatherly. Intellectually, he is considered a genius, yet his down-to-earth relationship with people is truly uncomplicated. He is simple, straightforward, forthright, and honest. He displays an engaging combination of sophisticated dry wit and cornball humor. He has a profound reverence for all things logical and a foul distaste for imbecility. He embraces the simple and avoids the complicated.... When reading Berkshire's annual reports,... unabashed honesty. Buffett is candid in his reporting. He emphasizes both the pluses and the minuses of Berkshire's businesses... When Buffett took control of Berkshire the corporate net worth was $22 million. Forty years later, it has grown to $69 billion.... Since he took control of Berkshire in 1964, the gain has been much greater: Book value per share has grown from $19 to $50,498, a rate of 22.2 percent compounded annually." (Hagstrom, 2005, p.4)

Warren Edward Buffett (born August 30, 1930) is an American business magnate, investor and philanthropist. He is the most successful investor in the world. Buffett is the chairman, CEO and largest shareholder of Berkshire Hathaway, and is consistently ranked among the world's wealthiest people. He was ranked as the world's wealthiest person in 2008 and as the third wealthiest in 2015. In 2012 Time named Buffett one of the world's most influential people. Buffett is often referred to as the "Wizard of Omaha" or "Oracle of Omaha," or the "Sage of Omaha," and is noted for his adherence to value investing and for his personal frugality despite his immense wealth. Buffett is a notable philanthropist, having pledged to give away 99 percent of his fortune to philanthropic causes, primarily via the Gates Foundation. On April 11, 2012, he was diagnosed with prostate cancer, for which he successfully completed treatment in September 2012. Buffet is also active in contributing to political causes, having endorsed Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton for president during the 2016 campaign season.

Buffett stated that he only paid 19% of his income for 2006 ($48.1 million) in total federal taxes (due to their source as dividends & capital gains, although the figure excluded the taxes on that income paid by the corporations that provided it), while his employees paid 33% of theirs, despite making much less money. "How can this be fair?" Buffett asked, regarding how little he pays in taxes compared to his employees. "How can this be right?" He also added: "There's class warfare, all right, but it's my class, the rich class, that's making war, and we're winning." Buffett favors the inheritance tax, saying that repealing it would be like "choosing the 2020 Olympic team by picking the eldest sons of the gold-medal winners in the 2000 Olympics". In 2007, Buffett testified before the Senate and urged them to preserve the estate tax so as to avoid a plutocracy. Some critics argued that Buffett (through Berkshire Hathaway) has a personal interest in the continuation of the estate tax, since Berkshire Hathaway benefited from the estate tax in past business dealings and had developed and marketed insurance policies to protect policy holders against future estate tax payments. Buffett believes government should not be in the business of gambling, or legalizing casinos, calling it a tax on ignorance. I am so glad that Buffett does for me the job of "preaching" for a higher taxation for rich people and high inheritance taxes. When I say that my critics say that I do it because I am envious of the rich, but fortunately Buffett, the richest man on earth, say it also – it is unfair that the American employees pay 33% taxes while he pays only 19% of his income. In Israel the proportions are even more to the detriment of the middle classes and even the poors if you take into consideration indirect taxes. What is outrageous in Israel is that there is no inheritance tax, not even for very wealthy people. The apologetics of our neoliberal government is that the rich will always find a way to avoid paying the taxes – which is a twisted excuse, as we could maintain that it is pointless to catch thieves as they'll never give up trying, to punish murderers as they'll escape from prison, to arrest crooked politicians who receive bribes as they'll hire the best lawyers, or to kill terrorists as anyhow others will take their places. It is so unfair that in many cases morons inherit millions or hundreds of millions without contributing anything to society, while very talented children cannot continue studying because they don't have enough money.

The Snowball: Warren Buffett and the Business of Life (ISBN 0553805096) is a biography about Warren Buffett by Alice Schroeder. Before this book was written, Warren Buffett rejected numerous approaches by biographers, journalists, and publishers to cooperate on an account of his life. After spending six years as the only Wall Street analyst Buffett would speak to, Alice Schroeder was approached by Buffett to write his biography. In 2003, she left her job at Morgan Stanley and traveled to Omaha to work on the book full-time. Schroeder spent over 2,000 hours reading Buffett's personal files while interviewing Buffett, his wife, children, sisters, friends, and business associates. Before Schroeder began writing, Buffett told her he would not ask for any revisions once the book was finished and, where accounts of his life differed, to always use the "less flattering version." The Snowball was Amazon.com's best business and investing book of the year 2008. Time Magazine, People Magazine, and critic Janet Maslin of the New York Times named it one of ten best books of the year. The Washington Post, the Financial Times, BusinessWeek, and Publishers Weekly also each named The Snowball the best book of 2008.^[5] The book was shortlisted for the 2008 Financial Times and Goldman Sachs Business Book of the Year Award, as well as the 2009 Gerald Loeb Award for distinguished business journalism. A reviewer in The Economist noted that for those "hoping for detailed analyses of his investment record" the place to start is "Mr. Buffett's collected essays and annual reports." As a look at Buffett, the Washington Post stated The Snowball was "the most detailed glimpse inside Warren Buffett and his world that we likely will ever get...a bible for capitalists" and the Los Angeles Times wrote it was "the most authoritative portrait of one of the most important American investors of our time." And from Amazon's website of the biography: Here is THE book recounting the life and times of one of the most respected men in the world, Warren Buffett. The legendary Omaha investor has never written a memoir, but now he has allowed one writer, Alice Schroeder, unprecedented access to explore directly with him and with those closest to him his work, opinions, struggles, triumphs, follies, and wisdom. The result is the personally revealing and complete biography of the man known everywhere as "The Oracle of Omaha." Although the media track him constantly, Buffett himself has never told his full life story. His reality is private, especially by celebrity standards. Indeed, while the homespun persona that the public sees is true as far as it goes, it goes only so far. Warren Buffett is an array of paradoxes. He set out to prove that nice guys can finish first. Over the years he treated his investors as partners, acted as their steward, and championed honesty as an investor, CEO, board member, essayist, and speaker. At the same time he became the world's richest man, all from the modest Omaha headquarters of his company Berkshire Hathaway. None of this fits the term "simple."

When Alice Schroeder met Warren Buffett she was an insurance industry analyst and a gifted writer known for her keen perception and business acumen. Her writings on finance impressed him, and as she came to know him she realized that while much had been written on the subject of his investing style, no one had moved beyond that to explore his larger philosophy, which is bound up in a complex personality and the details of his life. Out of this came his decision to cooperate with her on the book about himself that he would never write. Never before has Buffett spent countless hours responding to a writer's questions, talking, giving complete access to his wife, children, friends, and business associates—opening his files, recalling his childhood. It was an act of courage, as The Snowball makes immensely clear. Being human, his own life, like most lives, has been a mix of strengths and frailties. Yet notable though his wealth may be, Buffett's legacy will not be his ranking on the scorecard of wealth; it will be his principles and ideas that have enriched people's lives. This book tells you why Warren Buffett is the most fascinating American success story of our time. I read every word of this book, more than 800 pages breathlessly, as it is written like a thriller, like a fairy tale, like a fable – especially since it was published in September 2008 – the month of the summum of the Great Recession, when the economy of the world crumbled it was reconforting to read that there is an alternative way, that the oracle was right, that the justs are rewarded, that Ethics Pays even if Crooks don't pay.

Review on the biography by Robert Morris on November 17, 2008: I recently re-read Roger Lowenstein's biography, Buffett: The Making of an American Capitalist (first published in 1995 and now re-issued with a new Afterword), and then read this more recent one by Alice Schroeder. Both are first-rate. Which to select if reading only one? That depends on how much you wish to know about Buffett's personal life, including his relations with various family members, and how curious you are about his personal hang-ups, peculiarities, eccentricities, fetishes, etc. If you can do without any of that, Roger Lowenstein's biography is the one to read. I also highly recommend the recently published Second Edition of The Essays of Warren Buffett: Lessons for Corporate America, with content selected, arranged, and introduced by Lawrence Cunningham. The heft of Schroeder's biography may discourage some people from obtaining a copy. To them I presume to suggest that they not be deterred by that factor. Schroeder has a lively, often entertaining writing style that drives the narrative through just about every period and (yes) interlude of Warren Buffett's life and career thus far. There is much more information provided than most readers either need or desire. However, she had unprecedented access not only to Buffett but to just about everyone else with whom he is (or once was) associated as well as to previously inaccessible research resources. It is possible but highly unlikely that anyone else will write a more comprehensive biography than Schroeder has, at least for the next several years, if not decades. Also, her opinion of Buffett seems to me to be balanced and circumspect. No doubt he wishes that certain details about his life and career were not included.

However, there has been no indication from him or those authorized to represent him that any of the material in this biography (however unflattering) is either inaccurate or unfair. Both halos and warts are included. Others have shared their reasons for holding this book in high regard. Here are two of mine. First, although I had already read various Buffett's chairman's letters that first appeared in a series of Berkshire Hathaway's annual reports, I did not understand (nor could I have understood) the context for observations he shared, especially his comments about especially important 12-month periods throughout BRK's history. Schroeder provides the context or frame-of-reference I needed but previously lacked. For example, whereas in previous letters, Buffett merely offered brief updates on how each BRK company was doing, in 1978 he began to share his thoughts about major business topics such as performance measurement for management and why short-term earnings were a poor criterion for investment decisions. With the help of Carol Loomis, especially since 1977, his chairman's letters "had grown more personal and entertaining by the year; they amounted to crash courses in business, written in clear language that ranged from biblical quotations to references to Alice in Wonderland, and princesses kissing toads." As Schroeder explains, these gradual but significant changes of subject and tone reflect changes in Buffett's personal life as he became more reflective about business principles and more appreciative of personal relationships. His children were growing up and departing the "nest" in Omaha. His wife Susie decided to relocate to San Francisco. Meanwhile, his personal net worth continued to increase substantially. His national and then international recognition also increased. The "Oracle of Omaha" had finally become sufficiently confident of himself to reveal to others "a sense of him as a man." I also appreciate how carefully Schroeder develops several separate but related themes that help her reader to manage the wealth of information she provides. The biography's title suggests one of these themes: the "snowball" effect that compounded interest can have. From childhood when he began to sell packs of gum (but not single sticks) and bottles of soda, and a money changer was his favorite toy, Buffett was fascinated by the way that numbers "exploded as they grew at a constant rate over time was how a small sum could be turned into a fortune. He could picture the numbers compounding as vividly as the way a snowball grew when he rolled it across the lawn. Warren began to think about it a different way. Compounding married the present to the future. If a dollar today was going to be worth ten some years from now, then in his mind the two were the same."

Early in life, Buffett avoided making any purchases unless they were almost certain to generate compound interest. This theme is central to understanding Buffett's investment principles and to his own leadership of BRK. It also helps to explain why he could become physically ill when an investment cost others the funds they had entrusted to his care. Other themes include his determination to simplify his life to the extent he could (e.g. eating hamburgers and wearing threadbare sweaters, minimizing participation in family activities) so that he could concentrate almost entirely on business matters; his dependence on a series of women, beginning with his mother and two sisters (especially Doris) that continued with his first wife Susie (and their daughter "Susie Jr.") and then companion Astrid Menks whom he married in 2006; and his passion for helping others to understand the business principles to which he has been committed since childhood. There is one other theme of special interest and importance to me: over the years, how Buffett has interacted with various associates, notably with Jerome Newman and Benjamin Graham, Sandy Gottesman, Charlie Munger, Bill Ruane, Katherine Graham, and Bill Gates. By all accounts, Buffett is a superb business associate once he agrees to become involved. He cares deeply about each relationship, does whatever may be necessary to protect and defend the best interests of his associates, and is extraordinarily generous with material rewards as well as recognition. Here is an especially revealing excerpt from Cunningham's Introduction to The Essays of Warren Buffett: "The CEOs at Berkshire's operating companies enjoy a unique position in corporate America. They are given a simple set of commands: to run the business as if (1) they are its sole owner, (2) it is the only asset they hold, and (3) they can never sell or merge it for one hundred years." These three "commands" are wholly consistent with what Lawrence explains earlier in the same Introduction: "The central theme uniting Buffett's lucid essays is that the principles of fundamental business analysis, first formulated by his teachers Ben Graham and David Dodd, should guide investment practice. Linked to that theme are management principles that define the proper role of corporate managers as the stewards of investment capital and the proper role of shareholders as the suppliers and owners of capital. Radiating from these main themes are practical and sensible lessons on the entire range of important business issues, from accounting to mergers to valuation." Those who shared Buffett's same core values of honesty and integrity, and who are also committed to the same basic principles, cherish their relationship with him. To me, Alice Schroeder's rigorous and eloquent analysis of this theme of mutually productive and beneficial collaboration is her single greatest achievement among many in this definitive biography of one of the most important and yet least understood business leaders in recent years. Bravo! (And Bravo to you too – Robert Morris).

Quotes by Warren Buffett: I like very much quotes by wise people in different countries, and in this book and links we can find thousands of quotes. Warren Buffett is one of the wisest men who ever existed and his quotes have become the guidelines of many investors and businessmen.

Now for that same cube of gold, it would be worth at today's market prices about $7 trillion — that's probably about a third of the value of all the stocks in the United States. For $7 trillion, you could have all the farmland in the United States, you could have about seven Exxon Mobil Corporations plus a trillion dollars of walking-around money. ... If you offered me

“Somebody once said that in looking for people to hire, you look for three qualities: integrity, intelligence, and energy. And if you don’t have the first, the other two will kill you. You think about it; it’s true. If you hire somebody without [integrity], you really want them to be dumb and lazy.”

“I insist on a lot of time being spent, almost every day, to just sit and think. That is very uncommon in American business. I read and think. So I do more reading and thinking, and make less impulse decisions than most people in business. I do it because I like this kind of life.”

“There’s class warfare, all right, but it’s my class, the rich class, that’s making war, and we’re winning.”

“There comes a time when you ought to start doing what you want. Take a job that you love. You will jump out of bed in the morning. "Good profits simply are not inconsistent with good behavior".

"You are neither right nor wrong because the crowd disagrees with you."

Finally, we bring here the "prophecy" of Warren Buffett on Derivatives calling them Weapons of Mass Destruction in his 2002 annual report, that proved true in the Great Recession of 2008, and Buffett, Stiglitz, and others say that the worse is still ahead, as the danger from derivatives that are not regulated has increased much more and could cause the bankruptcy of the world's economy. This concurs with what I maintain since the Great Recession that the next crisis will be a "Doomsday Depression" because the derivatives that are not regulated have reached levels of ten times the world's economies, and this time it will be impossible to bail out the Banks that are too big to fail, and all the worlds' economies will collapse. The "vodou" cures of lowering bank interests to zero are truly a curse, as their only effect is in creating once again bubbles of real estate and stock exchanges at inflated prices, as there are almost no other investments' opportunities with money that does not cost anything. The neoliberal governments did not regulate the derivatives and the banks, the economies and the markets, and the free markets have become jungles benefiting only the lions, the 1% ruling class, while all the others have a much lower income, pay higher tax rates than the lions, the gaps are now equivalent to those in the roaring twenties, the governments have not drawn the necessary lessons and conclusions for the future, as the politicians and civil servants are bribed by the tycoons and the banks – directly or indirectly and most of the time legally – and they participate in the plunder, pledging allegiance to their masters – the tycoons, the banks, the magnates of Wall Street, and ignoring the 99% masses who do not count anymore in the new plutocracies of the 21st century.

History will judge the Central Banks, the politicians, the civil servants, and the governments' organizations, that practised those panaceas of zero interests, fake regulation, and so-called free markets, as the culprits of the collapse of world's economies, and they will be remembered as Chamberlain who "gained" a year of peace but prompted the world into the worst tragedy of humankind – World War II and the Holocaust, with 60 millions casualties. Those false prophets have gained a few years reprieve, enabling the tycoons to recover at our expense from the Great Recession and continue to profit trillions from all of us, wronging the whole world, in the stock exchange and real estate bubbles, giving zero interests to the masses' banks deposits and charging interests of ten percents or even more for the masses' loans, making the banks and tycoons outrageously richer, at our risk as they have nothing to lose, transferring all their losses to the governments and to us, and all the profits to their pockets. Unfortunately, the Domsday Depression will be catastrophic once again to the majority of the populations who always pays the price, or in Buffett's words: "There's class warfare, all right, but it's my class, the rich class, that's making war, and we're winning." But I am optimistic as this collapse would have to change basic attitudes, for example banning lobbying, contributions to politicians, letting the politicians campaign only on state-owned TV channels at no charge, prohibiting by law for government officials and politicians to work in the private sector, but also giving them private sector's salaries as in Singapore, making laws for maximum salaries of one million dollars annually to CEOs without shares and options, prohibiting bankrupt businessmen and officers of bankrupt companies to work anymore in business, all along my "rules" in my books and similar ones. I bring here also links to articles by Joseph Stiglitz and others on those issues.

Warren Buffet on Derivatives

Following are edited excerpts from the Berkshire Hathaway annual report for 2002.

I view derivatives as time bombs, both for the parties that deal in them and the economic system. Basically these instruments call for money to change hands at some future date, with the amount to be determined by one or more reference items, such as interest rates, stock prices, or currency values. For example, if you are either long or short an S&P 500 futures contract, you are a party to a very simple derivatives transaction, with your gain or loss derived from movements in the index. Derivatives contracts are of varying duration, running sometimes to 20 or more years, and their value is often tied to several variables. Unless derivatives contracts are collateralized or guaranteed, their ultimate value also depends on the creditworthiness of the counter-parties to them. But before a contract is settled, the counter-parties record profits and losses – often huge in amount – in their current earnings statements without so much as a penny changing hands. Reported earnings on derivatives are often wildly overstated. That's because today's earnings are in a significant way based on estimates whose inaccuracy may not be exposed for many years.

The errors usually reflect the human tendency to take an optimistic view of one's commitments. But the parties to derivatives also have enormous incentives to cheat in accounting for them. Those who trade derivatives are usually paid, in whole or part, on "earnings" calculated by mark-to-market accounting. But often there is no real market, and "mark-to-model" is utilized. This substitution can bring on large-scale mischief. As a general rule, contracts involving multiple reference items and distant settlement dates increase the opportunities for counter-parties to use fanciful assumptions. The two parties to the contract might well use differing models allowing both to show substantial profits for many years. In extreme cases, mark-to-model degenerates into what I would call mark-to-myth. I can assure you that the marking errors in the derivatives business have not been symmetrical. Almost invariably, they have favored either the trader who was eyeing a multi-million dollar bonus or the CEO who wanted to report impressive "earnings" (or both). The bonuses were paid, and the CEO profited from his options. Only much later did shareholders learn that the reported earnings were a sham. Another problem about derivatives is that they can exacerbate trouble that a corporation has run into for completely unrelated reasons. This pile-on effect occurs because many derivatives contracts require that a company suffering a credit downgrade immediately supply collateral to counter-parties.

Imagine then that a company is downgraded because of general adversity and that its derivatives instantly kick in with their requirement, imposing an unexpected and enormous demand for cash collateral on the company. The need to meet this demand can then throw the company into a liquidity crisis that may, in some cases, trigger still more downgrades. It all becomes a spiral that can lead to a corporate meltdown. Derivatives also create a daisy-chain risk that is akin to the risk run by insurers or reinsurers that lay off much of their business with others. In both cases, huge receivables from many counter-parties tend to build up over time. A participant may see himself as prudent, believing his large credit exposures to be diversified and therefore not dangerous. However under certain circumstances, an exogenous event that causes the receivable from Company A to go bad will also affect those from Companies B through Z. In banking, the recognition of a “linkage” problem was one of the reasons for the formation of the Federal Reserve System. Before the Fed was established, the failure of weak banks would sometimes put sudden and unanticipated liquidity demands on previously-strong banks, causing them to fail in turn. The Fed now insulates the strong from the troubles of the weak. But there is no central bank assigned to the job of preventing the dominoes toppling in insurance or derivatives. In these industries, firms that are fundamentally solid can become troubled simply because of the travails of other firms further down the chain.

Many people argue that derivatives reduce systemic problems, in that participants who can't bear certain risks are able to transfer them to stronger hands. These people believe that derivatives act to stabilize the economy, facilitate trade, and eliminate bumps for individual participants. On a micro level, what they say is often true. I believe, however, that the macro picture is dangerous and getting more so. Large amounts of risk, particularly credit risk, have become concentrated in the hands of relatively few derivatives dealers, who in addition trade extensively with one other. The troubles of one could quickly infect the others. On top of that, these dealers are owed huge amounts by non-dealer counter-parties. Some of these counter-parties, are linked in ways that could cause them to run into a problem because of a single event, such as the implosion of the telecom industry. Linkage, when it suddenly surfaces, can trigger serious systemic problems. Indeed, in 1998, the leveraged and derivatives-heavy activities of a single hedge fund, Long-Term Capital Management, caused the Federal Reserve anxieties so severe that it hastily orchestrated a rescue effort.

In later Congressional testimony, Fed officials acknowledged that, had they not intervened, the outstanding trades of LTCM – a firm unknown to the general public and employing only a few hundred people – could well have posed a serious threat to the stability of American markets. In other words, the Fed acted because its leaders were fearful of what might have happened to other financial institutions had the LTCM domino toppled. And this affair, though it paralyzed many parts of the fixed-income market for weeks, was far from a worst-case scenario. One of the derivatives instruments that LTCM used was total-return swaps, contracts that facilitate 100% leverage in various markets, including stocks. For example, Party A to a contract, usually a bank, puts up all of the money for the purchase of a stock while Party B, without putting up any capital, agrees that at a future date it will receive any gain or pay any loss that the bank realizes. Total-return swaps of this type make a joke of margin requirements. Beyond that, other types of derivatives severely curtail the ability of regulators to curb leverage and generally get their arms around the risk profiles of banks, insurers and other financial institutions.

Similarly, even experienced investors and analysts encounter major problems in analyzing the financial condition of firms that are heavily involved with derivatives contracts. The derivatives genie is now well out of the bottle, and these instruments will almost certainly multiply in variety and number until some event makes their toxicity clear. Central banks and governments have so far found no effective way to control, or even monitor, the risks posed by these contracts. In my view, derivatives are financial weapons of mass destruction, carrying dangers that, while now latent, are potentially lethal. Recently Buffett said that he is still convinced that derivatives are weapons of mass destruction and at some point they are likely to cause big trouble. The problem arises when there is a discontinuity in the market for some reason or another. In times of crises like in wars, 9/11, or the Great Recession, everyone is afraid to deal with the big banks because nobody is quite sure how much exposure they have to risky derivatives. The problem is not just reckless lending and excessive risk taking, the core problem is lack of transparency. The banks after the Great Recession are even bigger and if they fail the impact on the economy will be much worse than in 2008. The hundreds of trillion dollars of the derivatives are not only ten times higher than the world's economies, they are of course much much higher than all the assets of the leading banks. Buffett's partner at Berkshire Hathaway, Charlie Munger, is even more outspoken in his utter disdain for the massive buildup of derivative positions on major bank balance sheets. "Wall Street is addicted to derivatives trading like the masses are addicted to sports betting. Both are counterproductive, but lucrative for their practitioners. The banks are just gambling parlors with huge odds in favor of the people running them. The derivative books of the five major banks are a perfect business for the owners. But, they are doing nothing for economic growth." And this is the true tragedy of contemporary finance. The Robber Barons did a lot for the economy in spite of all their drawbacks, even the Mafia has turned legitimate, but all those who get rich at our expense without taking any risk contribute nothing to the economy.

I like very much arts, and especially paintings. Unfortunately, the paintings of the great painters, and especially the Impressionists, whom I like most, are very rare in Israel, and that is why I seize the opportunity every time that I travel abroad to see those paintings at dozens of museums which I visit time and again – the Impressionists mainly in Paris and Provence, the Renaissance painters mainly in Italy, the English painters mainly in London, the Dutch painters mainly in the Netherlands, all the Great Painters as well as other works of art at the museums in New York, Boston, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, and in Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Oslo, Brussels, Frankfurt, Switzerland, Greece, Lisbon, Sidney, San Petersburg, etc. Sometimes I visit museums on the Internet, I see fiction films and documentary films on the lives of painters and sculptors, and I have read at least a hundred art books with reproductions and biographies of the great painters. I'll give here a list of some of the art books that I have in my library and that I have read most of them a few times. Sometimes, when I feel "blue", I take an art book and after an hour or so I am so absorbed by the paintings that I forget all the problems, this is also a kind of therapy, sometimes even more effective than bibliotherapy. I don't want to leave the impression that I read art books, novels, plays or biographies only as a kind of therapy, this is maybe a side effect, but as most of the time I don't need a therapy, all my intellectual activities are for sheer pleasure without any afterthought, and this includes watching movies, going to the theater, concerts, operas, lectures, museums, or just visiting nice cities and sites.

Renoir is my favorite painter, he moves me profoundly, especially his portraits, I can see his paintings dozens of times and still find them interesting. I believe that he excelled most in painting men, women, especially children and young women. He may be sugary, but portraits should not show exactly the person as a photo, they must disclose their personalities, and for that no painters can compare to Renoir. He does not have the "shtiks" of Chagall with flying bodies, or Modigliani with long necks, I really don't care if the Mona Lisa is smiling or not, I just think that the portrait is boring and I prefer by far the portrait of a young woman by Renoir. Most of all I prefer the following paintings: Bal du Moulin de la Galette, The Theater Box, La balançoire, Two sisters, Girls at the piano, La grenouillère, Portrait of Claude Monet, portraits of young girls, A girl with a watering can, Mme. Charpentier and her children – I think that it is the most beautiful painting that I have ever seen and every time that I visit the Metropolitan Museum I watch this picture for at least ten minutes, By the water, Luncheon of the boating party, Dance at Bougival, Dance in the country, Girl brooding her hair, Julie Manet, self portraits, Nudes, the Large Bathers, Nude in the sun, After the bath, Bathers, Gabrielle Renard and infant, Portrait of Ambroise Vollard, Portrait of Paul Durand-Ruel, paintings at l'Orangerie, at musee d'Orsay...

Pierre-Auguste Renoir, commonly known as Auguste Renoir (25 February 1841 – 3 December 1919), was a French artist who was a leading painter in the development of the Impressionist style. As a celebrator of beauty, and especially feminine sensuality, it has been said that "Renoir is the final representative of a tradition which runs directly from Rubens to Watteau." He was the father of actor Pierre Renoir (1885–1952), filmmaker Jean Renoir (1894–1979) and ceramic artist Claude Renoir (1901–69). He was the grandfather of the filmmaker Claude Renoir (1913–1993), son of Pierre. After a series of rejections by the Salon juries, Renoir joined forces with Monet, Sisley, Pissarro, and several other artists to mount the first Impressionist exhibition in April 1874, in which Renoir displayed six paintings. Although the critical response to the exhibition was largely unfavorable, Renoir's work was comparatively well received. That same year, two of his works were shown with Durand-Ruel in London. Hoping to secure a livelihood by attracting portrait commissions, Renoir displayed mostly portraits at the second Impressionist exhibition in 1876. He contributed a more diverse range of paintings the next year when the group presented its third exhibition; they included Dance at Le Moulin de la Galette and The Swing. Renoir did not exhibit in the fourth or fifth Impressionist exhibitions, and instead resumed submitting his works to the Salon. By the end of the 1870s, particularly after the success of his painting Mme Charpentier and her Children (1878) at the Salon of 1879, Renoir was a successful and fashionable painter.

In 1881, he traveled to Algeria, a country he associated with Eugène Delacroix,^[10] then to Madrid, to see the work of Diego Velázquez. Following that, he traveled to Italy to see Titian's masterpieces in Florence and the paintings of Raphael in Rome. On 15 January 1882 Renoir met the composer Richard Wagner at his home in Palermo, Sicily. Renoir painted Wagner's portrait in just thirty-five minutes. In the same year, after contracting pneumonia which permanently damaged his respiratory system, Renoir convalesced for six weeks in Algeria. In 1883, Renoir spent the summer in Guernsey, one of the islands in the English Channel with a varied landscape of beaches, cliffs and bays, where he created fifteen paintings in little over a month. Most of these feature Moulin Huet, a bay in Saint Martin's, Guernsey. These paintings were the subject of a set of commemorative postage stamps issued by the Bailiwick of Guernsey in 1983. While living and working in Montmartre, Renoir employed Suzanne Valadon as a model, who posed for him (The Large Bathers, 1884–87; Dance at Bougival, 1883) and many of his fellow painters; during that time she studied their techniques and eventually became one of the leading painters of the day. In 1887, the year when Queen Victoria celebrated her Golden Jubilee, and upon the request of the queen's associate, Phillip Richbourg, Renoir donated several paintings to the "French Impressionist Paintings" catalog as a token of his loyalty.

In 1890, he married Aline Victorine Charigot, who, along with a number of the artist's friends, had already served as a model for Le Déjeuner des canotiers (Luncheon of the Boating Party) 1881, and with whom he had already had a child, Pierre, in 1885. After his marriage, Renoir painted many scenes of his wife and daily family life including their children and their nurse, Aline's cousin Gabrielle Renard. The Renoirs had three sons: Jean Renoir, who became a filmmaker of note, Pierre Renoir, who became a stage and film actor, and Claude Renoir, who became a ceramic artist. In the late 1860s, through the practice of painting light and water en plein air (outdoors), he and his friend Claude Monet discovered that the color of shadows is not brown or black, but the reflected color of the objects surrounding them, an effect known today as diffuse reflection. Several pairs of paintings exist in which Renoir and Monet worked side-by-side, depicting the same scenes (La Grenouillère, 1869). One of the best known Impressionist works is Renoir's 1876 Dance at Le Moulin de la Galette (Bal du moulin de la Galette). The painting depicts an open-air scene, crowded with people at a popular dance garden on the Butte Montmartre close to where he lived. The works of his early maturity were typically Impressionist snapshots of real life, full of sparkling color and light. By the mid-1880s, however, he had broken with the movement to apply a more disciplined formal technique to portraits and figure paintings, particularly of women. It was a trip to Italy in 1881, when he saw works by Raphael and other Renaissance masters, that convinced him that he was on the wrong path, and for the next several years he painted in a more severe style in an attempt to return to classicism. Concentrating on his drawing and emphasizing the outlines of figures, he painted works such as The Large Bathers (1884–87; Philadelphia Museum of Art) during what is sometimes called his "Ingres period". After 1890 he changed direction again. To dissolve outlines, as in his earlier work, he returned to thinly brushed color. From this period onward he concentrated on monumental nudes and domestic scenes, fine examples of which are Girls at the Piano, 1892, and Grandes Baigneuses, 1887. The latter painting is the most typical and successful of Renoir's late, abundantly fleshed nudes. A prolific artist, he created several thousand paintings. The warm sensuality of Renoir's style made his paintings some of the most well-known and frequently reproduced works in the history of art. The single largest collection of his works—181 paintings in all—is at the Barnes Foundation, in Philadelphia.

We bring here the Introduction by Robert L. Herbert to the translation of Renoir, my father, a biography by Renoir's son Jean Renoir.

INTRODUCTION

IN THE spring of 1953, from his home in Hollywood, Jean Renoir wrote to the publisher Bennett Cerf:

I would like to attempt to give form to my own recollections of the conversations I had with my father mostly at the end of his life. I won't quote the exact dialogue which I don't remember, but try to give an idea of my past impressions of such meetings and of the way they influence me today. These conversations were about anything: his past experiences, his childhood, our family, his friends, his admirations, and also very much about his suspicions regarding the fast changes in our modern world.

The famous filmmaker was then fifty-nine, and would be sixty-eight when the book was published at the end of 1962. When he and his father began their lengthy conversations in 1915, during Jean's long convalescences from successive wartime injuries, Jean was twenty-one, and Auguste seventy-four. The book is therefore the son's nostalgic reminiscences of his father's old age, when he himself was growing old. Their two old ages are movingly brought together in an effervescent blend of nostalgia for an earlier era. Probably to give a more lifelike tone to his recollections, Jean put his father's words in quotation marks despite telling Cerf that he would not do so. He had no written records of his conversations of 1915–1919, so he drew upon memory and upon interviews with many who knew the painter, chiefly Gabrielle Renard Slade (1879–1959), who had been his childhood nurse and one of the painter's favorite models and who was now living nearby in Hollywood. He used a tape recorder and, presumably, written notes, as the two “played the little game of taking a trip back into the past.” Gabrielle was his principal source for the period before his birth and his early years: “I hardly know which are my recollections and which are hers.” Jean also asked friends and researchers to provide him with lengthy excerpts from early writings about Renoir, and the first half of the book consists mostly of a blend of these with available biographies and histories. In addition, he used extensive writings by his father (these have only recently been published); he quoted three pages of aphorisms from them and elsewhere paraphrased them by putting their thoughts into reconstructed conversations.

Renoir, My Father has the rollicking and sometimes earthy tone of Jean's postwar films, like French Cancan (1955) or The Little Theater of Jean Renoir (1969), rather than the critical edges of his greatest films, such as Grand Illusion and The Rules of the Game (both from the later 1930s). But when the roughly chronological account reaches World War I, the book takes on a greater immediacy, perhaps because Jean's wounded leg gave him more sympathy for his father's condition. One can never again look indifferently at Renoir's later portraits and paintings of nudes after reading Jean's recollections of his father's disastrous arthritis. Despite his infirmity, Renoir would only rarely pause from painting and then—this is the filmmaker writing—Darkness would invade the studio in the Boulevard Rochechouart, helping him to drift back into the past. I would take advantage of the interval to lift him up and hold him firmly while Grand' Louise refilled his rubber cushion with air. Then, with the utmost care, we would lower him into his chair and settle him in the best position. 'What nasty material rubber is! Give me a cigarette, will you?' He drew a few puffs, than let it go out.

Equally moving is Jean's account of his father's earlier attempts to ward off the arthritis that eventually crippled his hands by juggling with a bilboquet (the cup-and-ball game), and, when that was no longer possible, with a smooth wooden stick.

Jean does not offer many details of his father's craft but occasionally gives vivid descriptions of the painter at work, bobbing back and forth from his wheelchair to the canvas with rapid, stiffened gestures, the brush strapped to his wrist. His aged father, he writes, harassed the subject ceaselessly as a lover harasses the girl who puts up a struggle before yielding. He seemed also to be engaged on a hunt. The anxious rapidity of his brushstrokes, which were urgent, precise, flashing extensions of his piercing vision, made me think of the zig-zag flight of a swallow catching insects. I purposely borrow a comparison from ornithology. Renoir's brush was linked to his visual perception as directly as the swallow's beak is linked to its eyes.

Jean also gives firsthand accounts of some subjects of Renoir's portraits, most notably of the dealer Ambroise Vollard. We learn that Renoir chose the toreador's costume in which he pictured Vollard in 1917 in order to suit what he saw as the swarthy man's exoticism.

"He was Othello before," he has his father say; "as he grew older, he became Massinissa, King of Numidia."

The particular charm of Renoir, My Father lies in Jean's unselfconscious sliding back and forth between himself and his father.

He writes that his father "would have been delighted to know that the atom could be split," and then that the painter "imagined that the microbes of a bad cold, for instance, regarded their own solar system, the inside of his nose, as the center of the world." This seems more likely to be Jean imagining what his father could have said than anything he actually did say. If we needed further proof of this merging of two personalities, we would find it in the lists Jean provides of his father's likes and dislikes, hardly to be distinguished from his own. Auguste liked "Burgundian or Mediterranean roof tiles covered with moss; the skin of a healthy woman or child; brown bread; meat grilled over wood or charcoal fires; . . . workingmen's blue jeans after they have been washed and mended a number of times."

Among Auguste's views of life that Jean shared is the dislike of "the fast changes in our modern world" which he mentioned in his letter to Cerf. For both men, materialism, machinery, and mass production stifle the individual and degrade nature and artistic quality; it is the "leprosy of modern industry" that Jean writes about when revisiting his father's sites in Chatou. Nearly every modern encounter in the book with his father's painted places and his family's former residences makes him lament their former state. In Provence nowadays, "the little farmhouses, with Mediterranean tile roofs, have been replaced by apartment buildings of reinforced concrete, and the old mill in the valley has become a night club." In Montmartre, Jean deplores the loss of a garden plot near his father's old studio, replaced by an eight-story building. In his letter to Cerf, Jean said that he would try "to give an idea of my past impressions" of the meetings with his father, "and of the way they influence me today." French Cancan, released two years after he began the book, shows that influence because it is a wistful return to the Montmartre of his extreme youth (he was born in 1894) where memory merged with Renoir's paintings. In Hollywood, where he lived after 1940, his wife Dido's garden made him think of "Paradou," the southern garden in Zola's novel La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret. He surrounded himself with furniture and objects from his father's household, "magic carpets which take me back to the years I am trying to evoke." He used his magic carpets to give delightful accounts of Belle Epoque persons like the actress Jeanne Samary, whom Renoir painted long before Jean was born.

Inserting dialogue as though he and the reader were present, Jean seems to have scripted his book as if it were a film. He recalls living after his father's death on the rue Frochot in a building which legend says was built by the elder Dumas, and that reminds him to insert his father's thoughts about Dumas. From the same apartment on the rue Frochot he could see the building where Jeanne Samary lived. He imagines her leaning out the window, or doing her morning marketing on the rue Lepic. "She must have carefully felt the melons to see if they were ripe, and looked with a critical eye at the whiting to make sure it was fresh."

It would be foolish to object to these cinematic flashbacks, because the appeal and the value of Jean Renoir's book is in his imaginative reconstruction of the time and the personages of his father's paintings. We do not object to the same kind of reconstructed past in The Horse of Pride, the memorable account of Brittany in which Pierre-Jakez Hélias draws on interviews with his father and grandfather to form an equally nostalgic evocation of an era before his own birth. Both books belong on the shelves of those who wish to understand French culture of a bygone era. Renoir My Father is that rarest of documents, a book that brings great pleasure while it reveals the thoughts of two great artists.

PAUL HAWKEN – NATURAL CAPITALISM

Paul Hawken is by far the businessman that I admire most. I respect very much Warren Buffett who is one of the most ethical businessmen in the world and has succeeded "in spite" of it to become the richest man in the world, I admire his decision to give back to society almost all the money that he has earned, but I admire less the sources of his wealth, coming from Coca Cola, Goldman Sachs, and some insurance companies that did not behave always ethically. I respect also the decision of unethical businessmen who have decided also to give back to society what they have earned, but I would have preferred that they would conduct in business ethically, without foul play to their competitors, without monopolies and cartels, without evading paying taxes in their homelands, without laying off thousands employees just to earn an extra buck, without polluting the environment, manufacturing defective products, conducting unethically to their community, competitors, suppliers, banks, creditors, governments, minority shareholders.

Paul Hawken is perceived by many as the prophet of sustainability. He is not only an excellent writer, his books move us deeply, but he is also a very successful businessman. This combination is very uncommon in business ethics, social responsibility and sustainability. Normally, you can be an ethical businessman but you don't write on ethics, you can be an excellent ethicist but you don't practice business. Rather, this "oxymoron", adds so much to the credibility of Hawken's books and activities, that it has influenced millions of people. One of the people he has influenced most was Ray Anderson, the founder and chairman of Interface, the world's largest carpet manufacturer of commercial carpet. After reading The Ecology of Commerce by Hawken, Anderson wept, he reached the conclusion that until then he was a "plunderer of the earth" and he decided to change his company into a sustainable company because it is good to earth, to society, to humans and to business. Paul Hawken's record is impeccable; he is for me the "perfect" businessman, all businessmen should be like him, while almost none is like him.

Paul Hawken is an environmentalist, entrepreneur, and author. His work includes starting ecological businesses, writing about the impact of commerce on living systems, and consulting with CEOs and governments on economic development, industrial ecology, and environmental policy. He has appeared on numerous media including the Today Show, Larry King, Talk of the Nation, Charlie Rose, and has been profiled or featured in hundreds of articles including the Wall Street Journal, Newsweek, Washington Post, Business Week, Esquire, and US News and World Report. His writings have appeared in the Harvard Business Review, Resurgence, New Statesman, Inc, Boston Globe, Christian Science Monitor, Mother Jones, Utne Reader, Orion, and other publications. He authors articles, op-eds, and peer-reviewed papers, and has written seven books including four national bestsellers: The Next Economy (Ballantine 1983), Growing a Business (Simon and Schuster 1987), and The Ecology of Commerce (HarperCollins 1993) and Blessed Unrest (Viking, 2007). The Ecology of Commerce was voted in 1998 as the #1 college text on business and the environment by professors in 67 business schools. Natural Capitalism: Creating the Next Industrial Revolution (Little Brown, September 1999) co-authored with Amory Lovins, has been read and referred to by several heads of state including President Bill Clinton who called it one of the five most important books in the world today. But the same Clinton repealed the Glass-Steagall legislation, while Robert Kuttner, Joseph Stiglitz, Elizabeth Warren, Richard D. Wolff and others have tied Glass–Steagall repeal to the late-2000s financial crisis. Kuttner acknowledged “de facto enroads” before Glass–Steagall “repeal” but argued the GLBA’s “repeal” had permitted “super-banks” to “re-enact the same kinds of structural conflicts of interest that were endemic in the 1920s,” which he characterized as “lending to speculators, packaging and securitizing credits and then selling them off, wholesale or retail, and extracting fees at every step along the way.” Stiglitz argued “the most important consequence of Glass– Steagall repeal” was in changing the culture of commercial banking so that the “bigger risk” culture of investment banking “came out on top.” He also argued the GLBA “created ever larger banks that were too big to be allowed to fail,” which “provided incentives for excessive risk taking.” Warren explained Glass–Steagall had kept banks from doing “crazy things.” She credited FDIC insurance, the Glass–Steagall separation of investment banking, and SEC regulations as providing “50 years without a crisis” and argued that crises returned in the 1980s with the “pulling away of the threads” of regulation. Weissman agrees with Stiglitz that the “most important effect” of Glass–Steagall “repeal” was to “change the culture of commercial banking to emulate Wall Street’s high-risk speculative betting approach.”

Hawken’s books have been published in over 50 countries in 27 languages. Growing a Business became the basis of a 17-part PBS series, which Mr. Hawken hosted and produced. The program, which explored the challenges and pitfalls of starting and operating socially responsive companies, was shown on television in 115 countries and watched by over 100 million people. Paul has founded several companies including some of the first natural food companies in the U.S. that relied solely on sustainable agricultural methods. He presently heads OneSun, LLC, an energy company focused on ultra low-cost solar based on green chemistry and biomimicry; and Highwater Global, a social impact fund that employs the highest standards of corporate social, ethical and environmental behavior. In 1965, Hawken worked with Martin Luther King Jr.’s staff in Selma, Alabama prior to the historic March on Montgomery, Alabama. As press coordinator, Hawken registered press, issued credentials (he describes it as a battle zone, and people needed to be identified), gave dozens of updates and interviews on national radio, and acted as marshal for the final march. That same year, Hawken worked in New Orleans as a staff photographer for the Congress of Racial Equality, focusing on voter registration drives in Bogalusa, Louisiana and the panhandle of Florida, and photographing the Klan in Meridian, Mississippi, after three civil rights workers were tortured and killed. During this time, Hawken was accosted and seized by Ku Klux Klan members, but quickly escaped due to FBI surveillance and intervention. Hawken has spoken, conducted research, and traveled extensively throughout the world, undertaking journeys into insurgent-held territories of Burma to research tropical teak deforestation, as well as a 1999 humanitarian/photojournalistic trek to war-torn Kosovo and Macedonia.

Paul is founder of the Natural Capital Institute (www.naturalcapital.org), a research organization located in Sausalito, California. The Natural Capital Institute created Wiser Earth (www.WiserEarth.org), an open source networking platform that links NGOs, foundations, business, government, social entrepreneurs, students, organizers, academics, activists, scientists, and citizens concerned about the environment and social justice. As a speaker, he has given keynote addresses to the Liberal Party of Canada, the King of Sweden at his inaugural Environmental Seminar, American Bookseller’s Association, Urban Land Institute, SRI International, Harvard University, Stanford University, the Wharton School, Cornell University, Prime Minister of New Zealand’s Conference on Natural Capitalism, US Department of Commerce, Australian Business Council, Yale University and Yale University Commencement, University of California (Berkeley) Commencement, Ministry of Agriculture France, American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS), Prince of Wales Conference on Business and the Environment— Cambridge University, Commonwealth Club, Herman Miller, National Wildlife Federation, State of Washington, American Society of Landscape Architects, American Institute of Architects, American Institute of Graphic Arts, American Solar Energy Association, Apple Computer, World Business Council for Sustainable Development, U.S. Forest Service, Ontario Hydro, Environment Canada, EPA, and several hundred others.

Paul Hawken has served on the board of many environmental organizations including Point Foundation (publisher of the Whole Earth Catalogs), Center for Plant Conservation, Conservation International, Trust for Public Land, Friends of the Earth, and National Audubon Society. Among recognition and awards received are: Green Cross Millennium Award for Individual Environmental Leadership presented by Mikhail Gorbachev in 2003; World Council for Corporate Governance in 2002; Small Business Administration "Entrepreneur of the Year" in 1990; Utne "One Hundred Visionaries who could Change our Lives" in 1995, Western Publications Association "Maggie" award for "Natural Capitalism" as the best Signed Editorial/Essay" in 1997; Creative Visionary Award by the International Society of Industrial Design; Design in Business Award for environmental responsibility by the American Center for Design; Council on Economic Priorities' 1990 Corporate Conscience Award; Metropolitan Magazine Editorial Award for the 100 best people, products and ideas that shape our lives; the Cine Golden Eagle award in video for the PBS program "Marketing" from Growing a Business; California Institute of Integral Studies Award "For Ongoing Humanitarian Contributions to the Bay Area Communities"; Esquire Magazine award for best 100 People of a Generation (1984)...

Hawken had a Swedish grandmother and a Scottish grandfather who were farmers. His father worked at UC Berkeley. He attended UC Berkeley and San Francisco State University, but received no formal degrees. Hawken worked in the Civil Rights Movement. He currently lives in or near Sausalito, California. Hawken has written seven books. His 1975 The Magic of Findhorn popularized the community of Findhorn, an ecological spiritual center in Scotland. Most of his subsequent books cover business, activism, and sustainable practices. These include The Next Economy (1983), Growing a Business, and The Ecology of Commerce (1993), in which he coined the term "restorative economy". The businessman and environmentalist Ray Anderson of Interface, Inc. credited The Ecology of Commerce with his environmental awakening. He described reading it as a "spear in the chest experience", after which Anderson started crisscrossing the country with a near-evangelical fervor, telling fellow executives about the need to reduce waste and carbon emissions. Hawken's book, Natural Capitalism: Creating the Next Industrial Revolution (1999), coauthored with Amory Lovins and Hunter Lovins, popularized the now-standard idea of natural capital and direct accounting for ecosystem services. Natural Capitalism has been translated into 26 other languages. Together with The Ecology of Commerce these books have been described as being "among the first to point the way towards a sustainable global economy". I taught this excellent book as part of my courses on Sustainability.

Blessed Unrest, How the Largest Movement in the World Came into Being and Why No One Saw It Coming, published in May 2007, argues that a vast world-changing "movement with no name" is now forming, which Hawken believes will prevail. He conceives of this "movement" as developing not by ideology but rather through the identification of what is and is not humane, like an immune system. The following passage gives an idea of his conception of the movement: It is axiomatic that we are at a threshold in human existence, a fundamental change in understanding about our relationship to nature and each other. We are moving from a world created by privilege to a world created by community. The current thrust of history is too supple to be labeled, but global themes are emerging in response to cascading ecological crises and human suffering. These ideas include the need for radical social change, the reinvention of market-based economics, the empowerment of women, activism on all levels, and the need for localized economic control. There are insistent calls for autonomy, appeals for a new resource ethic based on the tradition of the commons, demands for the reinstatement of cultural primacy over corporate hegemony, and a rising demand for radical transparency in politics and corporate decision making. It has been said that environmentalism failed as a movement, or worse yet, died. It is the other way around. Everyone on earth will be an environmentalist in the not too distant future, driven there by necessity and experience. I strongly believe that this will happen.

Hawken took over a small retail store in Boston in 1966 called Erewhon (after Samuel Butler's 1872 utopian novel) and turned it into the Erewhon Trading Company, a natural-foods wholesaler. With Dave Smith, he co-founded the Smith & Hawken garden supply company in 1979, a retail and catalog business. He heads PaxFan, which uses geometries found in nature to increase the efficiency of industrial fans, turbines, and electronic thermal management. From 1994 up and till 1998 Paul was founder and chairman of The Natural Step USA. In 2008, he co-founded Biomimicry Technologies with biologist Janine Benyus, the author of Biomimicry, Innovation Inspired by Nature, HarperCollins, 1997. The United States' Natural Step organization began in June 1994 when Peter Senge invited Dr. Robèrt and Hawken to address the Organizational Learning Center at the Sloan School of Management at MIT. Hawken's subsequent role was to create a steering committee, raise the necessary funding, incorporate as a 501\(c\)\(3\) educational foundation, secure offices and staff, develop curriculum, begin training and developing workshops, and enlist US corporations. TNS US organized a Scientific Consensus Meeting in April 1997, under the auspices of Wingspread and the sponsorship of the EPA. Hawken organized the first annual TNS US three-day workshops in Santa Fe, Chicago, Boston, and Portland; the latter attended by 600 people. He worked with World Resource Institute, CERES, to organize the first NGO Summit on Corporate Sustainability in Washington DC.

In 1995 Hawken was hired by Interface, Inc. as part of a 12 member group of outside consultants responsible to help make Interface the world's leading company in industrial ecology within the next ten years. The team helped move the company to a closed-loop manufacturing process so that product and waste is returned and remanufactured into new product. He conceived, wrote and co-designed the Interface Sustainability Report, which has won numerous awards and praise throughout the world. 1996 till 1998: Hawken was Co-Chairman of The Natural Step International. The Natural Step was founded in 1989 by Swedish scientist and medical doctor, Karl-Henrik Robèrt in order to create shared frameworks for understanding sustainable development. Its purpose is to teach and support environmental systems thinking in corporations, cities, governments, unions and academic institutions through a dialogue process rooted in basic science. The Natural Step teachings are sequenced scientific principles that provide a comprehensive basis for understanding the requirements for life on earth, and in particular, how individuals, organizations and companies can act so that those requisites are maintained and enhanced. The curriculum of the Natural Step was attained by engaging a wide spectrum of scientists to work together to create a consensus description of the living systems that drive our economy and culture. Rather than focusing on details where there is disagreement, the Natural Step describes first principles that guide cause and effect relationships in nature. Hawken's duties as Co-Chair were to act as an ambassador, helping establish new country organizations and working across international lines with companies seeking change.

Hawken founded and directed the Natural Capital Institute (NCI) located in Sausalito, California. Its main focus was Wiser.org, an open source database of activists and civil society organizations focused on environmental and social justice. Hawken has served on the board the Point Foundation (publisher of the Whole Earth Catalogs), the Center for Plant Conservation, Conservation International, the Trust for Public Land, Friends of the Earth, and the National Audubon Society. In 2002, Fortune called him "the original hippie entrepreneur." He received the Green Cross Millennium Award for Individual Environmental Leadership presented by Mikhail Gorbachev in 2003. Hawken has also been awarded six honorary doctorates.

Natural Capitalism: Creating the Next Industrial Revolution is a 1999 book co-authored by Paul Hawken, Amory Lovins and Hunter Lovins. It has been translated into a dozen languages and was the subject of a Harvard Business Review summary. In Natural Capitalism the authors describe the global economy as being dependent on natural resources and ecosystem services that nature provides. Natural Capitalism is a critique of traditional "Industrial Capitalism", saying that the traditional system of capitalism "does not fully conform to its own accounting principles. It liquidates its capital and calls it income. It neglects to assign any value to the largest stocks of capital it employs - the natural resources and living systems, as well as the social and cultural systems that are the basis of human capital." Natural capitalism recognizes the critical interdependency between the production and use of human-made capital and the maintenance and supply of natural capital. The authors argue that only through recognizing this essential relationship with the Earth's valuable resources can businesses, and the people they support, continue to exist. Their fundamental questions are: What would an economy look like if it fully valued all forms of capital? What if an economy were organized not around the abstractions of neoclassical economics and accountancy but around the biological realities of nature? What if generally accepted accounting principles recognized natural and human capital not as a free amenity in inexhaustible supply but as a finite and integrally valuable factor of production? What if in the absence of a rigorous way to practice such accounting, companies started to act as if such principles were in force. The Authors of Natural Capitalism say that these choices are possible and "such an economy would offer a stunning new set of opportunities for all of society, amounting to no less than the next industrial revolution. The book has many practical suggestions for companies interested in a sustainable future. As such it is one of the best business books that I have ever read, as I admire mainly business books with a practical message.

According to the authors, the "next industrial revolution" depends on the espousal of four central strategies: "the conservation of resources through more effective manufacturing processes, the reuse of materials as found in natural systems, a change in values from quantity to quality, and investing in natural capital, or restoring and sustaining natural resources". While traditional industrial capitalism primarily recognizes the value of money and goods as capital, Natural Capitalism extends recognition to natural capital and human capital. Problems such as pollution and social injustice may then be seen as failures to properly account for capital, rather than as inherent failures of capitalism itself. It is amazing how the solution to the impasse of the global economy is so obvious, everything is written, explained, and recommended in the books by Paul Hawken, Joseph Stiglitz, Naomi Klein, Joel Bakan... while the business community and the neoliberal politicians do exactly the opposite. The writing is on the wall, but only Daniel can see it, and the others are blind, deaf, and mute, mostly impotent, well, not all the others, but most of those who decide what is the right way for the countries and their economies anyhow.

The fundamental assumptions of Natural Capitalism are as follows:

1. The limiting factor to future economic development is the availability and functionality of natural capital, in particular, life-supporting services that have no substitutes and currently have no market value.
2. Misconceived or badly designed business systems, population growth, and wasteful patterns of consumption are the primary causes of the loss of natural capital, and all three must be addressed to achieve a sustainable economy.
3. Future economic progress can best take place in democratic, market-based systems of production and distribution in which all forms of capital are fully valued, including human, manufactured, financial, and natural capital.

4. One of the keys to the most beneficial employment of people, money, and the environment is radical increases in resource productivity.
5. Human welfare is best served by improving the quality and flow of desired services delivered, rather than by merely increasing the total dollar flow.
6. Economic and environmental sustainability depends on redressing global inequities of income and material well-being.

In a 2009 interview, Paul Hawken described his motivation behind the title "Natural Capitalism". He stated that it was intended to be a pun on "natural capital", a term originally coined by E.F. Schumacher in 1973. Hawken endorsed the underlying concept of natural capital, and its implications for society, so added an "-ism" at the end of that word as a double entendre. Despite this intention from Hawken, many readers interpreted this wordplay in the opposite way. There was dissent from readers who misunderstood the title, believing that "Capitalism" was the operative word, and that the authors were therefore justifying or defending the concept of capitalism. Hawken later expressed regret at this confusion, and stated that while he endorses the spirit of commerce and entrepreneurship, he does not endorse the "pathological" qualities inherent in pure capitalism. I have read about 200 hundred books on capitalism, the Great Recession, business ethics, social responsibility, globalization, social and economic justice and sustainability. Dozens of excellent writers have shown us the way, and it is so frustrating that one mediocre writer, a false Messiah, Milton Friedman, has captivated the mind of all the neoliberal politicians and tycoons. Actually, it is quite obvious, why he has so succeeded, he tells them that to be selfish is OK, to be greedy is OK, to plunder the goods of earth, of the countries, to accumulate billions without any scruples is OK, while 99% of the others earn less and less, while poverty is increasing, while nothing is trickling down, while all who differ are ostracized, are called socialists/communists/anti-Christ, are not allowed to teach at most of the universities, not allowed to manage important companies, not allowed to govern any country. All the big parties have complied with the plutocrats, the Democrats, the Labor, the French socialists, only few "lunatics" do not agree and maintain that "e pur si muove", but they are marginal although they know the truth. Paul Hawken is one of the few, I know and admire him, I was the first one to write about him in a marginal bulletin, nobody asked me for any comment on my article. I was probably the only one in Israel at least to teach his books, in the world he is better known but he cannot influence the economy and politics, why? Because most of the politicians receive huge contributions from the tycoons, from Wall Street, from the large corporations, and in return they exempt them from paying taxes, from an effective regulation, from being prosecuted for all their ethical crimes, from rendering the lives of billions miserable, with less welfare, education, health, higher inequality as in the outrageous roaring twenties level, lower quality of life!

DISRAELI – BIOGRAPHY BY ANDRE MAUROIS

In my youth I admired Benjamin Disraeli, and I read with great interest his biography by Andre Maurois. Disraeli was the first Jew to become prime minister of a leading European power – UK at its apotheosis, he was also a novelist, an intellectual, a friend of Queen Victoria, and most of all because he arranged for the British to purchase a major interest in 1875 in the Suez Canal Company in Ottoman-controlled Egypt. Without Disraeli Egypt would not have been occupied de facto by the British from 1882 until 1956, and the Jews could not have lived safely in Egypt. In spite of the fairy tales that I hear now and then from Jewish Egyptians that long for the "good" life with the Egyptians and the harmony between both people, the reality is that the Jews were not slaughtered and persecuted by the Egyptians only because Egypt was a de-facto British protectorate, which made possible the safety of the Jews and all the hundreds of thousands Europeans as well. When the British left Egypt in 1956 within a few years Egypt became "Judenrein/Europaerein", and all the Europeans and Jews had to leave Egypt penniless. The reader should not construe this statement as favoring colonialism in any way. I am against colonialism, as Israel has suffered from British colonialism maybe even more than Egypt, the British have prohibited immigration of Jews from Germany and Europe prior to World War II and even after that, they have helped the Jordanians and the Arabs in the Israeli war of independence, arrested and executed many Jews... But I just state the fact that the British were instrumental in keeping the safety of the Europeans in Egypt, furthermore they saved Egypt and the whole Middle East from the abominable German Nazi regime, that would have exterminated all the Jews of the Middle East as they did in Europe, and subjugated also the Arabs as they did with all their collaborators, from Petain to Quisling, from the Romanians to the Italians. The Egyptians, eager to get rid from the colonialists, got rid of all the Europeans and of all European influence, and their economic situation is today much worse than what it was before the revolution of 1952, while the extremely wise Lee Kuan Yew in Singapore kept the European influence, brought in European and American companies, kept the English language, and won it all – full independence, prosperity, moving from Third World to First, and keeping a much better democracy than the Egyptian democracy from the era of Nasser to Mubarak. Age has made me more realistic, if I was in the past socialist and then capitalist, colonialist and anti-colonialist, I judge the situation realistically, trying to adopt the best facets of a humane capitalism regime, independent country but open to European influence, Israeli patriot but also cosmopolitan. And after all, this was also the policy of Disraeli, who was a realistic and very wise statesman.

Benjamin Disraeli, in full Benjamin Disraeli, earl of Beaconsfield, Viscount Hughenden of Hughenden, byname Dizzy (born December 21, 1804, London, England—died April 19, 1881, London), British statesman and novelist who was twice prime minister (1868, 1874–80) and who provided the Conservative Party with a twofold policy of Tory democracy and imperialism. Disraeli was of Italian-Jewish descent, the eldest son and second child of Isaac D'Israeli and Maria Basevi. The most important event in Disraeli's boyhood was his father's quarrel in 1813 with the synagogue of Bevis Marks, which led to the decision in 1817 to have his children baptized as Christians. Until 1858, Jews by religion were excluded from Parliament; except for the father's decision, Disraeli's political career could never have taken the form it did. Disraeli was educated at small private schools. At the age of 17 he was articled to a firm of solicitors, but he longed to become notable in a more sensational manner. His first efforts were disastrous. In 1824 he speculated recklessly in South American mining shares, and, when he lost all a year later, he was left so badly in debt that he did not recover until well past middle age. Earlier he had persuaded the publisher John Murray, his father's friend, to launch a daily newspaper, the Representative. It was a complete failure. Disraeli, unable to pay his promised share of the capital, quarreled with Murray and others. Moreover, in his novel Vivian Grey (1826–27), published anonymously, he lampooned Murray while telling the story of the failure. Disraeli was unmasked as the author, and he was widely criticized.

Disraeli suffered what would later be called a nervous breakdown and did little during the next four years. He wrote another extravagant novel, The Young Duke (1831), and in 1830 began 16 months of travel in the Mediterranean countries and the Middle East. These travels not only furnished him with material for Oriental descriptions he used in later novels but also influenced his attitude in foreign relations with India, Egypt, and Turkey in the 1870s. Back in England, he was active in London social and literary life, where his dandified dress, conceit and affectation, and exotic good looks made him a striking if not always popular figure. He was invited to fashionable parties and met most of the celebrities of the day. His novel Contarini Fleming

(1832) has considerable autobiographical interest, like many of his novels, as well as echoes of his political thought. By 1831 Disraeli had decided to enter politics and sought a seat in Buckinghamshire, near Wycombe, where his family had settled. As an independent radical, he stood for and lost High Wycombe twice in 1832 and once in 1835. Realizing that he must attach himself to one of the political parties, he made a somewhat eccentric interpretation of Toryism, which some features of his radicalism fitted. In 1835 he unsuccessfully stood for Taunton as the official Conservative candidate. His extravagant behaviour, great debts, and open liaison with Henrietta, wife of Sir Francis Sykes (the prototype of the heroine in his novel Henrietta Temple [1837]), all gave him a dubious reputation. In 1837, however, he successfully stood for Maidstone in Kent as the Conservative candidate. His maiden speech in the House of Commons was a failure. Elaborate metaphors, affected mannerisms, and foppish dress led to his being shouted down. But he was not silenced. He concluded, defiantly and prophetically, "I will sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me."

Before long, Disraeli became a speaker who commanded attention. He established his social position by marrying in 1839 Mrs. Wyndham Lewis, a widow with a life interest in a London house and £4,000 a year. She was deeply devoted to Disraeli, and, when he teased her in company that he had married for her worldly goods, she would say, "Dizzy married me for my money but if he had the chance again he would marry me for love." Her husband agreed. The Conservative leader, Sir Robert Peel, encouraged Disraeli, but, when in 1841 the Conservatives won the election and Peel became prime minister, Disraeli was not given office in the cabinet. He was mortified at the rebuff, and his attitude toward Peel and his brand of Conservatism became increasingly critical. A group of young Tories, nicknamed Young England, and led by George Smythe (later Lord Stangford), looked to Disraeli for inspiration, and he obliged them, notably in his novel Coningsby; or, The New Generation (1844), in which the hero is patterned on Smythe, and the cool, pragmatic, humdrum, middle-class Conservatism that Peel represented is contrasted to Young England's romantic, aristocratic, nostalgic, and escapist attitude. In 1845, when the combination of the Irish famine and the arguments of Richard Cobden convinced Peel to repeal the protective duties on foreign imported grain known as the Corn Laws, Disraeli found his issue. Young England could rally against Peel not only their own members but the great mass of the country squires who formed the backbone of the Conservative Party. As lieutenant to Lord George Bentinck, the nominal leader of the rebels, Disraeli consolidated the opposition to Peel in a series of brilliant speeches. His invective greatly embittered the battle and created lasting resentment among Peel's followers. While Disraeli and his fellow protectionists could not stop the repeal of the Corn Laws because the Whigs also backed the bill, the rebels put Peel in the minority on another issue and forced him to resign in 1846.

The loyalty of most of the Conservative former ministers to Peel and the death of Bentinck made Disraeli indisputably the leader of the opposition in the Commons. Disraeli spent the next few years trying to extricate his party from what he had come to recognize as the "hopeless cause" of protection. While Disraeli's policy was sensible, it raised mistrust among his followers, as did his pride in and insistence upon his Jewish ancestry. The party could not, however, do without his talents. His election to Parliament as member for Buckinghamshire in 1847 and his purchase of Hughenden Manor, near High Wycombe, in 1848 fortified his social and political power. His finances, however, remained shaky. When the Whig government fell in 1852 and the earl of Derby, leader of the Conservative Party, formed a short-lived minority government, Disraeli was chancellor of the Exchequer despite his protest that he knew nothing of finance. His budget in fact brought the government down in 1852, though Disraeli could hardly be blamed. The free-trade majority in the Commons was determined to defeat measures that relieved agriculture, even though the method chosen did not involve protection, yet Disraeli had to bring forward some such proposals to placate his followers. Again, until 1858, the Tories were in opposition. Then Derby again formed a minority government with Disraeli as chancellor of the Exchequer. Disraeli for some time had felt there was no reason to allow parliamentary reform to be a Whig monopoly, and so he introduced a moderate reform bill in 1859. The bill, however, seemed too obviously designed to help his party, and so it was defeated; the Tories again were out of office and remained so for six years. (You need a very strong character to overcome so many failures, but Disraeli knew how to recover from the lowest abysses and climb to the highest peaks.)

In 1865 when the Whig-Liberal leader Lord Russell brought forward a moderate reform bill, a combination of Tory opposition and a revolt against Russell toppled his government. Derby formed his third minority government with Disraeli as chancellor of the Exchequer. Although the initiative for a new Conservative reform bill came from Queen Victoria and Lord Derby, Disraeli introduced it in the Commons and conducted the fight for it with unsurpassed enthusiasm and mastery of parliamentary tactics. He believed the bill should be a sweeping one with certain safeguards, and he was determined that it should be carried by a Conservative government. The Liberals, however, had a majority, and he had to accept their amendments, which removed nearly all the safeguards. The bill that passed doubled the existing electorate and was more democratic than most Conservatives had foreseen. Derby called it “a leap in the dark,” but Disraeli could fairly claim that the bill had gone far toward “realizing the dream of my life and re-establishing Toryism as a national foundation.” In 1868 when Derby retired from politics, Disraeli became prime minister. “Yes,” he said in reply to a friend’s congratulations, “I have climbed to the top of a greasy pole.” The government was only a caretaker one, for the general election awaited only the completion of a new electoral register, and later in 1868 the Liberals won. Disraeli set a precedent by resigning before Parliament met. In the following 12-year period, politics changed from the chaotic collection of ill-defined, shifting groups that had been common from the beginning of Disraeli’s career. Now the old politics defined by personalities shifted to an emergence of two parties with coherent policies. The party leaders, Disraeli and William E. Gladstone, were implacable enemies, and they polarized the parties.

At first Disraeli played a comparatively peaceful role. He tried to create a new image for the Conservative Party that he hoped would persuade the new electorate. His seeming apathy disturbed his followers, and his novel Lothair (3 vol., 1870), a political comedy, seemed to some of them undignified. From 1872, however, Disraeli ran the party with a firm hand. He sharply differentiated Conservative from Liberal policy on several issues: he defended the monarchy, the House of Lords, and the church against what he took to be the threat of radical Liberal policy; he put forth a policy to consolidate the empire, with special emphasis on India; he dwelt on social reform; he enunciated a strong foreign policy, especially against Russia. In 1872 Disraeli’s wife died of cancer after many months of illness. Her death brought material losses: her house in London and her fortune passed to cousins. At age 68 his health was not good, but he turned implacably to political battle. He began a romantic friendship with two sisters, Lady Bradford and Lady Chesterfield, with whom he corresponded on politics and his personal feelings until his death. His political fortunes turned when Gladstone’s ministry was defeated in 1873. When Gladstone resigned, Disraeli refused to take office, pleading there was too much uncompleted business to dissolve Parliament, and that a minority government could only damage his party’s prospects. Gladstone reluctantly returned to office, but within a year he dissolved the Parliament himself. Disraeli had been at work on party organization and electoral machinery, and the Conservatives won a resounding victory in 1874.

Disraeli gained power too late. He aged rapidly during his second ministry. But he formed a strong cabinet and profited from the friendship of the queen, a political conservative who disliked Gladstone. Disraeli treated her as a human being, whereas Gladstone treated her as a political institution. In regard to social reform, Disraeli was able at last to show that Tory democracy was more than a slogan. The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act made effective slum clearance possible. The Public Health Act of 1875 codified the complicated law on that subject. Equally important were an enlightened series of factory acts (1874, 1878) preventing the exploitation of labour and two trades union acts that clarified the legal position of those bodies. Disraeli's imperial and foreign policies were even more in the public eye. His first great success was the acquisition of Suez Canal shares. The extravagant and spendthrift khedive Ismā'īl Pasha of Egypt owned slightly less than half the Suez Canal Company's shares and was anxious to sell. An English journalist discovered this fact and told the Foreign Office. Disraeli overrode its recommendation against the purchase and bought the shares using funds provided by the Rothschild family until Parliament could confirm the bargain. The deal was seen as a notable triumph for imperial prestige. Early in 1876 Disraeli brought in a bill conferring on Queen Victoria the title empress of India. There was much opposition, and Disraeli would have gladly postponed it, but the queen insisted. For some time his poor health had made leading the Commons onerous, so he accepted a peerage, taking the titles earl of Beaconsfield and Viscount Hughenden of Hughenden, and became leader in the House of Lords.

Foreign policy largely occupied him until 1878. The Russian-Turkish conflict had lain dormant since the Crimean War in the 1850s, but Christian subjects of the Ottoman Empire revolted against intolerable misrule. Russia declared war on Turkey in 1877 and reached the gates of Constantinople early in 1878. Britain feared for the safety of the route to India, but Disraeli correctly judged that a show of force would be enough to bring the exhausted Russian forces to terms. The highly Pan-Slavist Treaty of Stefano forced on Turkey by Russia had to be submitted to a European Congress at Berlin in 1878. Beaconsfield attended and won all concessions he wanted. He returned to London in triumph, declaring that he had brought back "peace with honour." At this climax of his career, the queen offered him a dukedom, which he refused, and the Order of the Garter, which he accepted. Thereafter his fortunes waned with disaster in Afghanistan, forces slaughtered in South Africa, agricultural distress, and an industrial slump. The Conservatives were heavily defeated in the general election of 1880. Beaconsfield kept his party leadership and finished Endymion (3 vol., 1880), a mellow, nostalgic political novel viewing his early career. His health failed rapidly, and, a few days after his burial in the family vault at Hughenden, Queen Victoria came to lay a wreath upon the tomb of her favourite prime minister. MARCEL DASSAULT – BIOGRAPHY BY CLAUDE CARLIER, VISION AND ETHICAL CODES OF DASSAULT AVIATION AND OF ISRAELI SIBAT – MOD INTERNATIONAL DEFENSE COOPERATION DIRECTORATE (SIBAT'S WRITTEN BY JACQUES CORY)

I read with great interest the biography of Marcel Dassault by Claude Carlier, and it surprised me to discover a very warm person, quite different from the stereotype of a tycoon. Dassault suffered from anti-Semitism, was persecuted by the Nazis and deported to Buchenwald, and suffered from this deportation throughout all his life. He converted to Catholicism, changed his name, but he was always perceived as the Jewish tycoon. He symbolizes the precarious situation of the Jews in the diaspora, when even if they are very successful, very rich, and famous they are still regarded as Jews. Only in Israel, you cease to be regarded as a Jew, but then you become a Sephardi, Ashkenazi, Oriental, Russian new immigrant, or Ethiopian... Dassault nevertheless assisted very much Israel and its military industry and in 1967, after the French Embargo of De Gaulle and the Six-Day War, he enabled the smuggling of the manufacturing plans of the Mirage

5, with 50 motors, that were the basis of the production of the Nesher aircraft at the Israeli Aircraft Industries, where I worked in 1968-1970. Actually he can be called one of the founding fathers of the Israeli aircraft and electronic industry, where I worked for most of my career.

Marcel Dassault, born Marcel Bloch (22 January 1892 – 17 April 1986), was a French aircraft industrialist. Marcel Dassault was born as Marcel Bloch on January 22, 1892 in Paris. Both his parents were Jewish. He was educated at the Lycée Condorcet in Paris. He graduated from the Breguet School and Supaéro. Dassault invented a type of aircraft propeller used by the French army during World War I and founded the Société des Avions Marcel Bloch aircraft company. Following the nationalization of his company in 1936, under the Front Populaire, he stayed as a director. After refusing collaboration with the German aviation industry of Bordeaux-Aéronautique, Dassault was deported to Buchenwald during World War II, while his wife was interned near Paris. After the war, he built the foremost military aircraft manufacturer in France, Avions Marcel Dassault. In 1919, he married Madeleine Minckes, the daughter of a wealthy Jewish family of furniture dealers. They had two sons, Claude and Serge. He changed his name from Bloch to Bloch-Dassault and, in 1949, to simply Dassault. Dassault was the codename used by his brother, General Darius Paul Bloch, when he served in the French resistance, and is derived from char d'assaut, French for "battle tank". He converted to Catholicism in 1950. Marcel Dassault died in Neuilly-sur-Seine, in 1986 and was buried in the Passy Cemetery in the 16th arrondissement of Paris. In 1991, the rond-point des Champs-Élysées was renamed the rond-point des Champs-Élysées-Marcel Dassault in his honor. The firm is now the Groupe Industriel Marcel Dassault, whose CEO was Serge Dassault, Marcel's son. Serge Dassault (born 4 April 1925) is a French heir, business executive and politician. He serves as the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Dassault Group and a conservative politician. I met Serge Dassault as I collaborated with one of the managers of his group, and so I can say that in spite of what I think of tycoons I shook hands with a tycoon owning about 18 billion Euros, 5th richest man in France.

The biography of Marcel Dassault from the Dassault Aviation website:

Marcel Bloch, the youngest of a doctor's four children, was born on January 22, 1892, in Paris, France. His precocious interest in technological innovation in general – and electricity in particular – became rapidly apparent. "One sunny day in the school playground", he once recalled, "I looked up at the sky and saw the Count of Lambert's Wilbur Wright passing the Eiffel tower for the first time. I had never seen a plane before. There and then, I knew that aviation had become a part of my heart and thoughts". After high school and a spell at Breguet School of Electricity, Bloch joined Ecole Supérieure d'Aéronautique, a school of aviation, whence he graduated in 1913. He first contributed to France's aviation industry during World War I. He used the engineering skills he had acquired at Chalais Meudon Aeronautical Laboratory to design a propeller, called the Éclair (1916), and a twin-seater fighter, the SEA 4 (1918), working alongside Henry Potez and Louis Coroller. Bloch married in 1919, and had two sons, Claude and Serge. After dabbling in real-estate and, to a lesser extent, cars, throughout the 1920s, 1930 saw him gather a new team together and return to aviation. He remembered that occasion, in his own terms, as "One day – or indeed I should say one evening – I was at Le Bourget airport and saw Lindbergh land the Spirit of Saint Louis after flying over the Atlantic. I understood something had changed in aviation, and that civil aviation would be born. Wilbur Wright's plane first drew me to aviation. The Spirit of Saint Louis brought me back."

The Front Populaire, the political party in power at the time, nationalized Bloch's firm in 1936. He founded another one, Société Anonyme des Avions Marcel Bloch (SAAMB) on December 12 that same year. From a legal standpoint, that was Dassault Aviation's foundation date. He was concurrently managing director of another firm, Société Nationale des Constructions Aéronautiques du Sud-Ouest (SNCASO), in charge of serially manufacturing his aircraft. World War II broke out and those planes were used to defend France's skies in 1939 and 1940. Bloch's refusal to collaborate with the invading army after the Armistice led to his incarceration in Montluc Fort in Lyons, along with his wife and children, at the hands of the Vichy Government. He was then sent to Drancy concentration camp before spending eight months in Buchenwald. Post-diphtheria paralysis from 1945 to 1953 did not stop Bloch resuming his aeronautical endeavors after the war. In order to shed the somber souvenirs of war, Marcel Bloch and his family decided to change names. Dassault was the alias his brother, General Paul Bloch, had used in the Resistance, and the name Marcel adopted in 1949. He diversified into newspapers (at the head of Semaine de France) and, in politics, was to become senator for the Alpes Maritimes department and representative for the Oise department. And Dassault was the name that came to be known around the world for outstanding jet-powered aircraft.

Besides being the French Air Force's first jet aircraft, the MD-450 Ouragan (1949) pioneered the French postwar aeronautical industry's steps into the export market (selling in India and Israel). The Mystère IV (1954) earned endorsement for the company's expertise when the United States ordered 225 planes as part of an agreement with NATO. The 1967 Six Day War between Israel and its neighboring Arab nations provided conclusive evidence of the quality of Dassault aircraft. Other initiatives, like taking part in France's efforts to develop strategic nuclear power after the 1956 Suez expedition through the Mirage IV program (1959), were later to further cement Marcel Dassault's prominence. Superior civil aircraft also held much of Dassault's interest. And here, again, it was the United States that provided consecration for the company's planes. In this case, Pan Am was the first airline to place a large-scale order and thereby open the doors to the American market. Besides his work in aviation, newspapers and politics, Dassault was keen on architecture, cinema, banking and the stock market. His services to his country earned him France's highest honor, the Legion of Honor's Grand Cross. Marcel Dassault died on 17 April 1986. France's government, top-ranking officials, and local and international media paid him an extraordinary tribute. His was the first funeral celebrated at Invalides for a French industrial businessperson. (A personal remark – Dassault's life is an ode to perseverance, he converted to Catholicism, but his personality kept the most important traits of the Jews).

From the Sabatier d'Espeyran family, Marcel Dassault purchased the buildings at nos. 7 and 9 rond-point des Champs-Élysées at the angle of the avenue des Champs-Élysées and avenue Montaigne in Paris. The impressive structure at no. 7, built in 1844, has been altered over the years including by Dassault's friend, architect Georges Hennequin (1893—1969), when Dassault acquired the buildings in July 1952. (The neo-Louis XV-style domicile at no. 7, first as the Hôtel d'Espeyran, was built by architect Henri Parent for Félicie Durand [1819-1899], the widow of Frédéric Sabatier d'Espeyran [1813-1864].) Now known as the Hôtel Marcel Dassault, the building at no. 7 has been occupied from 2002 by auction house Artcurial, which further made alterations according to plans by architect Jean-Michel Wilmotte. The structure at no. 9 continues to be occupied by the Groupe Industriel Marcel Dassault. Here again, a "personal" angle, the hotel where I stayed during dozens of years when I came on business, study and pleasure to Paris, was right next to the rond-point, so I passed hundreds of time by the Dassault "Hotel" which I believe was much more luxurious than the modest hotel where I stayed in my visits to Paris, I was never invited to the Dassault Hotel, so I cannot know for sure, but the location of the Dassault Hotel is the best in Paris, and the residents can go to the best theaters in Paris by foot, to an excellent cinema just next to the hotel, and to one of Paris' best restaurants.

A few words on Dassault Group. First of all about Sabca: SABCA (Sociétés Anonyme Belge de Constructions Aéronautiques) is a Belgian aerospace company, controlled by Dassault Group and Stork. Its main sectors of activity are civil aviation, space and defence. The company has three locations: Brussels - headquarters and main centre of operations, Charleroi - military aircraft and helicopter maintenance, technical and logistic support to the customers, Limburg - high-performance composite component manufacturing subsidiary. I told in this book about fate and how the company where I worked – Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) was about to purchase Sabca in April 1969. I worked as an assistant to the VP Planning Mike Doron, and was chosen to be the liaison for the purchasing, because inter alia French was my mother tongue and I was a graduate of the Business School Insead, where we studied about European economy. My suitcases were ready, I said goodbye to my parents and to all my friends, but a couple of days before I was about to leave the purchase was cancelled because of the embargo. In the same week I met Ruthy my wife at a party, 3 weeks later I proposed to her, and 3 months later we were married. So, not only IAI and Elbit, where I later worked as a VP Sales and Finance, have to thank warmly France and De Gaulle for the embargo (and Dassault for breaking the embargo), I personally owe my happiness to them, as otherwise I would not have married Ruthy but possibly a Belgian, French or Swiss woman, and I would have felt estranged during all my life.

Dassault Group (GIMD, Groupe Dassault, or the Groupe Industriel Marcel Dassault S.A.) is a France-based group of companies established in 1929 with the creation of Dassault Aviation by Marcel Dassault, and currently led by son Serge Dassault with cofounder and CEO of Dassault Systèmes Charles Edelstenne, and Dassault Aviation CEO Éric Trappier. The subsidiaries are: Dassault Aviation - Dassault Falcon Jet, Dassault Falcon Service, Sogitec (simulation and integrated logistic support systems); SABCA (design and manufacturing of aerospace equipment) - SABCA Limburg, Lummen; Dassault Systèmes (software and PLM development solutions), Société de Véhicules Electriques (SVE), a joint venture between Dassault and Heuliez for the development of electric and plug-in electric hybrid vehicles (Cleanova II based on Renault Kangoo), its President and CEO is Gérard Thery; Figaro Group (media, including Le Figaro and FC Nantes); Immobiliere Dassault (real estate), led by Claude Dassault and Olivier Costa de Beauregard; Artcurial (auctions) - Argana (thoroughbred auctions) (30%); Château Dassault (wine). The group is quite diversified, including aircraft industries, logistic support systems, aerospace equipment, electric vehicles, media – including Le Figaro one of the best French newspapers, real estate, and even wine. The group's main company is Dassault Aviation.

Dassault Aviation SA, an international French aircraft manufacturer of military, regional, and business jets, a subsidiary of Dassault Group. It was founded in 1929 by Marcel Bloch as Société des Avions Marcel Bloch or "MB". After World War II, Marcel Bloch changed his name to Marcel Dassault, and the name of the company was changed to Avions Marcel Dassault on 20 January 1947. In 1971 Dassault acquired Breguet, forming Avions Marcel Dassault-Breguet Aviation (AMD-BA). In 1990 the company was renamed Dassault Aviation. The Dassault Aviation Group is headed by Eric Trappier, Chairman and CEO since 9 January 2013, Charles Edelstenne, General Manager of Dassault Group, and Serge Dassault, Honorary Chairman. In 2015, Dassault Aviation is a multinational company employing almost 11,745 people, including 9,000 in France, with a commercial presence in over 83 countries and its activities are centered on the following areas: aeronautics with 8,000 aircraft delivered since 1945, mainly business jets representing 71% of activity (Falcon) and also military aircraft (Mirage 2000, Rafale and nEUROn); space activities (ground telemetry systems, spacecraft design and pyrotechnic activities); services (Dassault Procurement Services, Dassault Falcon Jet and Dassault Falcon Service); aerospace and defense systems (Sogitec Industries). Dassault Aviation is a public company traded as Euronext. In 2014 its Consolidated: Revenue was € 3.680 billion, Net Income was €398.000 million, Orders amounts to EUR 4.64 billion. Website: www.dassault-aviation.com. Sogitec, a wholly owned subsidiary of Dassault, makes advanced avionics simulation, 3D imaging, military flight simulators, and document imaging systems. Airbus sold some of its ownership back to Dassault in 2014, and further reduced its share in 2015. Issued Capital/Share Ownership on December 31, 2015 is as follows: Groupe Industriel Marcel Dassault: 56.11%, Airbus: 23.60%, Group Dassault Aviation: 4.49%, Free Float: 15.80%.

In April 2014 I have written the Ethical Code of Sibat, the Israel Ministry of Defense/MOD International Defense Cooperation Directorate. I was assisted by the Director of Sibat, its top management, as well as the initiator of the process Shahar Horev. The photo of the signing of the Ethical Code by the Director of Sibat Brigadier General Shamaya Avieli, top management, and the employees (from center to right – the Director, Shahar Horev, and Dr. Jacques Cory) is the central photo of my Website's Home, as it was the peak of my business ethics career, ten years after I was awarded my PhD on Business Ethics, and a few months before I retired due to health conditions. The writing of the business code was accompanied by the writing of ten business cases on ethical issues of Sibat, and an assimilation and training process to the management and employees of Sibat, which I wrote and conducted during the months that preceded the signing of the ethical code. This project received in 2015 the first prize of the Israeli MOD Quality Contest and was among the 4-7 finalists of all the Israeli Government Agency Contest. In preparing the ethical code of Sibat I read and analyzed ethical codes of similar organizations in the Western countries as well as the ethical codes of Dassault Aviation, and of large American defense corporations, and of Elbit, where I worked in the past as VP Sales and Finance and was responsible for all the sales to the Israeli MOD, military and civilian exports. I read with great interest the ethical code of Dassault as I am fully aware of all the ethical dilemmas of military sales to corrupt governments, of the effect of the American Anti-Corruption Act, and how the US government exerted a tremendous pressure on France, Israel, and other military exporters to sign similar acts, in order to maintain a fair competition in this market, without bribes and corruption.

The ethical code that I have devised for Sibat was based on Sibat's Assignment and Vision. Israel is known around the world for its pioneering, operationally-proven defense systems - which are developed by its defense industries, and implemented all around the globe. These innovative systems are developed in order to provide effective and advanced capabilities to meet all threats. SIBAT, the Israel MOD International Defense Cooperation directorate is uniquely positioned as an essential division within the Israel Ministry of Defense (IMOD), while having a close, ongoing relationship with the defense industry. This combination ensures SIBAT to maintain in-depth and up-to-date knowledge of the defense world's relevant concepts, as well as a clear understanding of the Israel Defense Forces' (IDF) operational needs.

SIBAT's Assignment

- Cooperate with & support the efforts of the Israeli defense industries
- Establish connections in target countries
- Locate & initiate business opportunities
- Reflect the marketing status picture & provide relevant business information
- Sell excess IDF materiel
- Lead the national defense export effort

SIBAT's Vision

- Partake in the growth of the Israeli defense industry
- Tap into international markets & new fields of activity
- Promote a culture of sharing & cooperation for the benefit of Israel's defense exports

- Strive for excellence & promptness of response and maintain on-going learning & efficiency improvement processes
- Maintain strict integrity & the highest ethics and operate on the basis of an in-depth understanding of the defense export world
- Strive to establish Israel as a global leader in the field

SIBAT Facilitates international cooperation through its various services

- Generating Government-to-Government agreements
- Initiating official foreign delegations
- Identifying business opportunities with the Israeli defense industry
- Pinpointing the relevant technological solutions for specific requirements
- Establishing of joint ventures
- Conducting advanced training seminars
- Managing the sales of IDF inventory
- Providing quality assurance and technical support services for G-to-G agreements
- Providing in-depth information on Israel's defense industry through biennial directory
- Producing conferences; showcasing Israel's technologies and capabilities under one roof through the Israel National Pavilion; attending global fairs & exhibitions and facilitating direct contact with participating industries

SIBAT's extensive global presence - backed by knowledgeable, well-trained representatives - enables effective cooperation and coordination between Israeli and foreign companies, and between Israel and governments around the world. SIBAT has amassed the capabilities and experience required in order to operate effectively in any of these three business models:

- G to G – Government-to-Government: As a government agency, SIBAT works directly with other governments
- C to G – Company-to-Government: With its extensive knowledge of Israeli defense manufacturers, SIBAT matches relevant companies to each country's technological needs
- C to C – Company-to-Company: SIBAT continually seeks opportunities for various types of cooperation, and assists in locating the best-suited technological solutions and partners.

Unfortunately, the ethical code of Sibat was not translated into English, and we bring here a link to the code in Hebrew. But, as I worked during most of my career in defense companies and I have a unique experience in practical business ethics, I have devised a workable code of ethics that is unprecedented to the best of my knowledge. The ethical code does not consist of empty words as in many similar organizations in government and in defense corporations, either because it is not workable or because nobody intends anyhow to comply to the code. I have no idea what is the practice of the implementation of the ethical code of Dassault, and I hope that it is implemented a la lettre. Anyhow, I bring here the main components of the Dassault code.

Vision - Our goal, of reaching “Higher, Together”, is becoming a reality.

Each and every one of our airplanes reflects our expertise in state-of-the-art technologies, applied for the greater benefit of our customers. These technologies underpin their independence, their management of time and space, their decisions and actions, anywhere in the world. Our long-term viability is built on technical and industrial decisions that take a pragmatic, yet audacious approach, in line with today's ethical, social and environmental imperatives. As a pivotal part of a strategic, high-value-added industry, Dassault Aviation helps foster the development of a dense fabric of outstanding companies, laboratories and schools. We deploy expertise unrivaled in Europe, built on the skills and experience of our people, and shared with a number of partners, both in France and around the world. More than 2,000 Falcon jets in service. More than 1,000 combat aircraft in service. 11,745 employees, including 9,189 in France. The quality of the work environment depends on mutual respect, listening to different viewpoints, continuous skills development and a real spirit of teamwork.

Positive social engagement - Dassault Aviation signed agreements in 2014 concerning personal protection schemes, the employment of disabled persons, career development and equal pay. Promoting diversity - We reaffirm our commitment to fighting discrimination, and to promoting diversity and equal opportunity. Gender equality - Dassault Aviation signed an agreement on gender equality in the workplace, including career opportunities and compensation. The hiring of women has increased, thanks to our ambitious goals and an array of communications measures. We also continue to apply a policy based on ensuring access to all for management training, and promoting women to top management positions. Our subsidiaries, Sogitec Industries and Dassault Falcon Service, renewed their action plans to facilitate the hiring of women and subsequent professional training, along with support for career development and achieving work-life balance. Dassault Falcon Jet Corp. is participating in initiatives to aid minorities, women, veterans and the disabled, and supports their integration in the workplace in partnership with Goodwill Industries of America. Integrating disabled persons - Dassault Aviation signed a company-wide agreement in 2014 concerning the hiring and continued employment of persons with disabilities. We also act early in the process to help provide training in aerospace jobs for the disabled. Ties between generations - Dassault Aviation has implemented the "intergenerations" agreement, signed in 2013, to ensure the transmission of knowledge between generations and keep seniors in the workforce.

Fostering wellbeing at work - Dassault Aviation offers employees a top-flight work environment, with a special focus on occupational risk management and professional training. Our ethics charter and communications guidelines facilitate relations in the workplace. In 2014 we also drew up a best practices charter for the management of production teams, in conjunction with local managers, to support their daily actions. In the occupational health and safety field, the parent company hired an ergonomics expert last year to optimize our policy on adapting workstations. We also teamed up with the French cardiology association to organize a campaign informing people of cardiovascular risks – over and above our already rigorous medical monitoring policy. In addition, we set up a supplementary insurance scheme for employees who are expats or on assignment abroad. Dassault Falcon Jet Corp. is implementing measures to protect health (exercise, diet, etc.) along with aid programs for employees and their families (financial aid, programs to fight addictions, etc.). A number of training measures are also deployed yearly for employees at all levels. Dassault Aviation continued its actions concerning psychosocial risks, and is launching an action plan to develop our prevention-based culture.

Ethical Charter - Message from the Chairman & Chief Executive Officer

Founded almost a century ago, the Dassault Aviation Group is now one of the world's major players in civil and military aeronautics. Renowned for its technical and industrial expertise, buttressed by employees who are passionate about what they do, offering outstanding products, innovative processes and working in synergy with its partners, the Group looks to the future with confidence. The Dassault Aviation Group also nurtures and projects a clear identity, strong values and strict ethical principles.

Since 2001, the Group has stated these principles in this very document, its Ethical Charter. The Charter comprises two sections. The first section is entitled “Our values” and describes our five main guiding principles. The second section is called “Our code of conduct” which pragmatically illustrates daily conduct flowing from these values. The Ethical Charter aims to rally the men and women in our Group around these values and is intended to inspire their actions and convey Dassault Aviation’s image to our customers, partners and suppliers. This Charter represents a collective commitment which will come into its own as long as everyone is on board. Higher together! Éric Trappier (As far as I could understand from the biography of Marcel Dassault, this ethical charter and the vision of the company comply with his spirit).

CUSTOMER SPIRIT - Satisfying the customer is both our philosophy and our guideline: being a good listener, understanding his/her needs, acting in a manner which efficiently serves him/her; keeping our word; offering excellent technical performance, confidentiality when needed and customized follow-up while optimizing the control of business expenses and response times.

OUR VALUES - Ethical charter | 3 – HUMAN QUALITIES - People are the heart of our Group. We promote team spirit, the sharing of knowledge and know-how, creative initiative, and respect for ethics. We favor united action at all levels, mutual respect, the search for professional self-realization, and, from a human perspective, the feeling of being part of a successful, innovative business enterprise.

ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE - We regard creating value as an essential goal: it guarantees our profitability, our financial stability, and our long-term future. In a context of intense international competition, we must be flexible, adaptable, and responsive in dealings with our customers, our suppliers, and our partners.

TECHNOLOGICAL EXCELLENCE AND INNOVATION - This is our Group’s spirit, passion, history, and motto. We ensure the quality, reliability, and safety of our aircraft through a dynamic of constant innovation combined with our project management capability and our mastery of complex systems. We take constant care of controlling and reducing the environmental signature of our activities and products.

OPENNESS TO THE WORLD - To reach these goals, we are engaged in sustained programs of scientific, technological, technical, and industrial cooperation in France, the U.S. and abroad, in a spirit of partnership. We are active in national and international aviation and defense organizations. Our internal and external communication is open and transparent.

Our code of conduct - Our Code of Conduct translates the 5 professional and ethical values expressed by the Dassault Aviation Group into pragmatic and operational terms. Its purpose is to unite the Group’s personnel around these principles. The code of conduct is both a collective commitment and an individual imperative. It does not substitute for the national and international legislation in force. It is not a contractual document, but an ethical commitment which must be known and applied by all.

Global Compact

Evolving in a globalized and strongly competitive environment, Dassault Aviation has asserted its values, identity and ethics in the company’s Ethical Charter. As a responsible corporate citizen, the company has integrated the social, human, economic and environmental dimensions of its operations into relations with partners and staff, and strives for constant improvements and sustainable business growth. In addition, since 2003 Dassault Aviation has been one of the first companies to join the Global Compact, the initiative launched by United Nations Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, to federate businesses, public organizations and civil society around ten principles in favor of a more viable and open economy. While ensuring respect for these principles, Dassault Aviation also promotes them in its corporate documents (annual report, contracts to name a few) and among partners. Each year on the Global Compact website, the company describes its best practices as a concrete illustration of the Global Compact principles.

The Ten Principles of Global Compact

The UN Global Compact's ten principles in the areas of human rights, labour, the environment and anti-corruption enjoy universal consensus and are derived from:

- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights
- The International Labour Organization's Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work
- The Rio Declaration on Environment and Development
- The United Nations Convention Against Corruption

The Global Compact asks companies to embrace, support and enact, within their sphere of influence, a set of core values in the areas of human rights, labour standards, the environment, and anti-corruption:

Human Rights

Principle 1: Businesses should support and respect the protection of internationally proclaimed human rights;

Principle 2: make sure that they are not complicit in human rights abuses.

Labour Standards

Principle 3: Businesses should uphold the freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining;

Principle 4: the elimination of all forms of forced and compulsory labour;

Principle 5: the effective abolition of child labour;

Principle 6: the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation.

Environment

Principle 7: Businesses should support a precautionary approach to environmental challenges;

Principle 8: undertake initiatives to promote greater environmental responsibility;

Principle 9: encourage the development and diffusion of environmentally friendly technologies.

Anti Corruption

Principle 10: Businesses should work against corruption in all its forms, including extortion and bribery.

Aviation and environment

The aeronautics industry is committed to contributing to the collective effort to protect the environment, particularly given projected growth in air traffic (forecast to increase two-fold from 18,000 to 36,000 aircraft between 2000 and 2020).

ACARE, the Advisory Council for Aeronautics Research in Europe, has defined highly ambitious goals which we, at Dassault Aviation, support:

- Cut perceived noise in half (representing a reduction of 20 decibels on take-offs and landings combined),
- Cut CO2 emissions in half,
- Reduce nitrogen oxide (NOx) emissions five-fold,
- Reduce the environmental impact of aircraft production and withdrawal from service.

These goals naturally follow on from the reductions achieved thanks to technological progress made over the last forty years: improvements to engine efficiency, aerodynamics and aircraft weight have reduced:

- Fuel consumption and CO₂ emissions by 70%,
- Sound nuisance by 90%.

Thanks to these improvements, the global environmental impact of the aeronautical sector is today relatively modest:

- Aeronautics only accounts for 2% of human CO₂ production.
- Taking all uses into account, jet fuel accounts for 6% of the world's oil consumption, that is approximately 180 million metric tons per year for over two billion passengers and 500 billion metric tons of cargo.

Waste

Dassault Aviation's operations generate non-hazardous waste that is largely recyclable (paper, cardboard, metals, etc.). Our industrial waste is handled by specialized waste treatment methods (oils, metallic hydroxide sludge, solvents, soiled packaging, etc.).

The three main waste treatment methods used are:

- Recycling of metals,
- Waste-to-energy conversion,
- Reclamation of non-metal matter.

The amount of waste produced each year depends greatly on production rates and industrial activity. To make use of this waste, Dassault Aviation has introduced sorting measures and raised reclamation and recycling objectives.

Reclamation or recycling today accounts for over 70% of our waste.

Waste storage zones have also been created to keep it confined and avoid all dissemination.

Preventing accidental pollution

Releases of industrial wastewater come from surface treatment activities. To prevent the release of toxic metals into the environment, all production facilities concerned are equipped with detoxification or zero-discharge systems and regularly monitor their effluent.

Historical pollution: In 2007, the Company installed a treatment unit for polluted water after discovering a historical pollution source. The equipment has since proved effective in terms of groundwater pollution management.

Reducing greenhouse gas emissions

The Grenelle 2 Law requires all companies with over 500 employees to publish a Greenhouse Gas Emissions Report by December 31, 2012. This report highlights the improvements made to Dassault Aviation's operations for several years now and which have significantly helped reduce greenhouse gas emissions. Examples include:

- Stopping the shuttle flights between the facilities in Istres and Le Bourget,
- Creating a chemical product distribution platform (reduction by more than 1,000 metric tons of CO₂ equivalent per year),
- Implementing a materials distribution platform,
- Replacing old boilers by more efficient and energy-saving equipment,
- Insulation work on buildings,
- Replacing old items of equipment running on R22 gas,
- Purchasing electric cars to replace conventional cars.

DON ISAAC ABRAVANEL – BIOGRAPHY BY BENZION NETANYAHU

I am not a great admirer of Benjamin Netanyahu, son of the biographer of Don Isaac Abravanel and prime minister of Israel during ten years, only Ben Gurion served more years as prime minister. I object mainly his neoliberal ideology and I have dealt on this issue extensively in this book. As I am a moderate "realistic" hawk, I voted several times for the Likud party, when they combined a moderate hawkish policy with a humane socio-economic policy, and fought vehemently against the corruption of the Labour party that ruled Israel until 1977. Unfortunately the Likud has become an extreme hawkish party, with extreme neoliberal ideology, and with too many uncovering of direct and indirect corruption in their governments. That is why I have returned in recent years to vote for the Labour party that has cleansed itself from the corruption of their predecessors, maintain a humane capitalistic ideology (like Bernie Sanders), and a moderate hawkish policy. However, I strongly oppose the tendency in the world and in some Israeli circles to describe Netanyahu as a children killer, a demon, a racist. His father Benzion Netanyahu was one of the greatest academics and intellectuals in Israel, with worldwide recognition, with a realistic perception of the cruel world in which we live, and with a great admiration to the Sephardic heritage and to the most prominent Sephardis as Isaac Abravanel.

I read with great interest the excellent biography written by Netanyahu about the immense contribution of Abravanel to the Jews who were exiled from Spain, like my forefathers. I have great appreciation to statesmen who are also intellectuals like Abravanel, Ben Gurion, Disraeli, sometimes called a philosopher-king, although I am of course a democrat, when it is possible. Philosopher kings are the rulers of Plato's utopian city of Kallipolis. If his ideal city-state is to ever come into being, "philosophers [must] become kings...or those now called kings [must]...genuinely and adequately philosophize" (The Republic, 5.473d). Plato defined a philosopher firstly as its eponymous occupation: "wisdom-lover". He then distinguishes between one who loves true knowledge (as opposed to mere experience or education) by saying that the philosopher is the only person who has access to ideas – the archetypal entities that exist behind all representations of the form (such as Beauty itself as opposed to any one particular instance of beauty). It is next and in support of the idea that philosophers are the best rulers that Plato fashions the Ship of State metaphor, one of his most often cited ideas (along with his allegory of the cave): a "true pilot must of necessity pay attention to the seasons, the heavens, the stars, the winds, and everything proper to the craft if he is really to rule a ship" (The Republic, 6.488d). Marcus Aurelius was the first prominent example of a philosopher king. His Stoic tome Meditations, written in Greek while on campaign between 170 and 180, is still revered as a literary monument to a philosophy of service and duty, describing how to find and preserve equanimity in the midst of conflict by following nature as a source of guidance and inspiration.

Josip Broz Tito received a lot of criticism, but if we compare what preceded him and what happened after he died, we can understand what was his immense positive contribution to Yugoslavia. When I visited all the mini-countries of Yugoslavia and I talked to locals I could understand that, although his rule is called pejoratively benevolent dictatorship. This is of course better than all other dictatorships, but also this regime is better than some neoliberal regimes that are so-called democratic, although in fact they are plutocracies ruled by less than 1% of the population and the corrupt statesmen implement a socio-economic policy that favors only the ruling elites, the tycoons, with increasing poverty, huge income gaps, unhindered pollution, corrupt ministers and civil servants. We have to ask the Yugoslavians what was better for them: Tito who led the former republic of Yugoslavia as Prime Minister and President (later President for Life) from 1944 until his death in 1980 under what some criticized as an authoritarian rule, while he was widely popular and was "seen by most as a benevolent dictator". Or the chaos, civil wars, mass murders, extreme poverty, ethnical cleansing, that came over after he died. And don't tell us that the Danish democracy is better, as I would reply that to be healthy, beautiful and rich is preferable of course, but what is best for the sick, poors, and ethnically divided to the extreme.

Known affectionally as 'Ataturk' by many, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk is credited with removing foreign influence from former Ottoman territory, and is looked fondly upon as 'the father' of modern Turkey. He passed a series of societal reforms such as allowing women to vote, removing Islam as the state religion, and adoption of a Western criminal code. Ataturk transformed Turkey from a backward, extremely pious and poor country to a European state, secular, and quite prosperous. Many Turks deplore what has happened to Turkey since then, and ask if modern Turkey is truly democratic or has become more authoritarian and more fundamentalist than in the times of Ataturk. Which country has better chance to be integrated in the European Union, modern religious Turkey or secular Ataturk-like Turkey? And finally, a statesman to whom I refer extensively in this books, I read his autobiography and analyzed his regime in this book as also in another book "Ethics Pays", as Singapore is one of the most ethical countries in the world, much more than the democratic India. And what is better for the Indians – a democracy with one of the poorest population in the world or an authoritarian regime like China? And I reiterate that I don't advocate an authoritarian regime or a dictatorship. So, Lee Kuan Yew is known to be the man who transformed Singapore from a poor agrarian society into one of Asia's wealthiest nations, and is often called a 'benevolent dictator.' As a leader who was in power for 31 years, he implemented some laws that were deemed to be autocratic, and attempted to dismantle political opposition. Despite this he is often looked upon favorably for his transformation of Singapore, and is considered by many to one of the most successful political pragmatists. And he knew how to handle fundamentalist Islam while giving utmost respect to the Muslims in his country, who were better off than in all the other Muslim countries in Asia.

Don Isaac Abravanel (1437–1508) was a major historical figure during the waning of the Middle Ages. Statesman, diplomat, courtier, and financier, he was, at the same time, a scholar of encyclopedic learning, a philosopher, an exegete, a prolific author, a mystic, and an apocalypticist. In Abravanel, B. Netanyahu suggests, two long lines of tradition met and concluded: that of medieval Jewish statesmen and that of medieval Jewish philosophers. In what is both a biography and an exploration of Abravanel's thought and influence, Netanyahu describes how Abravanel illuminated the grave crisis and profound transformation experienced by the Jewish people after the Spanish expulsion. First published in 1953, Don Isaac Abravanel has been out of print for several years. A new edition includes revisions in the text, notes, and bibliography.

From the Jewish Encyclopedia: ABRAVANEL, ABARBANEL, or ABRABANEL

By: Meyer Kayserling, Louis Ginzberg

One of the oldest and most distinguished Spanish families, which traces its origin from King David. Members of this family lived at Seville, where dwelt its oldest representative, Don Judah Abravanel. Samuel Abravanel, his grandson, settled at Valencia, and Samuel's son, Judah (or perhaps he himself), left Spain for Portugal. Isaac, the son of Judah, returned to Castile, where he lived till the time of the great expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. Then, with his three sons, Judah, Joseph, and Samuel, Isaac went to Italy. Their descendants, as well as other members of the family who arrived later from the Iberian peninsula, lived in Holland, England, Turkey, and elsewhere during and since the sixteenth century.

Isaac Abravanel was a statesman and Bible commentator, son of the Portuguese treasurer, Dom Judah. He was born in the year 1437 at Lisbon, and died at Venice in 1508. He was buried in Padua. Abravanel received a careful education and was a pupil of Joseph Hayyim, rabbi of Lisbon. Well versed in Talmudic literature and in the learning of his time, endowed with a clear and keen mind, and full of enthusiasm for Judaism, he devoted his early years to the study of Jewish religious philosophy, and when scarcely twenty years old wrote on the original form of the natural elements, on the most vital religious questions, on prophecy, etc. His political abilities also attracted attention while he was still young. He entered the service of King Alfonso V. of Portugal as treasurer, and soon won the confidence of his master. Notwithstanding his high position and the great wealth he had inherited from his father, his love for his afflicted brethren was unabated. When Arzilla, in Morocco, was taken by the Moors, and the Jewish captives were sold as slaves, he contributed largely to the funds needed to manumit them, and personally arranged for collections throughout Portugal. He also wrote to his learned and wealthy friend Jehiel, of Pisa, in behalf of the captives. After the death of Alfonso he was obliged to relinquish his office, having been accused by King John II. of connivance with the duke of Bragança, who had been executed on the charge of conspiracy.

Abravanel, warned in time, saved himself by a hasty flight to Castile (1483). His large fortune was confiscated by royal decree. At Toledo, his new home, he occupied himself at first with Biblical studies, and in the course of six months produced an extensive commentary on the books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. But shortly afterward he entered the service of the house of Castile. Together with his friend, the influential Don Abraham Senior, of Segovia, he undertook to farm the revenues and to supply provisions for the royal army, contracts that he carried out to the entire satisfaction of Queen Isabella. During the Moorish war Abravanel advanced considerable sums of money to the government. When the banishment of the Jews from Spain was decreed, he left nothing undone to induce the king to revoke the edict. In vain did he offer him 30,000 ducats ($68,400, nominal value). With his brethren in faith he left Spain and went to Naples, where, soon after, he entered the service of the king. For a short time he lived in peace undisturbed; but when the city was taken by the French, bereft of all his possessions, he followed the young king, Ferdinand, in 1495, to Messina; then went to Corfu; and in 1496 settled in Monopoli, and lastly (1503) in Venice, where his services were employed in negotiating a commercial treaty between Portugal and the Venetian republic (Zurita, "Historia del Rey Don Fernando el Católico," v. 342a).

Abravanel's importance, however, lies not only in his changeful and active career. Although his works can scarcely be said to be of an absolutely original character, they contain so much instructive material, and exerted so wide an influence, that they demand special attention. They may be divided into three classes, referring to (1) exegesis, such as his commentary upon the entire Bible with the exception of the Hagiographa; (2) philosophy, dealing with philosophy in general and particularly with that of the Jewish religion; (3) apologetics, in defense of the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah. Characteristic of Abravanel's exegetic writings is his accurate estimation of the historical standpoint in the ancient annals of the Jewish people. All preceding Jewish exegetes had been too far removed from the tumult of the great world to possess a proper estimate of the historical epochs and episodes described in Scripture.

Abravanel, who had himself taken part in the politics of the great powers of the day, rightly perceived that mere consideration of the literary elements of Scripture was insufficient, and that the political and social life of the people must also be taken into account. He recognized also the value of prefacing the individual books of the Bible with a general introduction concerning the character of each book, its date of composition, and the author's intention; he may consequently be considered as a pioneer of the modern science of Bible propædæutics. These excellences of Abravanel's commentaries were especially appreciated by the Christian scholars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. No less than thirty Christian writers of this period—among them men of eminence, like the younger Buxtorf, Buddeus, Carpzov, and others—occupied themselves with the close study of Abravanel's exegetical writings, which they condensed and translated, and thus introduced to the world of Christian scholarship. Possibly somewhat of this appreciation of Abravanel by Christians was due to the latter's tolerance toward the Christian, exegetes—Jerome, Augustine, and Nicholas de Lyra—all of whom were closely studied by him and quoted without prejudice, receiving praise or disapprobation as the case demanded.

Abravanel's Jewish predecessors in the realm of philosophy, whoever, by no means received the same amount of tolerance at his hands. Men like Albalag, Palquera, Gersonides, Narboni, and others, were roundly denounced by Abravanel as infidels and misleading guides, for venturing to assume a comparatively liberal standpoint in religio-philosophical questions. Although he was the last Jewish Aristotelian, Abravanel was essentially an opponent of philosophy, for his entire conception of Judaism, opposed to that of Maimonides and his school, was rooted in a firm conviction of God's revelation in history, and particularly in the history of the selected people. Had Abravanel not been misled by the "Guide" of Maimonides, for whom he shared the traditional veneration, he might have given an exposition of his views on the relations of philosophy and religion. As it is, however, these views are confused, being at one and the same time Maimonistic, anti-Maimonistic, and, in a measure, even cabalistic.

A characteristic instance of his vacillation is afforded by his most important religious work, the "Rosh Amanah" (The Pinnacle of Faith), based on Cant. iv. 8. This work, devoted to the championship of the Maimonidean thirteen articles of belief against the attacks of Crescas and Albo, ends with the statement that Maimonides compiled these articles merely in accordance with the fashion of other nations, which set up axioms or fundamental principles for their science; but that the Jewish religion has nothing in common with human science; that the teachings of the Torah are revelations from God, and therefore are all of equal value; that among them are neither principles nor corollaries from principles: which certainly is rather a lame conclusion for a work purporting to be a defense of Maimonides. It would not be just, however, to assert that Abravanel makes a pretense of championing Maimonides, while being actually opposed to him. Abravanel is no hypocrite; wherever he thinks that Maimonides deviates from traditional belief, he does not hesitate to combat him strenuously. He thus assails Maimonides' conception that the prophetic visions were the creations of imagination. Abravanel will not hear of this explanation even for the bat kol of the Talmud, which, according to him, was a veritable voice made audible by God—a miracle, in fact (commentary on Gen. xvi.). In like manner Abravanel exceeded all his predecessors in combating Maimonides' theory of the "Heavenly Chariot" in Ezekiel ("Aṭeret Zeḳenim," xxiv., and commentary on the "Moreh," part iii. 71-74, ed. Warsaw). Indeed the most noteworthy feature of all Abravanel's philosophical disquisitions is the success with which he demonstrates the weak points in the Maimonidean system.

One point of Maimonides' system, however, and one that was not strictly in the line of tradition, found in Abravanel a zealous imitator: the belief in a Messiah. He felt deeply the hopelessness and despair which possessed his brethren in the years following their expulsion from Spain, and set himself, therefore, to champion the Messianic belief and to strengthen it among his desponding brethren. With this aim he wrote the following three works: "Ma'yene ha-Yeshu'ah" (Sources of Salvation), completed Dec. 6, 1496; "Yeshu'ot Meshiḥo" (The Salvation of His Anointed), completed Dec. 20, 1497; and "Mashmia' Yeshu'ah" (Proclaiming Salvation), completed Feb. 26, 1498—all of them devoted to the exposition of the Jewish belief concerning the Messiah and the Messianic age. The first-named of these is in the form of a commentary upon Daniel, in which he controverts both the Christian exposition and the Jewish rationalism of this book. Curiously enough, in opposition to the Talmud and all later rabbinical tradition, he counts Daniel among the prophets, coinciding therein—but therein only—with the current Christian interpretation. He is impelled to this by the fact that Daniel furnishes the foundation for his Messianic theory. The remainder of his commentary is devoted to an exhaustive and caustic criticism of the Christian exposition.

The second work is probably unique in being an exposition of the doctrine concerning the Messiah according to the traditional testimony of Talmud and Midrash; it is valuable for its exhaustive treatment and clearness of presentation. Of no less importance is his third apologetic work, which contains a collection of all the Messianic passages of the Bible and their interpretations, in the course of which latter Abravanel very frequently attacks the Christian interpretation of these passages. It contains (pp. 32c-34b, ed. Amsterdam) a description of the Messianic age as conceived by the Jewish orthodoxy of the Middle Ages. These apologetic works of Abravanel were widely read by his coreligionists, as is evidenced by their frequent republication, and they contributed undoubtedly to the reassurance of many of his brethren as to a better future for Israel.

The following list of Abravanel's works is arranged alphabetically, according to the Hebrew alphabet, the date of the first edition being given in each case: (1) "Aṭeret Zeḳenim" (Crown of the Ancients), Sabbionetta, 1557; (2) "Yeshu'ot Meshiḥo" (The Salvation of His Anointed), Karlsruhe, 1828; (3) "Maamar Kaṣer" (Short Treatise), Venice, 1574; (4) "Ma'yene ha-Yeshu'ah" (Sources of Salvation), Ferrara, 1551; also at Naples, no date, possibly ed. princeps; (5) "Mashmi'a Yeshu'ah" (Proclaiming Salvation), Salonica, 1526; (6) "Mif'alot Elohim" (Works of God), Venice, 1592; (7) "Mirkebet ha-Mishneh" (Second Chariot), Sabbionetta, 1551; (8) "Naḥlat Abot" (The Paternal Inheritance), Constantinople, 1505; (9) "Perush" (Commentary) on the Pentateuch, Venice, 1579; (10) "Perush" on the Earlier Prophets, Pesaro, 1511 (doubtful); (11) "Perush" on the Later Prophets, Pesaro, 1520 (?); (12) "Perush" on Maimonides' "Moreh Nebukim," Karlsruhe, 1831; (13) "Rosh Amanah" (The Pinnacle of Faith), Amsterdam, 1505; (14) "Shamayim Ḥadoshim" (The New Heavens), Rödelheim, 1828; (15) "Zurot ha-Yesodot" (Forms of the Elements), Sabbionetta, 1557; (16) "Teshubot" (Responsa), addressed to Saul ha-Kohen of Candia, Venice, 1574. Customer Review of the Biography by Michael Lewyn VINE VOICE on September 6, 2015

This book really is two books in one. The first half is a biography of Abravanel, who was exiled from Portugal to Spain to Italy, and was a financier and adviser to kings in all three places. The second half focuses on Abravanel's Torah scholarship. I learned something from both of them. In the first half, Netanyahu suggests that the oppression of Jews was not solely a matter of clerical fanaticism. The rising middle class saw the Jews as competitors, and the king saw that he could gain their support and get lots of short term wealth by confiscating their property; Netanyahu sees their Christian piety as a scam designed to hide their economic interests. In the second half, Netanyahu discussed Abravanel's philosophy and theology. He suggests that Abravanel was far more important in the centuries after his death than he is today; his willingness to discuss Christian commentators and his detailed rebuttal of Christian faith claims caused him to get lots of attention from Christian commentators (especially Protestants inspired by his interest in messianism). And because Abravanel creatively interpreted the Book of Daniel to suggest that the Messiah was coming soon, he may have inspired Jewish messianists of the 16th and 17th century.

On the other hand, Abravanel was not at all a rationalist: he assumed the literal truth of the Hebrew Bible, rather than trying to explain its miracles as natural phenomena. Like the medieval scholastics, his reasoning was limited by restricted dogma. Thus, he isn't really as influential today. More liberal Jews ignore him because he's not so relevant to a post-Enlightenment world, and haredim prefer Rashi, who was pithier and less interested in philosophy. One other reason Abravanel is less relevant today is that, like medieval Christians, he doesn't really believe in human progress. While some Jews believe the story of history is that of the Ascent of Man, he believes in the Fall of Man- not in one fell swoop (unlike Christian believers in Original Sin) but gradually, as man went from the spirituality of Adam to being "corrupted by the pursuit of the artificial." For example, Abravanel explains the Tower of Babel story as an out growth of this: when people used natural things, they had the same name for everything. But the more they invented, more confusion they created as each family gave new objects a different name.

Abravanel also wrote about politics; while other Jewish thinkers thought the Torah commanded monarchy, Abravanel viewed the ideal government as a Sanhedrin, a theocratic government of the best (who of course would be clerics as well, since in the Middle Ages the most learned people in arts and sciences were clergy). Abravanel's hostility to monarchy may have arisen from personal experience; he probably would have been executed by the king of Portugal had he not fled to Spain, and was then exiled by the king of Spain for refusing to convert to Christianity. On the other hand he opposed rebellion against kings, because the first Biblical kings were appointed by prophets and thus ruled by Divine right.

And now, a few words on Benzion Netanyahu from Wikipedia, and I let the reader decide if his ideology and beliefs were more realistic than those of the peaceloving intellectuals in Israel and outside Israel. He was ostracised by the Israeli doves and intellectuals and had to make a career in the US at Cornell, but at least in his case the peaceloving doves cannot maintain that all the hawks are ignorant and good-luck charms kissers, and implying also "backward" Orientals, while only they are the best academics, actors and authors – the triple A, and of course a fourth A – Ashkenazis. Well, Netanyahu was one of the best academics of the twentieth century, an Ashkenaz, respected by most if not all the historians, an excellent author (I have in my library his best books), and held a hawkish attitude towards the Palestinian conflict. He respected also the Sephardis, as he wrote their history with great admiration, like Menahem Begin respected the Orientals who were despised and discriminated under the former Labour regime, but thrived and achieved since then and until today at last a relatively proportionate representation.

Benzion Netanyahu predicted in 1937, in an article about Theodor Herzl, the Holocaust that would befall the Jewish people in Europe. This same prescience, led him to say decades ago that the threat to world peace would come from those parts of the Muslim world where oil, terror and nuclear energy mix. It also led him to say to his son Benjamin, in the early 1990s, that Muslim extremists would try to bring down the twin towers in New York – a prediction that was realized a decade later. I oppose what Benzion Netanyahu maintained in his younger days, when he had been strongly in favour of the idea of Arab transfer out of Palestine. In my book I preconize that Jews and Arabs will live in peace in the area of the Biblical Israel (Israel, the West Bank and Jordan), without transferring anyone from where they live today in the country – Jews, West Bank/Judea and Samaria settlers, and Arabs, as part of the European Union, with open borders, economic progress, joint rule of Israel and the Jordan-Palestinian Kingdom on the West Bank.

I don't believe either what Netanyahu told in 2009, to the newspaper Maariv that "The tendency to conflict is the essence of the Arab. He is an enemy by essence. His personality won't allow him to compromise. It doesn't matter what kind of resistance he will meet, what price he will pay. His existence is one of perpetual war." I am still optimistic, but I see what happened to the majority of the Israeli doves after the Intifadas and wars that killed thousands of Israelis, after we have withdrawn from Lebanon, Gaza and most of the West Bank, how they have become hawks, leaving only a very tiny minority of a few thousands to maintain unrealistic peaceloving ideas. The problem with the Palestinians is therefore not a problem of territories, so maybe Netanyahu was right? Anyhow, if the present situation will continue, when the Palestinian Arabs refuse to compromise, when they still want the outrageous right of return, when they make wars and Intifadas every few years, when they kill thousands of innocent Israeli civilians in the streets, in buses, in airplanes, in schools, in houses, with the Arab winter/so called spring, with the wars in Syria, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, the terrorism of the PLO, Hizballah and the Hamas, many Israelis and the world also, even the peaceloving advocates will arrive to the conclusion that he was right, as the pacifist UK came to the conclusion that Churchill was right, the US came to the conclusion in December 1941 that Germany and Japan were the aggressors after Pearl Harbor, after the invasion of Poland, France, Russia, Europe, after the atrocities of the Nazis.

Furthermore, if coexistence with the fundamentalist Arabs will be impossible, the world and Israel might come to the conclusion that an ethnical separation is inevitable like what happened in India, Pakistan, Germany, Poland, Greece, Turkey, Africa, Yugoslavia, and in dozens of other cases in modern history, and this will be at the detriment of the Arabs, as happened throughout the last century when the fundamentalist Arabs refused to compromise and still wanted to have it all – the territories, the right of return, murdering Jews, hoping to install a Sharia state like in Iran and Afghanistan, Judenrein, Nazi-like, a backward country, with civil wars, poverty, persecution of women and minorities, bringing an end to the modern Western Israel.

Benzion Netanyahu (Hebrew: בֶּנְצִיּוֹן נֶתַנְיָהוּ); born Benzion Mileikowsky; March 25, 1910 – April 30, 2012) was an Israeli Professor of History at Cornell University. A scholar of Judaic history, he was also an activist in the Revisionist Zionism movement, who lobbied in the United States to support the creation of the Jewish state. His field of expertise was the history of the Jews in Spain, and he served as an editor of the Hebrew Encyclopedia. He spent a significant portion of his life in the United States. Though he became Ze'ev Jabotinsky's personal secretary, he never got involved directly in Israeli politics. He is the father of current Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Yonatan Netanyahu, ex-commander of Sayeret Matkal. Benzion Mileikowsky (later Netanyahu) was born in Warsaw in partitioned Poland which was under Russian control, to Sarah (Lurie) and the writer and Zionist activist Nathan Mileikowsky. Nathan was a rabbi who toured Europe and the United States, making speeches supporting Zionism.

After Nathan took the family to Mandate Palestine (aliyah) in 1920, the family name eventually was changed to Netanyahu. After living in Jaffa, Tel Aviv, and Safed, the family settled in Jerusalem. Benzion Netanyahu studied in the David Yellin teachers' seminary and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Although his father was a rabbi, Benzion was devoutly secular.^[4] His younger brother, mathematician Elisha Netanyahu, became Dean of Sciences at the Technion. It was a common practice for Zionist immigrants at the time to adopt a Hebrew name. Nathan Mileikowsky began signing some of the articles he wrote "Netanyahu," the Hebrew version of his first name, and his son adopted this as his family name. He also used the pen name "Nitay." In 1944, Netanyahu married Tzila Segal, whom he met during his studies in Palestine. The couple had three sons—Yonatan (1946–76), former commander of Sayeret Matkal, who was killed in action leading Operation Entebbe; Benjamin, (b. 1949), Israeli Prime Minister (1996–99, 2009–present); and Ido (b. 1952), an Israeli physician, author and playwright. Netanyahu became a widower in 2000, when Tzila died. He died on the morning of April 30, 2012, in his Jerusalem home at the age of 102.

Benzion Netanyahu studied medieval history at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. During his studies, Netanyahu became active in Revisionist Zionism, a movement of people who had split from their mainstream Zionist counterparts, believing those in the mainstream were too conciliatory to the British authorities governing Palestine, and espousing a more militant, right-wing version of Jewish nationalism than the one advocated by the Labour Zionists who led Israel in its early years. The revisionists were led by Jabotinsky, whose belief in the necessity of an “iron wall” between Israel and its Arab neighbors had influenced Israeli politics since the 1930s. Netanyahu became a close friend to Abba Ahimeir. Benzion Netanyahu was co-editor of Betar, a Hebrew monthly (1933–1934), then editor of the Revisionist Zionist daily newspaper Ha-Yarden in Jerusalem (1934–1935). until the British Mandate authorities ordered the paper to cease publication. He was editor at the Zionist Political Library, Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv, 1935–1940. In 1940, Netanyahu went to New York to be secretary to Jabotinsky, who was seeking to build American support for his militant New Zionists. Jabotinsky died the same year, and Netanyahu became executive director of the New Zionist Organization of America, the political rival of the more moderate Zionist Organization of America. He held the post until 1948.

As executive director, Netanyahu was one of the Revisionist movement's leaders in the United States during World War II. At the same time, he pursued his PhD at Dropsie College of Hebrew and Cognate Learning in Philadelphia (now the Center for Advanced Judaic Studies at the University of Pennsylvania), writing his dissertation on Isaac Abrabanel (1437-1508), a Jewish scholar and statesman who opposed the banishment of Jews from Spain. Netanyahu believed in Greater Israel. When the United Nations Partition Plan for Palestine was published (November 29, 1947), he joined others who signed a petition against the plan. The petition was published in the New York Times. During that time, he was active in engaging with Congress members in Washington, D.C.. In 1949, he returned to Israel, where he tried to start a political career but failed. Relentlessly hawkish, he believed that the "vast majority of Israeli Arabs would choose to exterminate us if they had the option to do so". In his younger days, he had been strongly in favour of the idea of Arab transfer out of Palestine. In 2009, he told Maariv that "The tendency to conflict is the essence of the Arab. He is an enemy by essence. His personality won't allow him to compromise. It doesn't matter what kind of resistance he will meet, what price he will pay. His existence is one of perpetual war."

In 2010, at his 100th birthday celebration at the Menachem Begin Heritage Center in Jerusalem, his son Benjamin Netanyahu, then Prime Minister of Israel, articulated that in 1937, in an article about Theodor Herzl, his father predicted the Holocaust that would befall the Jewish people in Europe. "This same prescience, led my father to say decades ago that the threat to world peace would come from those parts of the Muslim world where oil, terror and nuclear energy mix. It also led him to say to me, in the early 1990s, that Muslim extremists would try to bring down the twin towers in New York – a prediction I included in one of my books." Having previously struggled to fit into Israeli academia without success, perhaps due to a combination of personal and political reasons, Netanyahu nonetheless continued his academic activities upon his return to the Jewish State. Though he still was not able to become a member of the academic faculty of the Hebrew University, his mentor Joseph Klausner recommended him to be one of the editors of the “Encyclopaedia Hebraica”; and upon Klausner's death, Netanyahu became chief editor.

He returned to Dropsie College in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, first as professor of Hebrew language and literature and chairman of the department (1957–1966); then as professor of medieval Jewish history and Hebrew literature (1966–1968). Subsequently he moved first to University of Denver as professor of Hebraic studies, (1968–1971), then returned to New York in order to edit a Jewish encyclopedia. Eventually he took a position at Cornell University as professor of Judaic studies and chairman of the department of Semitic languages and literature, from 1971–1975. Following the death of his son Yonatan during the Entebbe hostage rescue operation in 1976, he and his family returned to Israel. At the time of his death, Netanyahu was a member of the Academy for Fine Arts and a professor emeritus at Cornell University. Continuing his interest in Medieval Spanish Jewry, Golden age of Jewish culture in Spain and Portugal, Netanyahu wrote a book about Isaac Abrabanel and essays on the Spanish Inquisition and the Marranos. He developed a theory according to which the Marranos converted to Christianity, not under compulsion, but out of a desire to integrate into Christian society. However, as New Christians they continued to be persecuted due to racism, and not purely for religious reasons, as was previously believed. He argued that what was new in the 15th century was the Spanish monarchy's practice of defining Jews not religiously, but racially, by the principle of limpieza de sangre, purity of blood; which served as a model for 20th-century racial theories. Netanyahu rejected the idea that the Marranos lived double lives, claiming that this theory arose from Inquisition documents.

Netanyahu is perhaps best known for his magnum opus, Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth Century Spain. His publisher and friend Jason Epstein wrote of the book: The 1,400-page work of scholarship overturned centuries of misunderstanding, and predictably it was faintly praised and in a few cases angrily denounced or simply ignored by a threatened scholarly establishment. Dispassionate scholars soon prevailed, and today Benzion's brilliant revisionist achievement towers over the field of Inquisition studies. His New York Times obituary stated: "Though praised for its insights, the book was also criticized as having ignored standard sources and interpretations. Not a few reviewers noted that it seemed to look at long-ago cases of anti-Semitism through the rear-view mirror of the Holocaust." Indeed, quite generally, Netanyahu regarded Jewish history as "a history of holocausts." "Origins" led Netanyahu into a scholarly dispute with Yitzhak Baer. Baer, following earlier views, considered the Anusim (forced converts to Christianity) to be a case of "Kiddush Hashem" (sanctification of the name [of God]: i.e., dying or risking oneself to preserve the name of God). According to Baer, therefore, the converts chose to live a double life, with some level of risk, while retaining their original faith. Netanyahu, in contrast, challenged the belief that the accusations of the Inquisition were true, and considered the majority of converts to be "Mitbolelim" (Cultural assimilationists), and willing converts to Christianity, claiming that the small number of forced converts who did not truly adhere to their new religion were used by the Inquisition as propaganda to allege a broader resistance movement. According to Netanyahu, Christian society had actually never accepted the new converts, for reasons of economic and racial envy. Netanyahu was a member of the American Academy for Jewish Research, the Institute for Advanced Religious Studies and the American Zionist Emergency Council. In the 1960s, Netanyahu edited in English two more major reference books: the "Encyclopedia Judaica" and "The World History of the Jewish People." Published works: The biography Don Isaac Abravanel. Statesman and philosopher, 1953. Ithaca, 1998; The Jewish Publication Society, 2001. And the other works:

COCO CHANEL – BIOGRAPHY BY PATRICIA SOLIMAN: COCO, THE NOVEL

As a feminist I have to admire Coco Chanel who did for women much more than Simone de Beauvoir and the Suffragettes combined. But I have many reservations about her as a person, that are obvious when you read her biography or encyclopedias. Coco liberated women from the rigors of an uncomfortable fashion, it was much easier for women to work with her dresses, and women could wear fashionable dresses at a reasonable cost. In the past women who wanted to dress in comfortable clothes had to be dressed as men, like George Sand did, and of course were perceived by society as weirds. But Coco Chanel took male clothes and redesigned them as women clothes, for respectable, society women. Yet, she was anti-Semitic, collaborated with the Germans during the Occupation, and also independent and very talented. I have seen a few films about her life and loves, but neither the films nor the biography are really good enough to tell the story of this extraordinary woman. For me it is not so interesting to know who were her lovers, but much more to understand her psychology, learn what was the social and economical impact of her designs, and how she made an impact on the history of the 20th century. In the Time's list of the 25 most powerful women of the 20th century, Coco Chanel appears with Corazon Aquino, Hillary Clinton, Marie Curie, Indira Gandhi, Estee Lauder, Madonna, Golda Meir, Angela Merkel, Aretha Franklin, Margaret Mead, Rosa Parks, Eleanor Roosevelt, Mother Teresa, Margaret Thatcher, Oprah Winfrey, Virginia Woolf – quite an impressive list of politicians, business women, singers, authors, humanists, scientists, with positive and negative characters.

Coco Chanel appears in the list of women who changed the world of Biography On Line: Coco Chanel (1883-1971) – French fashion designer. One of the most innovative fashion designers, Coco Chanel was instrumental in defining feminine style and dress during the 20th Century. Her ideas were revolutionary; in particular she often took traditionally male clothes and redesigned them for the benefit of women. The list of the women who changed the world comprise also: Sappho, Cleopatra, Mary Magdalene, Boudicca, Hildegard of Bingen, Eleanor of Aquitaine, Joan of Arc, Mirabai, St Teresa of Avila, Catherine de Medici, Elizabeth I, Catherine the Great, Mary Wollstonecraft, Jane Austen, Margaret Fuller, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Queen Victoria, Florence Nightingale, Susan B. We bring here three reviews on the biography of Coco Chanel, not all of them elogious:

From Publishers Weekly

Nicely researched but ploddingly told, this novelized biography of the legendary couturiere and style setter aims no higher than commercial fare. First novelist Soliman analyzes her protagonist's fiercely ambitious personality in terms of chronic insecurity: the illegitimate daughter of a decamped peddler, Chanel entered society through the demimonde and eventually became the intimate of the leading artists, writers, musicians, dancers and world leaders of her time, but she never forgot her lowly origins. Though Soliman varies the narrative point of view among Coco and her friends--arts patron Misia Sert (here reduced to a meddling gossip and sexual debauchee), Vera Bate, Boy Capel, Serge Lifar--the voices are nearly identical; famous figures parade through these pages like so many wooden mannequins. Coco's life, however, has enough intrinsic drama, rampant sexuality and creative verve to make a passing good story. Her two major heartbreaks--the death of her one great love, Boy Capel, and her inability to bear a child (and thus qualify as a wife) for the Duke of Westminster--are recounted along with her many other romantic trysts (including her questionable liaison with a Nazi general) and the triumphs of her revolutionary sense of design. Publishing veteran Soliman has edited Jackie Collins; this romanticized view of Chanel may appeal to the same audience. BOMC alternate.

KIRKUS REVIEW

Soliman, editor to the likes of Jackie Collins and Zsa Zsa Gabor, debuts with a busy novel based on the life of Coco Chanel. Alternately narrated by Coco and by her intimates, this mini-series-ready drama is carefully built around documented events (as described more soberly in Axel Madsen's biography, Chanel: A Woman of Her Own, p. 486) but adorned with descriptions of champagne and soft fabrics and great sex. The teen. age Coco is a skilled seamstress in the provincial city of Moulin. A cavalry man falls for her and introduces her around; soon she outgrows him and moves in with the great love of her life, ""Boy"" Capel, who gives her the financial and moral support to launch her new design house. During the happy years with Boy, Coco makes lifelong friends (Diaghilev, Cocteau and her best friend/rival, the gorgeous and bisexual Misia Sert) and becomes a fixture on the Parisian scene. When Boy makes a politically astute marriage, Coco continues to see him, even designing dresses for his child-bride. Then, however, Boy is killed in an accident, and while Coco mourns him for years, her business flourishes. The wildly wealthy Duke of Westminster courts her, but their long affair breaks up when she can't give him an heir. She indulges in odd political machinations during WW II, and continues to design dresses and captivate men until her death at 87. The requisite elements--sex, rivalry, manipulation, and loss--are all here, and the revolutionary ideas of Chanel and her artistic gang are paid due lip-service. What's missing is psychological insight into the designer's charm and astonishing drive. The alternating narrators all sound exactly the same, and describe events rather than personal perspectives. Still, an untaxing portrait of a compelling subject.

"Coco, the Novel" is a good argument against dying. With death--in this case, fashion icon Coco Chanel's--a private life enters the public domain, free to become the stuff that novels are made of. And not necessarily great novels--novels that take the events of a lifetime, compress them, reshape them and serve them anew with a few interpretive social flavorings. Who was Coco Chanel? As portrayed "Coco: The Novel" she was a veritable superwoman: a workaholic, a natural horsewoman, a crack shot and a raven-haired beauty with boundless ambition and the determination never to be possessed by a man. She had a designing eye for the simple, yet her life was far from uncomplicated. She was lucky at gaming tables but, for the most part, unlucky at love. The perfect stuff of novels. Patricia B. Soliman presents her fictional portrait of Coco, from age 17 to her death, through narration in Coco's voice and the voices of her confidants and lovers. Alas, one failing of the book is that the voices have little to distinguish them. Each new voice introduces itself with a little personal history, then launches into a "the first time I saw Coco" reverie. It makes for slow going in the early chapters.

The book jacket explains that Soliman, an editor for two decades, now has switched literary hats. She knows the tricks of the literary craft. It's all technically correct, but it lacks inspiration. After failing in her ambition to become a star of the stage, our little dark-haired Gabrielle evolves into Coco and eases into dressmaking, millinery and a love affair with a rich man. That affair is followed by another love affair with another rich man. Unfortunately, due to the compression of events, all this and World War I go by in the blink of an eye. Somewhere in the midst of all this, chere petite Coco opens her couture business in Paris (with a little help from her the second rich lover, Boy Capel), expands to Deauville, liberates women from corsets and raises hemlines to ankle-baring heights. Mon dieu! On occasion, the novel manages to suggest passion. A few of the scenes summon up the romantic intensity of an earnest bodice-ripper. One imaginative scene creates a metaphor between lovemaking and Coco's penchant for pearls (and that's all I can say in a family newspaper). The later chapters have more vitality. Perhaps by then Soliman had a greater familiarity with her characters; perhaps the terrain felt less foreign.

By this time, Coco is running with the rich and the famous and the notorious and the artsy. The name-dropping gets serious: Picasso, Cocteau, Diaghilev, Stravinsky, Winston Churchill. After pages of events and openings and balls and what-nots, we find ourselves with a mature Coco of 37. Suddenly, in middle life after years of liaisons, Coco is concerned with her fertility. Is that the old ticktock of the biological clock we hear? Still, her life seems a little too effortless. (Yeah, I know Coco was lonely and suffered from insomnia, but she also had a seemingly endless string of lovers and lots of money.) Soliman's idea, no doubt, is that Coco was an original--that she just was. But if I'm going to buy a hardcover and spend the time it takes to read nearly 400 pages, I want to have an understanding or at least a good guess--as to who or what the woman was. What we get instead is a woman allegedly fiercely driven to independence but who just couldn't stop attracting men (and a few women) who wanted to possess her. For all her independence, our Coco was a prisoner of love. In fact, Soliman chose a Chanel quote to set the book's tone: "Great loves, too, must be endured." The same could be said for portions of this novel. So, chers amis, if you are curious about Coco Chanel the person, pick up a biography. If, however, you're interested in the more romanticized version, this is the book for you. It's suitable for pool-side or airplane reading. Only, wait for the paperback.

Gabrielle Bonheur "Coco" Chanel (19 August 1883 – 10 January 1971) was a French fashion designer of women's clothes and founder of the Chanel brand. Along with Paul Poiret, Chanel was credited in the post-World War I era with liberating women from the constraints of the "corseted silhouette" and popularizing a sportive, and casual chic as the feminine standard of style. A prolific fashion creator, Chanel extended her influence beyond couture clothing, realising her design aesthetic in jewellery, handbags, and fragrance. Her signature scent, Chanel No. 5, has become an iconic product. She is the only fashion designer listed on Time magazine's list of the 100 most influential people of the 20th century. Chanel was known for her lifelong determination, ambition, and energy which she applied to her professional and social life. She achieved both success as a business woman and social prominence, thanks to the connections she made through her work. These included many artists and craftspeople to whom she became a patron. In 1970 her net worth was $19 billion ($118 billion in 2015 dollars). Chanel became one of the richest women of all time. Her social connections appeared to encourage a highly conservative personal outlook. Rumors arose about Chanel's activities during the German occupation of France in World War II, and she was criticized for being too comfortable with the Germans but never thoroughly investigated. After several years in Switzerland after the war, she returned to Paris and revived her fashion house. In 2011 Hal Vaughan published a book on Chanel based on newly declassified documents of that era, revealing that she had collaborated with Germans in intelligence activities. One plan in late 1943 was for her to carry an SS separate peace overture to British Prime Minister Winston Churchill to end the war.

When Gabrielle was 12, her mother died of bronchitis at the age of 32. Her father sent his two sons out to work as farm laborers and sent his three daughters to the Corrèze, in central France, to the convent of Aubazine, which ran an orphanage. Its religious order, the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Mary, was "founded to care for the poor and rejected, including running homes for abandoned and orphaned girls". It was a stark, frugal life, demanding strict discipline. At age eighteen, Chanel, too old to remain at Aubazine, went to live in a boarding house set aside for Catholic girls in the town of Moulins. Later in her life, Chanel would retell the story of her childhood somewhat differently; she would often include more glamorous accounts, which were generally untrue. She said that when her mother died, her father sailed for America to seek his fortune, and she was sent to live with two aunts. She also claimed to have been born a decade later than 1883 and that her mother had died when she was much younger than 12.

Having learned the art of sewing during her six years at Aubazine, Chanel was able to find employment as a seamstress. When not plying her needle, she sang in a cabaret frequented by cavalry officers. Chanel made her stage debut singing at a café-concert (a popular entertainment venue of the era) in a Moulins pavilion, "La Rotonde". She was among other girls dubbed poseuses, the performers who entertained the crowd between star turns. The money earned was what they managed to accumulate when the plate was passed among the audience in appreciation of their performance. It was at this time that Gabrielle acquired the name "Coco", possibly based on two popular songs with which she became identified, "Ko Ko Ri Ko", and "Qui qu'a vu Coco", or it was an allusion to the French word for kept woman, cocotte. As a cafe entertainer, Chanel radiated a juvenile allure that tantalized the military habitués of the cabaret.

Chanel began designing hats, initially as a diversion that evolved into a commercial enterprise. She became a licensed milliner (hat maker) in 1910 and opened a boutique at 21 rue Cambon, Paris, named Chanel Modes. As this location already housed an established clothing business, Chanel sold only her millinery creations at this address. Chanel's millinery career bloomed once theatre actress Gabrielle Dorziat modelled her hats in the F Nozière's play Bel Ami in 1912. Subsequently, Dorziat modelled her hats again in Les Modes. In 1913, Chanel opened a boutique in Deauville, financed by Arthur Capel, where she introduced deluxe casual clothes suitable for leisure and sport. The fashions were constructed from humble fabrics such as jersey and tricot, at the time primarily used for men's underwear. The location was a prime one, in the center of town on a fashionable street. Here Chanel sold hats, jackets, sweaters, and the marinière, the sailor blouse. Chanel had the dedicated support of two family members. One was her sister, Antoinette. The other was Adrienne Chanel; she was close to Chanel's own age but was her aunt; the child of a union her grandfather had late in his life. Adrienne and Antoinette were recruited to model Chanel's designs; on a daily basis the two women paraded through the town and on its boardwalks, advertising the Chanel creations.

Chanel, determined to re-create the success she had enjoyed in Deauville, opened an establishment in Biarritz in 1915. Biarritz, situated on the Côte Basque, in proximity to wealthy Spanish clients, had neutral status during World War I, allowing it to become the playground for the moneyed and those exiled from their native countries by the hostilities. The Biarritz shop was installed not as a storefront, but in a villa opposite the casino. After one year of operation, the business proved to be so lucrative that in 1916 Chanel was able to reimburse Capel his original investment. This was her sole decision; she did not consult with Capel. It was in Biarritz that Chanel made the acquaintance of an expatriate aristocrat, the Grand Duke Dmitri Pavlovich of Russia. They had a romantic interlude, and maintained a close association for many years afterward. By 1919, Chanel was registered as a couturière and established her maison de couture at 31 rue Cambon, Paris.

In 1918, Chanel purchased the entire building at 31 rue Cambon, which was situated in one of the most fashionable districts of Paris. In 1921, she opened what may be considered an early incarnation of the fashion boutique, featuring clothing, hats, and accessories, later expanded to offer jewellery and fragrance. By 1927, Chanel owned five properties on the rue Cambon, encompassing buildings numbered 23 through 31. In the spring of 1920 (approximately May), Chanel was introduced to the Russian composer Igor Stravinsky by Sergei Diaghilev, impresario of the Ballets Russes. During the summer, Chanel discovered that the Stravinsky family was seeking a place to live, having left the Soviet Union after the war. She invited them to her new home, "Bel Respiro," in the Paris suburb of Garches, until they could find a more suitable residence. They arrived at "Bel Respiro" during the second week of September and remained until May 1921. Chanel also guaranteed the new (1920) Ballets Russes production of Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring) against financial loss with an anonymous gift to Diaghilev, said to be 300,000 francs.

In 1922, at the Longchamps races, Théophile Bader, founder of the Paris Galeries Lafayette, introduced Chanel to businessman Pierre Wertheimer. Bader was interested in inaugurating the sale of the Chanel No. 5 fragrance in his department store. In 1924, Chanel made an agreement with the Wertheimer brothers, Pierre and Paul, directors since 1917 of the eminent perfume and cosmetics house Bourgeois. They created a corporate entity, "Parfums Chanel," and the Wertheimers agreed to provide full financing for production, marketing and distribution of Chanel No. 5. The Wertheimers would receive seventy percent of the profits, and Théophile Bader a twenty percent share. For ten percent of the stock, Chanel licensed her name to Parfums Chanel and withdrew from involvement in all business operations. Displeased with the arrangement, Chanel worked for more than twenty years to gain full control of Parfums Chanel. She said that Pierre Wertheimer was "the bandit who screwed me".

One of Chanel's longest enduring associations was with Misia Sert, a notable member of the bohemian elite in Paris and wife of Spanish painter José-Maria Sert. It is said that theirs was an immediate bond of like souls, and Misia was attracted to Chanel by "her genius, lethal wit, sarcasm and maniacal destructiveness, which intrigued and appalled everyone". Both women were convent schooled, and maintained a friendship of shared interests and confidences. They also shared drug use. By 1935, Chanel had become a habitual drug user, injecting herself with morphine on a daily basis, a habit she maintained until the end of her life. According to Chandler Burr's The Emperor of Scent, Luca Turin related an apocryphal story in circulation that Chanel was "called Coco because she threw the most fabulous cocaine parties in Paris".

The writer Colette, who moved in the same social circles as Chanel, provided a whimsical description of Chanel at work in her atelier, which appeared in "Prisons et Paradis" (1932). "If every human face bears a resemblance to some animal, then Mademoiselle Chanel is a small black bull. That tuft of curly black hair, the attribute of bull-calves, falls over her brow all the way to the eyelids and dances with every maneuver of her head." In 1923, Vera Bate Lombardi, (born Sarah Gertrude Arkwright), reputedly the illegitimate daughter of the Marquess of Cambridge, afforded Chanel entry into the highest levels of British aristocracy. It was an elite group of associations revolving around such figures as politician Winston Churchill, aristocrats such as the Duke of Westminster, and royals such as Edward, Prince of Wales. In Monte Carlo in 1923, at age forty, Chanel was introduced by Lombardi to the vastly wealthy Duke of Westminster, Hugh Richard Arthur Grosvenor, known to his intimates as "Bendor". The Duke of Westminster lavished Chanel with extravagant jewels, costly art, and a home in London's prestigious Mayfair district. His affair with Chanel lasted ten years.

The Duke, an outspoken anti-Semite, intensified Chanel's inherent antipathy toward Jews. He shared with her an expressed homophobia. In 1946, Chanel was quoted by her friend and confidant, Paul Morand: "Homosexuals? ... I have seen young women ruined by these awful queers: drugs, divorce, scandal. They will use any means to destroy a competitor and to wreak vengeance on a woman. The queers want to be women—but they are lousy women. They are charming!" Coinciding with her introduction to the Duke, was her introduction, again through Lombardi, to Lombardi's cousin, the Prince of Wales, Edward VIII. The Prince allegedly became smitten with Chanel and pursued her in spite of her involvement with the Duke of Westminster. Gossip had it that he visited Chanel in her apartment and requested that she call him "David", a privilege reserved only for his closest friends and family. Years later, Diana Vreeland, editor of Vogue, would insist that "the passionate, focused and fiercely independent Chanel, a virtual tour de force," and the Prince "had a great romantic moment together". In 1927, the Duke of Westminster gave Chanel a parcel of land he had purchased in Roquebrune-Cap-Martin on the French Riviera. Chanel built her villa here, which she called La Pausa ("restful pause"), hiring the architect Robert Streitz. Streitz's concept for the staircase and patio contained design elements inspired by Aubazine, the orphanage in which Chanel spent her youth. When asked why she did not marry the Duke of Westminster, she is supposed to have said: "There have been several Duchesses of Westminster. There is only one Chanel."

In 1921 while in Monte Carlo Chanel became acquainted with Samuel Goldwyn. She was introduced through a mutual friend, the Grand Duke Dmitri Pavlovich, cousin to the last czar of Russia, Nicolas II. Goldwyn offered Chanel a tantalizing proposition. For the sum of a million dollars (approximately seventy-five million in twenty-first century valuation), he would bring her to Hollywood twice a year to design costumes for MGM stars. Chanel accepted the offer. Accompanying her on her first trip to Hollywood was her friend Misia Sert. En route to California from New York, traveling in a white train car luxuriously outfitted for her use, Chanel was interviewed by Colliers magazine in 1932. She said that she had agreed to go to Hollywood to "see what the pictures have to offer me and what I have to offer the pictures." Chanel designed the clothing worn on screen by Gloria Swanson, in Tonight or Never (1931), and for Ina Claire in The Greeks Had a Word for Them (1932). Both Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich became private clients.

Her experience with American movie making left Chanel with a dislike for the Hollywood film business and distaste for the film world's culture, which she denounced as "infantile". Chanel's verdict was that "Hollywood is the capital of bad taste ... and it is vulgar." Ultimately, her design aesthetic did not translate well to film. The New Yorker speculated that Chanel had left Hollywood because "they told her her dresses weren't sensational enough. She made a lady look like a lady. Hollywood wants a lady to look like two ladies." Chanel went on to design the costumes for several French films, including Jean Renoir's 1939 film La Règle du jeu, in which she was credited as La Maison Chanel. Chanel introduced the left-wing Renoir to Luchino Visconti, aware that the shy Italian hoped to work in film. Renoir was favorably impressed by Visconti and brought him in to work on his next film project.

Chanel was the mistress of some of the most influential men of her time, but she never married. She had significant relationships with the poet Pierre Reverdy and the illustrator and designer Paul Iribe. After her romance with Reverdy ended in 1926, they maintained a friendship that lasted some forty years. It is postulated that the legendary maxims attributed to Chanel and published in periodicals were crafted under the mentorship of Reverdy — a collaborative effort. "A review of her correspondence reveals a complete contradiction between the clumsiness of Chanel the letter writer and the talent of Chanel as a composer of maxims ... After correcting the handful of aphorisms that Chanel wrote about her métier, Reverdy added to this collection of "Chanelisms" a series of thoughts of a more general nature, some touching on life and taste, others on allure and love." Her involvement with Iribe was a deep one until his sudden death in 1935. Iribe and Chanel shared the same reactionary politics, Chanel financing Iribe's monthly, ultra-nationalist and anti-republican newsletter, Le Témoin, which encouraged an irrational fear of foreigners and preached anti-Semitism. In 1936, one year after Le Témoin stopped publication, Chanel veered to the opposite end of the ideological continuum by financing Pierre Lestringuiez's radical left-wing magazine Futur.

The Chanel couture was a lucrative business enterprise, by 1935 employing 4,000 people. As the 1930s progressed, Chanel's place on the throne of haute couture was threatened. The boyish look and the short skirts of the 1920s flapper seemed to disappear overnight. Chanel's designs for film stars in Hollywood were not successful and had not aggrandized her reputation as expected. More significantly, Chanel's star had been eclipsed by her premier rival, the designer Elsa Schiaparelli. Schiaparelli's innovative design, replete with playful references to Surrealism, was garnering critical acclaim and generating enthusiasm in the fashion world. Feeling she was losing her avant-garde edge, Chanel collaborated with Jean Cocteau on his theatre piece Oedipe Rex. The costumes she designed were mocked and critically lambasted: "Wrapped in bandages the actors looked like ambulant mummies or victims of some terrible accident."

In 1939, at the beginning of World War II, Chanel closed her shops, maintaining her apartment situated above the couture house at 31 Rue de Cambon. She claimed that it was not a time for fashion; as a result of her action, 3,000 female employees lost their jobs. Her biographer Vaughan suggests that Chanel used the outbreak of war as an opportunity to retaliate against those workers who, lobbying for fair wages and work hours, had closed her business operation during a general labor strike in France in 1936. In closing her couture house, Chanel made a definitive statement of her political views. Her dislike of Jews, reportedly inculcated by her convent years and sharpened by her association with society elites, had solidified her beliefs. She shared with many of her circle a conviction that Jews were a threat to Europe because of the Bolshevik government in the Soviet Union. During the German occupation, Chanel resided at the Hotel Ritz. It was noteworthy as the preferred place of residence for upper-echelon German military staff. Her romantic liaison with Baron Hans Gunther von Dincklage, a German officer who had been an operative in military intelligence since 1920, eased her arrangements at the Ritz.

World War II, specifically the Nazi seizure of all Jewish-owned property and business enterprises, provided Chanel with the opportunity to gain the full monetary fortune generated by Parfums Chanel and its most profitable product, Chanel No. 5. The directors of Parfums Chanel, the Wertheimers, were Jewish. Chanel used her position as an "Aryan" to petition German officials to legalize her claim to sole ownership. On 5 May 1941, she wrote to the government administrator charged with ruling on the disposition of Jewish financial assets. Her grounds for proprietary ownership were based on the claim that Parfums Chanel "is still the property of Jews" and had been legally "abandoned" by the owners. "I have," she wrote, "an indisputable right of priority ... the profits that I have received from my creations since the foundation of this business ... are disproportionate ... [and] you can help to repair in part the prejudices I have suffered in the course of these seventeen years."

Chanel was not aware that the Wertheimers, anticipating the forthcoming Nazi mandates against Jews had, in May 1940, legally turned control of Parfums Chanel over to Felix Amiot, a Christian French businessman and industrialist. At war's end, Amiot returned "Parfums Chanel" to the hands of the Wertheimers. During the period directly following the end of World War II, the business world watched with interest and some apprehension the ongoing legal wrestle for control of Parfums Chanel. Interested parties in the proceedings were cognizant that Chanel's Nazi affiliations during wartime, if made public knowledge, would seriously threaten the reputation and status of the Chanel brand. Forbes magazine summarized the dilemma faced by the Wertheimers: [it is Pierre Wertheimer's worry] how "a legal fight might illuminate Chanel's wartime activities and wreck her image—and his business."

Ultimately, the Wertheimers and Chanel came to a mutual accommodation, renegotiating the original 1924 contract. On 17 May 1947, Chanel received wartime profits from the sale of Chanel No. 5, in an amount equivalent to some nine million dollars in twenty-first century valuation. Her future share would be two percent of all Chanel No. 5 sales worldwide. The financial benefit to her would be enormous. Her earnings were projected at $25 million a year, making her at the time one of the richest women in the world. In addition, Pierre Wertheimer agreed to an unusual stipulation proposed by Chanel herself. Wertheimer agreed to pay all of Chanel's living expenses—from the trivial to the large — for the rest of her life.

In September 1944, Chanel was called in to be interrogated by the Free French Purge Committee, the épuration. The committee had no documented evidence of her collaboration activity and was obliged to release her. According to Chanel's grand-niece, Gabrielle Palasse Labrunie, when Chanel returned home she said, "Churchill had me freed". The extent of Churchill's intervention for Chanel after the war became a subject of gossip and speculation.

Some historians claimed that people worried that, if Chanel were forced to testify about her own activities at trial, she would expose the pro-Nazi sympathies and activities of certain top-level British officials, members of the society elite, and the royal family. Vaughan writes that some claim that Churchill instructed Duff Cooper, British ambassador to the French provisional government, to protect Chanel. Requested to appear in Paris before investigators in 1949, Chanel left her retreat in Switzerland to confront testimony given against her at the war crime trial of Baron Louis de Vaufreland, a French traitor and highly placed German intelligence agent. Chanel denied all the accusations. She offered the presiding judge, Leclercq, a character reference: "I could arrange for a declaration to come from Mr. Duff Cooper." Chanel's friend and biographer Marcel Haedrich said of her wartime interaction with the Nazi regime: "If one took seriously the few disclosures that Mademoiselle Chanel allowed herself to make about those black years of the occupation, one's teeth would be set on edge."

In 1945, Chanel moved to Switzerland, where she lived for several years, part of the time with Dincklage. In 1953 she sold her villa La Pausa on the French Riviera to the publisher and translator Emery Reves. Five rooms from La Pausa have been replicated at the Dallas Museum of Art, to house the Reves' art collection as well as pieces of furniture belonging to Chanel. Unlike the pre-war era, when women reigned as the premier couturiers, Christian Dior achieved success in 1947 with his "New Look," and a cadre of male designers achieved recognition: Dior, Cristóbal Balenciaga, Robert Piguet, and Jacques Fath. Chanel was convinced that women would ultimately rebel against the aesthetic favored by the male couturiers, what she called "illogical" design: the "waist cinchers, padded bras, heavy skirts, and stiffened jackets". At more than 70 years old, after having her couture house closed for 15 years, she felt the time was right for her to re-enter the fashion world. The revival of her couture house in 1954 was fully financed by Chanel's opponent in the perfume battle, Pierre Wertheimer. Her new collection was not received well by Parisians, who felt her reputation had been tainted by her wartime association with the Nazis. But, her return to couture was applauded by the British and Americans, who became her faithful customers.

According to Edmonde Charles-Roux, Chanel had become tyrannic and extremely lonely late in life. In her last years she was sometimes accompanied by Jacques Chazot and her confidante Lilou Marquand. A faithful friend was also the Brazilian Aimée de Heeren, who lived in Paris four months a year at the nearby Hotel Meurice. The former rivals shared happy memories of times with the Duke of Westminster. They frequently walked together around central Paris. As 1971 began, Chanel was 87 years old, tired, and ailing. She carried out her usual routine of preparing the spring catalog. She had gone for a long drive the afternoon of Saturday, January 9. Soon after, feeling ill, she went to bed early.¹ She died on Sunday, January 10, 1971 at the Hotel Ritz, where she had resided for more than 30 years. Her funeral was held at the Église de la Madeleine; her fashion models occupied the first seats during the ceremony and her coffin was covered with white flowers – camellias, gardenias, orchids, azaleas and a few red roses. Her grave is located in the Bois-de-Vaux Cemetery, Lausanne, Switzerland.

The concept of the little black dress is often cited as a Chanel contribution to the fashion lexicon; it is a style still worn to this day. Her first dress of this sort was executed in thin silk, crêpe de chine, and had long sleeves. Chanel started making little black dresses in wool or chenille for the day and in satin, crepe or velvet for the evening. The dress was fashionable, yet comfortable and practical because it was stripped of all excess. In 1926, the American edition of Vogue highlighted such a Chanel dress, dubbing it the garçonne (little boy look). They predicted it would "become sort of a uniform for all women of taste." Vogue said it embodied a standardized aesthetic, similar to the democratic appeal of the ubiquitous black Ford automobile. Its spare look generated widespread criticism from male journalists, who complained: "no more bosom, no more stomach, no more rump...Feminine fashion of this moment in the 20th century will be baptized lop off everything." The popularity of the little black dress can be attributed in part to the timing of its introduction. The 1930s was a period of the Great Depression Era, when women needed affordable fashion. Chanel quoted, "Thanks to me they (non-wealthy) can walk around like millionaires."

SARAH BERNHARDT – BIOGRAPHY BY FRANCOISE SAGAN

The first time that I heard about Sarah Bernhardt was when I was a little boy in Egypt. I heard a joke that when Tutankhamun's tomb was discovered in 1922, he rose from the dead and the first question that he asked was: "Is Sarah Bernhardt still performing?" And indeed at the age of 78, although her leg was amputated and she was old and sick, she still performed until her death. Bernhardt is best known in America for the famous nine tours called "farewell tours" that she made between 1880 and 1918. She performed as young men when she was an old woman – Hamlet, and mainly L'Aiglon, the son of Napoleon, in the play by Edmond Rostand, which was the first play that I have ever seen as a little boy in the Egyptian Diaspora. Unfortunately, Bernhardt died about twenty years before I was born, but many people remembered her as she played until 1923. She is perhaps remembered most often for her portrayal of Marguerite Gauthier, the courtesan stricken with consumption, in Dumas fils' La Dame aux Camélias. She appeared in several silent films, and of course in the film La Dame aux Camélias (1911). She earned large amounts of money from her tours and her theater — in 1894 she started her own resident theater company and she opened the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt in 1899. But she also had a weakness for humanitarian causes. Until today, nearly a hundred years after she died, Sarah Bernhardt is perceived as the ultimate actress, the best world actress of all times.

Sarah Bernhardt – Wikipedia

Sarah Bernhardt (c. 22/23 October 1844 – 26 March 1923) was a French stage and early film actress. She was referred to as "the most famous actress the world has ever known", and is regarded as one of the finest actors of all time. Bernhardt made her fame on the stages of France in the 1870s, at the beginning of the Belle Epoque period, and was soon in demand in Europe and the Americas. She developed a reputation as a sublime dramatic actress and tragedienne, earning the nickname "The Divine Sarah". In her later career she starred in some of the earliest films ever produced. Sarah's career spanned over six decades, during which she established herself as the Victorian era's most celebrated actress. In addition to being one of the greatest actors of all time, she was noted for her outsize legend, which made her the first international entertainment icon. Bernhardt's admirers included Sigmund Freud, who kept a photograph of her in his waiting room, Mark Twain, who remarked "There are five kinds of actresses: bad actresses, fair actresses, good actresses, great actresses— and then there is Sarah Bernhardt", and Czar Alexander III, who famously rejected a bow from Bernhardt with "No, Madame. It is I who must bow to you." (and he did so before his court). Numerous theatres and works bear her name.

Bernhardt's stage career started in 1862 while she was a student at the Comédie-Française, France's most prestigious theater. She decided to leave France, and soon ended up in Belgium, where she became the mistress of Henri, Prince de Ligne, and gave birth to their son, Maurice, in 1864. After Maurice's birth, the Prince proposed marriage, but his family forbade it and persuaded Bernhardt to refuse and end their relationship. After being expelled from the Comédie Française, she resumed the life of courtesan to which her mother had introduced her at a young age, and made considerable money during that period (1862–65). During this time she acquired her famous coffin, in which she often slept in lieu of a bed – claiming that doing so helped her understand her many tragic roles. Bernhardt then reverted to the theater, securing a contract at the Théâtre de L'Odéon where she began performing in 1866. Her most famous performance there was her travesty performance as the Florentine minstrel in François Coppé's Le Passant (January 1869). With the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War performances were stopped and Bernhardt converted the theatre into a makeshift hospital where she took care of the soldiers wounded on the battlefield. In 1872, she left the Odéon and returned to Comédie-Française. One of her remarkable successes there was in the title role of Voltaire's Zaïre (1874).

She made her fame on the stages of Europe in the 1870s and was soon in demand all over Europe. Her first tour of the United States and Canada took place in 1880-81 (157 performances in 31 cities). In 1887 she toured South America including Cuba where she performed in the Sauto Theater, in Matanzas. In 1888 she toured Italy, Egypt, Turkey, Sweden, Norway and Russia. In 1891-92 she took part in a worldwide tour which included much of Europe, Russia, North & South America, Australia, New Zealand, Hawaii and Samoa. Another tour of America took place in 1896. 1901 saw her 6th American Tour, 1906 her 7th (her "first Farewell Tour" where she concluded the Southern California leg with "La Tosca" at the Venice Auditorium), 1910 her 8th (when she made a recording on Wax Cylinder at Thomas Edison's laboratory in West Orange, New Jersey), and 1913-1914 her 9th (on the evening of March 12, 1913, in Los Angeles, she was involved in a motorcar accident while she was being driven in a taxi to the downtown Orpheum Theatre to appear in "La Tosca"). In between tours Bernhardt took over the lease of the Théâtre de la Renaissance, which she ran as producer-director-star from 1893 to 1899. She coached many young women in the art of acting, including actress and courtesan Liane de Pougy.

In 1899 Bernhardt took over the former Théâtre des Nations on the Place du Châtelet, renaming it the Théâtre Sarah-Bernhardt and opening on 21 January in one of her most admired parts, the title role in Victorien Sardou's La Tosca. This was followed by revivals of Racine's Phèdre (24 February), Octave Feuillet's Dalila (8 March), Gaston de Wailly's Patron Bénéic (14 March), Edmond Rostand's La Samaritaine (25 March), and Alexandre Dumas fils's La Dame aux Camélias on 9 April. On 20 May, she premiered her most controversial part, the title role in Shakespeare's Hamlet, in a prose adaptation which she had commissioned from Eugène Morand and Marcel Schwob. The play was greeted with rave reviews despite its running time of four hours. She developed a reputation as a serious dramatic actress, earning the title "The Divine Sarah"; arguably, she was the most famous actress of the 19th century. Bernhardt also participated in scandalous productions such as John Wesley De Kay's "Judas". It performed in New York's Globe Theatre for only one night in December 1910 before it was banned there, as well as in Boston and Philadelphia. In New York's art scene of 1910 the story line of the play was nothing short of scandalous. Mary Magdalene, who at first became a lover of Pontius Pilate, then of Judas Iscariot, got involved with Jesus. Judas, after realizing that Mary Magdalene had given herself to Jesus, decided to betray his friend to the Romans. To top the provocation of New York's theater lovers, Judas was played by the voluptuous Sarah Bernhardt. In Paris, Bernhardt continued to direct the Théâtre Sarah-Bernhardt until her death, when her son Maurice took over.

Sarah Bernhardt Facts/Your Dictionairy

One of the first great "stars" of the world stage, Sarah Bernhardt, known as "The Divine Sarah" (1844-1923), dominated the theatrical scenes of both Europe and America for over half a century. In addition to being considered one of the greatest actors of all time, she was noted for her "larger than life personality" and extravagant lifestyle.

Sarah Bernhardt was born Henriette-Rosine Bernard into the Parisian demi-monde of courtesans and affluent gentlemen on October 23, 1844. She did not know her father, a Parisian who never married her Dutch Jewish mother, a woman who had little time or inclination to raise a young child in the social whirl of the Paris salon set. After a tumultuous childhood, Bernhardt was ready to commit herself to a religious life when a place was secured for her to study acting in the Paris Conservatoire (1859 to 1862). She debuted professionally in 1862 in Racine's Iphigénie, in which she displayed little of the talent that would propel her to stardom in just a few years. Physically, Bernhardt was somewhat boyish in her physique; she also suffered from bouts of ill health that plagued her from childhood. Her most noted qualities as an actor were her "voice of gold" and her ability to breathe emotional life into classic roles and melodramatic heroines, lifting the former from the stultifying effects of tradition and lending nobility and depth to the latter. Bernhardt's professional career began in earnest in 1866 as a member of the theater company at the Odéon. Her first major successes came as a member of France's greatest theater company, the Comédie Française, starting in 1872. After a triumphant tour of England with members of the Comédie in 1878, she broke what was considered to be a lifetime contract with the company to pursue her own successes in 1880.

Bernhardt excelled in emotionally overwrought roles in the classical vein, such as the queen in Hugo's Ruy Blas (1879), the title role in Racine's Phèdre (1874), and Doña Sol in Hernani (1877). She also played several "breeches" roles (male parts played by women) throughout her career, such as Hamlet and the title role in Rostand's L'Aiglon (The Eaglet, about Napoleon's son), which was written especially for her. She is perhaps remembered most often for her portrayal of Marguerite Gauthier, the courtesan stricken with consumption, in Dumas' La Dame aux Camélias (Camillette to most English-speaking audiences). Her off-stage life was often just as harrowing as that of the characters she portrayed, with frequent bouts of physical ailments, financial difficulties, and numerous love affairs. Journalists of the day frequently painted her as an eccentric, and this contributed to her fame as much as her acting talent did. It is true that she sometimes slept in a coffin; whether she was at home or traveling Bernhardt always kept a large coterie of friends and admirers about her, as well as servants and a menagerie of exotic animals. She was a visual as well as theatrical artist, and many of her paintings and sculptures were popular. To her credit, she also had a weakness for humanitarian causes. During the Franco-Prussian War in 1870 she established a military hospital in the closed Odéon theater, and during World War I she contributed both money and fund-raising activities to support the war effort.

Bernhardt is best known in America for her famous "farewell tours" that she made between 1880 and 1918. The nine tours she made in America often had a financial rather than artistic motivation behind them. During one such tour she teamed with France's greatest male actor of the day, the comedian Constant-Benoît Coquelin (the only person to ever leave the Comédie Française, until Bernhardt), to perform Edmund de Rostand's Cyrano de Bergerac, among other plays. Bernhardt also took a progressive approach to the new medium of film (which was looked down upon by the legitimate theater), unabashedly appearing in several films in her lifetime, including La Dame aux Camélias (1911), Queen Elizabeth (1912), and Adrienne Lecouvreur (1913). The success of Queen Elizabeth in America, one of the first dramatic silent features, enabled producer Adolph Zukor to start the Famous Players production company, which eventually became Paramount Pictures.

In 1894 she started her own resident theater company. She opened the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt in 1899. Her leg was amputated in 1911 because of a chronic knee condition brought on by several injuries. However, she continued to perform, even though she was constrained to perform excerpts of her most famous roles lying in a prone position or propped up by an artfully-designed set piece. Her hotel room in Paris had been converted to a film set for La Voyante, but she died on March 26, 1923, at the age of 79 before the film was completed. Bernhardt never performed any of her parts in anything but French, but she was hailed and revered as a great actress on both sides of the Atlantic regardless of her audiences' abilities to comprehend the language. This popularity is a testament to both her emotional and vocal power as an actress, as well as her contribution to the modern stage as a singular star rather than as a member of a company.

From The Divine Sarah Bernhardt's Hamlet by Sylvia Morris

Although Bernhardt made her name in her native France playing roles such as Phedre in Racine's intense drama, she loved Shakespeare and appeared as Cordelia in King Lear and Lady Macbeth. In 1899 she played Hamlet in a French adaptation of the play in twelve scenes. The production of Hamlet was brought to the Adelphi Theatre in London during 1899. The duel scene (heavily cut) was specially staged and filmed at the time. Actress Elizabeth Robins published a full account of Bernhardt's performance the following year. Even at the age of 55, "Madame Bernhardt's assumption of masculinity is so cleverly carried out that one loses sight of Hamlet in one's admiration for the tour de force of the actress... She gives us...a spirited boy; doing it with an impetuosity, a youthfulness, almost childish." In giving advice to the players she was "a precocious young gentleman, who...thoroughly enjoys laying down the law to plodding professionals". And in the play scene, "with something a little reminiscent of an urchin swarming over an orchard wall, [Hamlet] crawls up to the throne, till his eyes, not sombre and horror-stricken, but keen and glittering, are on a level with the King's. When he has surprised the guilty terror there, this Hamlet actually bursts out into peal on peal of laughter. His clever trick has succeeded, his Schadenfreude overflows."

After performing in London, Bernhardt and her company gave one performance at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre in Stratford, a matinee on Thursday 29 June 1899. On 16 June the Stratford Herald reported that she was performing in Stratford "to gratify her desire to play here", and had made an advance visit. The day of performance was to be most exciting. A special train brought the company up from London, and both the railway station and the principal streets were decorated with flags and streamers. Marie Corelli met the train, presenting Mme Bernhardt with "a magnificent bouquet with tricolour ribbons, bearing greetings in French". Most of the extensive news coverage concentrated on her reception more than her performance, but the Birmingham Post commented on Bernhardt's "intense dramatic power" while complaining that the prose of the French version "seemed out of character in the poet's Birthplace".

The Birmingham Gazette ventured some criticism: "too short a time the philosopher and too much the man of wrath and vengeance". "Mme Bernhardt...puts his passion in the foreground, and every monologue becomes a diatribe. Her Hamlet is a man in constant frenzy, possessed with the one thought of avenging his father's death. He is not mad, but maddened". In her book Rosemary for Stratford, Ursula Bloom tells what happened when Sarah Bernhardt visited Shakespeare's tomb without any prior warning. The appearance of the great star who spoke no English threw some of the staff into a panic. It was my grandfather, William Tompkins, sub-sacristan at the church, who "came to the rescue" with schoolboy French. "The imperturbable Tompkins...stepped forward and bowed deeply to the lady. "Madame, bon apres-midi," said Tompkins, with an elegant gesture of the hand which he supposed also to be French.” “Sarah Bernhardt greeted him with an almost embarrassing exuberance. He had not a clue as to what she said, but there seemed to be a great deal of it. He led her up the aisle to the choir stalls, his black cassock brushing the pews as he went. Then, coming to a standstill, again he waved his hands. “A la tombe, a la monument,” said he.”

Review on the biography by Goodreads

A world famous novelist writes here about one of the most famous actresses of all time, Sarah Bernhardt, but not wanting this to be a traditional biography, Sagan hit upon the daring device of an imaginary correspondence between Sarah Bernhardt and herself, giving a first-person voice with dimension. The result is a brilliant, lively, intimate exchange of letters, sharing of opinions on past and contemporary culture, and Bernhardt's reflections on her career, friends, motherhood, lovers, money and fans. Though the letters are imaginary, the real woman, Sarah Bernhardt dominated the stage not only in her native France, but throughout the world for sixty years, literally until the week she died in 1923.

From Library Journal

In this charming imaginary correspondence, Sagan interviews the legendary actress (1844-1923). Since Sagan distrusts the published biographies, especially Bernhardt's coy Ma double vie (1907), she leads her subject to make candid comments on her upbringing as a cocotte's daughter, her roles on- and off-stage, her intertwined workaholic and spendthrift life all illuminated by Bernhardt's captivating megalomania. Despite Bernhardt's sexual appetite and self-indulgence, the correspondence is discreet, almost chaste. The charm lies in Sagan's convincing recreation of Bernhardt's conversational voice, which the translator conveys admirably. Marilyn Gaddis Rose, SUNY at Binghamton

KIRKUS REVIEW

Fascinated by the life and personality of Sarah Bernhardt, and, her publisher tells us, uninterested in a traditional biography, Sagan (Bonjour Tristesse; With Fondest Regards, 1985; etc.) has written instead an imaginary correspondence with the divine Sarah, now over 60 years in her grave. Sagan has done her research, and as long as she sticks to the facts—Bernhardt's childhood in a convent school, her troubled reunion in adolescence with her courtesan mother, her discovery of her theatrical gifts, and the triumphs of her phenomenal career—she succeeds in tracing the trajectory of her subject's life. But Sagan is a hopeless fan, dazzled by Bernhardt's numerous private conquests as well as her public acclaim. She gushes to Bernhardt in an early letter that no woman in history “was more adored than you. . .openly adored in all the splendor and gaiety of her glory.” The premise of this correspondence is weak to start with, and it collapses when the two begin agreeing that they are really very much alike, that they share the same values, the same weaknesses, that they have a rare understanding of each other. The book's device needs a light touch, and time and again Sagan's self-indulgence destroys the credulity of the most sympathetic reader. Sagan's genuine admiration for Bernhardt can at times bring the haughty, heedless, and flamboyant actress vividly to life. But a reader's enthusiasm would have to equal Sagan's in order to overlook the romantic and sentimental excesses here.

Sarah Bernhardt and the Jewish problem? Many Jews like to find a connection in all the world's events with the Jewish problem, especially if we are dealing with Jews, as Sarah Bernhardt. Sarah Bernhardt was born in Paris as Rosine Bernardt, the daughter of Julie Bernardt (1821, Amsterdam – 1876, Paris) and an unknown father. Julie was one of six children of an itinerant Jewish spectacle merchant, "vision specialist" and petty criminal, Moritz Baruch Bernardt, and Sara Hirsch (later known as Janetta Hartog; c. 1797–1829). When Sarah was young her mother sent her to Grandchamp, an Augustine convent school near Versailles. Bernardt is said to have once stated, "Me pray? Never! I'm an atheist." She had been baptised a Roman Catholic, and accepted the last rites shortly before her death, but she considered herself irreligious and strongly identified as Jewish. After her son died in 1928, her theatre retained the name Sarah Bernhardt until the Occupation by the Germans in World War II, when the name was changed to Théâtre de la Cité because of Bernardt's Jewish ancestry. So, you can be baptized and be buried as a Christian, but the anti-Semites will never forgive your Jewish roots.

Quotes by Sarah Bernhardt – known for her brilliant quotes, we bring here some of them:

Quand même - Bernhardt's motto, a versatile French phrase meaning "anyway, nevertheless; really; how about that; finally"

Once the curtain is raised, the actor ceases to belong to himself. He belongs to his character, to his author, to his public. He must do the impossible to identify himself with the first, not to betray the second, and not to disappoint the third. And to this end the actor must forget his personality and throw aside his joys and sorrows. He must present the public with the reality of a being who for him is only a fiction. With his own eyes, he must shed the tears of the other. With his own voice, he must groan the anguish of the other. His own heart beats as if it would burst, for it is the other's heart that beats in his heart. And when he retires from a tragic or dramatic scene, if he has properly rendered his character, he must be panting and exhausted. The Art of the Theatre (1925), p. 171

Me pray? Never! I'm an atheist. As quoted in What Great Men Think of Religion (1945) by Ira D Cardiff

Life engenders life. Energy creates energy. It is by spending oneself that one becomes rich. As quoted in Madam Sarah (1966) by Cornelia Otis Skinner, p. xvi

Acting is all internal, but must be externalized.

Victor Hugo could not promise without keeping his word. He was not like me: I promise everything with the firm intention of keeping my promises, and two hours after I have forgotten all about them. If anyone reminds me of what I have promised, I tear my hair, and to make up for my forgetfulness I say anything, I buy presents — in fact, I complicate my life with useless worries. It has always been thus, and always will be so.

My fame had become annoying for my enemies, and a little trying, I confess, for my friends. But at that time all this stir and noise amused me vastly. I did nothing to attract attention. My somewhat fantastic tastes, my paleness and thinness, my peculiar way of dressing, my scorn of fashion, my general freedom in all respects, made me a being quite apart from all others. I did not recognize the fact. I did not read, I never read, the newspapers. So I did not know what was said about me, either favourable or unfavourable. Surrounded by a court of adorers of both sexes, I lived in a sunny dream.

Those who know the joys and miseries of celebrity when they have passed the age of forty know how to defend themselves. They are at the beginning of a series of small worries, thunderbolts hidden under flowers, but they know how to hold in check that monster advertisement. It is a sort of octopus with innumerable tentacles. It throws out to right and left, in front and behind, its clammy arms, and gathers in, through its thousand little suckers, all the gossip and slander and praise afloat, to spit out again at the public when it is vomiting its black gall. But those who are caught in the clutches of celebrity at the age of twenty two know nothing.

I am so superstitious that if I had arrived when there was no sunshine I should have been wretched and most anxious until after my first performance. It is a perfect torture to be superstitious to this degree, and, unfortunately for me, I am ten times more so now than I was in those days, for besides the superstitions of my own country, I have, thanks to my travels, added to my stock all the superstitions of other countries. I know them all now, and in any critical moment of my life, they all rise up in armed legions for or against me. I cannot walk a single step or make any movement or gesture, sit down, go out, look at the sky or ground, without feeling some reason for hope or despair, until at last, exasperated by the trammels put upon my actions by my thought, I defy all superstitions and just act as I want to act.

Life is short, even for those who live a long time, and we must live for the few who know and appreciate us, who judge and absolve us, and for whom we have the same affection and indulgence. The rest I look upon as a mere crowd, lively or sad, loyal or corrupt, from whom there is nothing to be expected but fleeting emotions, either pleasant or unpleasant, which leave no trace behind them. We ought to hate very rarely, as it is too fatiguing; remain indifferent to a great deal, forgive often and never forget.

What matters poverty? What matters anything to him who is enamoured of our art? Does he not carry in himself every joy and every beauty?

For the theatre one needs long arms... an artiste with short arms can never make a fine gesture.

If I have a foreign accent—which I much regret—it is cosmopolitan, but not Teutonic. I am a daughter of the great Jewish race, and my somewhat uncultivated language is the outcome of our enforced wanderings.

Permanent success cannot be achieved except by incessant intellectual labour, always inspired by the ideal.

I have often been asked why I am so fond of playing male parts. As a matter of fact, it is not male parts, but male brains that I prefer.

To be a good actor... it is necessary to have a firmly tempered soul, to be surprised at nothing, to resume each minute the laborious task that has barely just been finished.

The dramatic art would appear to be rather a feminine art; it contains in itself all the artifices which belong to the province of woman: the desire to please, facility to express emotions and hide defects, and the faculty of assimilation which is the real essence of woman.

The theatre is the involuntary reflex of the ideas of the crowd.

Art is not about something, Art is something

He who is incapable of feeling strong passions, of being shaken by anger, of living in every sense of the word, will never be a good actor.

Legend remains victorious in spite of history.

Although all new ideas are born in France, they are not readily adopted there. It seems that they must first commence to prosper in a foreign country.

What would life be without art? Science prolongs life. To consist of what-eating, drinking, and sleeping? What is the good of living longer if it is only a matter of satisfying the requirements that sustain life? All this is nothing without the charm of art.

When asked at age 79 why her Paris apartment was located up many flights of stairs at the top of the building: It's the only way I can still make the hearts of men beat faster.

Actors of the first water are not more plentiful than playwrights of genius.

Alas, we are the victims of advertisement. Those who taste the joys and sorrows of fame when they have passed forty, know how to look after themselves. They know what is concealed beneath the flowers, and what the gossip, the calumnies, and the praise are worth. But as for those who win fame when they are twenty, they know nothing, and are caught up in the whirlpool.

The artist's personality must be left in his dressing-room; his soul must be denuded of its own sensations and clothed with the base or noble qualities he is called upon to exhibit.... [he] must leave behind him the cares and vexations of life, throw aside his personality for several hours, and move in the dream of another life, forgetting everything.

There are five kinds of actresses: bad actresses, fair actresses, good actresses, great actresses— and then there is Sarah Bernhardt - Mark Twain

She is the Muse of Poetry herself. Neither intelligence nor artistry have anything to do with it. She is guided by a secret instinct. She recites as the nightingale sings, as the wind sighs, as water murmurs, as Lamartine once wrote. - Theodore de Banville

SHELLEY – BIOGRAPHY BY ANDRE MAUROIS: ARIEL, OU LA VIE DE SHELLEY

I admire very much Shelley for his social ideas and of course for his poetry. It is amazing how I can remember a poem after almost 60 years, and recall how it moved me to tears, knowing the tragic death of Shelley before he was even 30. I am not a poetic person, far from that, I enjoy poetry, but much more plays, novels, biographies, films, languages, ethics, arts, music, history, and somewhere in the tenth place – poetry. I am also not a sentimental person, being very realistic and down to earth. But I was captivated by the lecture of the excellent biography of Shelley by one of my preferred authors – Andre Maurois. I read the biography because of my love of Shelley's poems, and especially one poem – To the Night. I was a teenager when I read it, not a fanatic of the night, as I slept very well at night, and I did not wish the night to "come, long-sought". I prefer by far the day, my dreams are rather of fear than joy, and I rarely arise at dawn sighing for the night. But I was extremely moved by reading that the poet did not seek for night's brother death (maybe because of that I prefer the day as I don't want to have any association with death), but neither Shelley wanted it, as Death will come when thou art dead, Soon, too soon. It was as if he knew that death was about to come to him soon too soon before he was even thirty. And it reminded me what Julius Caesar said a few hours before he was murdered: "Cowards die many times before their deaths. The valiant never taste of death but once. Of all the wonders that I yet have heard, It seems to me most strange that men should fear, Seeing that death, a necessary end, Will come when it will come." This is exactly what I feel about death, as I was never afraid of it, but both Caesar (at least according to Shakespeare) and Shelley were fatalistic about death, and death encountered them soon too soon nevertheless.

CLXXXVIII. To the Night

SWIFTLY walk over the western wave, Spirit of Night!
 Out of the misty eastern cave
 Where, all the long and lone daylight,
 Thou wovest dreams of joy and fear 5
 Which make thee terrible and dear,—
 Swift be thy flight!

Wrap thy form in a mantle gray,
 Star-inwrought;
 Blind with thine hair the eyes of Day, 10
 Kiss her until she be wearied out:
 Then wander o'er city and sea and land,
 Touching all with thine opiate wand—
 Come, long-sought!

When I arose and saw the dawn, 15
 I sigh'd for thee;
 When light rode high, and the dew was gone,
 And noon lay heavy on flower and tree,
 And the weary Day turn'd to his rest
 Lingering like an unloved guest, 20
 I sigh'd for thee.

Thy brother Death came, and cried,
 "Wouldst thou me?"
 Thy sweet child Sleep, the filmy-eyed,
 Murmur'd like a noontide bee, 25
 "Shall I nestle near thy side?
 Wouldst thou me?"—And I replied,
 "No, not thee!"

Death will come when thou art dead,
 Soon, too soon; 30
 Sleep will come when thou art fled:

Of neither would I ask the boon
 I ask of thee, belovèd Night—
 Swift be thine approaching flight,
 Come soon, soon!

Percy Bysshe Shelley, (born Aug. 4, 1792, Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex, Eng.—died July 8, 1822, at sea off Livorno, Tuscany [Italy]), English Romantic poet whose passionate search for personal love and social justice was gradually channeled from overt actions into poems that rank with the greatest in the English language. Shelley was the heir to rich estates acquired by his grandfather, Bysshe (pronounced “Bish”) Shelley. Timothy Shelley, the poet’s father, was a weak, conventional man who was caught between an overbearing father and a rebellious son. The young Shelley was educated at Syon House Academy (1802–04) and then at Eton (1804–10), where he resisted physical and mental bullying by indulging in imaginative escapism and literary pranks. Between the spring of 1810 and that of 1811, he published two Gothic novels and two volumes of juvenile verse. In the fall of 1810 Shelley entered University College, Oxford, where he enlisted his fellow student Thomas Jefferson Hogg as a disciple. But in March 1811, University College expelled both Shelley and Hogg for refusing to admit Shelley’s authorship of The Necessity of Atheism. Hogg submitted to his family, but Shelley refused to apologize to his. Late in August 1811, Shelley eloped with Harriet Westbrook, the younger daughter of a London tavern owner; by marrying her, he betrayed the acquisitive plans of his grandfather and father, who tried to starve him into submission but only drove the strong-willed youth to rebel against the established order. Early in 1812, Shelley, Harriet, and her older sister Eliza Westbrook went to Dublin, where Shelley circulated pamphlets advocating political rights for Roman Catholics, autonomy for Ireland, and freethinking ideals. The couple traveled to Lynmouth, Devon, where Shelley issued more political pamphlets, and then to North Wales, where they spent almost six months in 1812–13.

Lack of money finally drove Shelley to moneylenders in London, where in 1813 he issued Queen Mab, his first major poem—a nine-canto mixture of blank verse and lyric measures that attacks the evils of the past and present (commerce, war, the eating of meat, the church, monarchy, and marriage) but ends with resplendent hopes for humanity when freed from these vices. In June 1813 Harriet Shelley gave birth to their daughter Ianthe, but a year later Shelley fell in love with Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, daughter of William Godwin and his first wife, née Mary Wollstonecraft. Against Godwin’s objections, Shelley and Mary Godwin eloped to France on July 27, 1814, taking with them Mary’s stepsister Jane (later “Claire”) Clairmont. Following travels through France, Switzerland, and Germany, they returned to London, where they were shunned by the Godwins and most other friends. Shelley dodged creditors until the birth of his son Charles (born to Harriet, 30/11/1814), his grandfather’s death (1/1815), and provisions of Sir Bysshe’s will forced Sir Timothy to pay Shelley’s debts and grant him an annual income. Settling near Windsor Great Park in 1815, Shelley read the classics with Hogg and another friend, Thomas Love Peacock. He also wrote Alastor; or The Spirit of Solitude, a blank-verse poem, published with shorter poems in 1816, that warns idealists (like Shelley himself) not to abandon “sweet human love” and social improvement for the vain pursuit of evanescent dreams. By mid-May 1816, Shelley, Mary, and Claire Clairmont hurried to Geneva to intercept Lord Byron, with whom Claire had begun an affair. During this memorable summer, Shelley composed the poems “Hymn to Intellectual Beauty” and “Mont Blanc,” and Mary began her novel Frankenstein. Shelley’s party returned to England in September, settling in Bath. Late in the year, Harriet Shelley drowned herself in London, and on 30/12/1816, Shelley and Mary were married with the Godwins’ blessing. But a Chancery Court decision declared Shelley unfit to raise Ianthe & Charles (his children by Harriet), who were placed in foster care at his expense.

In March 1817 the Shelleys settled near Peacock at Marlow, where Shelley wrote his twelve-canto romance-epic Laon and Cythna; or, The Revolution of the Golden City and Mary Shelley finished Frankenstein. They compiled History of a Six Weeks' Tour jointly from the letters and journals of their trips to Switzerland, concluding with "Mont Blanc." In November, Laon and Cythna was suppressed by its printer and publisher, who feared that Shelley's idealized tale of a peaceful national revolution, bloodily suppressed by a league of king and priests, violated the laws against blasphemous libel. After revisions, it was reissued in 1818 as The Revolt of Islam. Because Shelley's health suffered from the climate and his financial obligations outran his resources, the Shelleys and Claire Clairmont went to Italy, where Byron was residing. They reached Milan in April 1818 and proceeded to Pisa and Leghorn (Livorno). That summer, at Bagni di Lucca, Shelley translated Plato's Symposium and wrote his own essay "On Love." He also completed a modest poem entitled Rosalind and Helen, in which he imagines his destiny in the poet-reformer "Lionel," who—imprisoned for radical activity—dies young after his release.

Thus far, Shelley's literary career had been politically oriented. Queen Mab, the early poems first published in 1964 as The Esdaile Notebook, Laon and Cythna, and most of his prose works were devoted to reforming society; and even Alastor, Rosalind and Helen, and the personal lyrics voiced the concerns of an idealistic reformer who is disappointed or persecuted by an unreceptive society. But in Italy, far from the daily irritations of British politics, Shelley deepened his understanding of art and literature and, unable to reshape the world to conform to his vision, he concentrated on embodying his ideals within his poems. His aim became, as he wrote in "Ode to the West Wind," to make his words "Ashes and sparks" as from "an unextinguished hearth," thereby transforming subsequent generations and, through them, the world. Later, as he became estranged from Mary Shelley, he portrayed even love in terms of aspiration, rather than fulfillment: "The desire of the moth for the star,/ Of the night for the morrow,/ The devotion to something afar/ From the sphere of our sorrow." In August 1818, Shelley and Byron again met in Venice; the Shelleys remained there or at Este through October 1818. During their stay, little Clara Shelley (b. 1817) became ill and died. In "Lines Written Among the Euganean Hills" (published with Rosalind and Helen), Shelley writes how visions arising from the beautiful landscape seen from a hill near Este had revived him from despair to hopes for the political regeneration of Italy, thus transforming the scene into "a green isle. . . / In the deep wide sea of Misery." He also began Julian and Maddalo—in which Byron ("Maddalo") and Shelley debate human nature and destiny—and drafted Act I of Prometheus Unbound. In November 1818 the Shelleys traveled through Rome to Naples, where they remained until the end of February 1819.

Settling next at Rome, Shelley continued Prometheus Unbound and outlined The Cenci, a tragedy on the Elizabethan model based on a case of incestuous rape and patricide in sixteenth-century Rome. He completed this drama during the summer of 1819 near Leghorn, where the Shelleys fled in June after their other child, William Shelley (b. 1816), died from malaria. Shelley himself terms The Cenci "a sad reality," contrasting it with earlier "visions . . . of the beautiful and just." Memorable characters, classic five-act structure, powerful and evocative language, and moral ambiguities still make The Cenci theatrically effective. Even so, it is a less notable achievement than Prometheus Unbound: A Lyrical Drama, which Shelley completed at Florence in the autumn of 1819, near the birth of Percy Florence Shelley, Mary Shelley's only surviving child. Both plays appeared about 1820. In Prometheus Shelley inverts the plot of a lost play by Aeschylus in a poetic masterpiece that combines supple blank verse with a variety of complex lyric measures. In Act I, Prometheus, tortured on Jupiter's orders for having given mankind the gift of moral freedom, recalls his earlier curse of Jupiter and forgives him ("I wish no living thing to suffer pain”). By eschewing revenge, Prometheus, who embodies the moral will, can be reunited with his beloved Asia, a spiritual ideal transcending humanity; her love prevents him from becoming another tyrant when Jupiter is overthrown by the mysterious power known as Demogorgon. Act II traces Asia’s awakening and journey toward Prometheus, beginning with her descent into the depths of nature to confront and question Demogorgon. Act III depicts the overthrow of Jupiter and the union of Asia and Prometheus, who—leaving Jupiter’s throne vacant—retreat to a cave from which they influence the world through ideals embodied in the creative arts. The end of the act describes the renovation of both human society and the natural world. Act IV opens with joyful lyrics by spirits who describe the benevolent transformation of the human consciousness that has occurred. Next, other spirits hymn the beatitude of humanity and nature in this new millennial age; and finally, Demogorgon returns to tell all creatures that, should the fragile state of grace be lost, they can restore their moral freedom through these “spells”:

*To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite;
To forgive wrongs darker than Death or Night;
To defy Power which seems Omnipotent;
To love, and bear; to hope, till Hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates. . .*

Prometheus Unbound, which was the keystone of Shelley’s poetic achievement, was written after he had been chastened by “sad reality” but before he began to fear that he had failed to reach an audience. Published with it were some of the poet’s finest and most hopeful shorter poems, including “Ode to Liberty,” “Ode to the West Wind,” “The Cloud,” and “To a Sky-Lark.” While completing Prometheus Unbound and The Cenci, Shelley reacted to news of the Peterloo Massacre (August 1819) in England by writing The Masque of Anarchy and several radical songs that he hoped would rouse the British people to active but nonviolent political protest. Later in 1819 he sent to England Peter Bell the Third, which joins literary satire of William Wordsworth’s Peter Bell to attacks on corruptions in British society, and he drafted A Philosophical View of Reform, his longest (though incomplete) prose work, urging moderate reform to prevent a bloody revolution that might lead to new tyranny. Too radical to be published during Shelley’s lifetime, The Masque of Anarchy appeared after the reformist elections of 1832, Peter Bell the Third and the political ballads in 1839–40, and A Philosophical View of Reform not until 1920.

After moving to Pisa in 1820, Shelley was stung by hostile reviews into expressing his hopes more guardedly. His “Letter to Maria Gisborne” in heroic couplets and “The Witch of Atlas” in ottava rima (both 1820; published 1824) combine the mythopoeic mode of Prometheus Unbound with the urbane self-irony that had emerged in Peter Bell the Third, showing Shelley’s awareness that his ideals might seem naive to others. Late that year, Oedipus Tyrannus; or, Swellfoot the Tyrant, his satirical drama on the trial for adultery of Caroline (estranged wife of King George IV), appeared anonymously but was quickly suppressed. In 1821, however, Shelley reasserted his uncompromising idealism. Epipsychidion (in couplets) mythologizes his infatuation with Teresa (“Emilia”) Viviani, a convent-bound young admirer, into a Dantesque fable of how human desire can be fulfilled through art. His essay A Defence of Poetry (published 1840) eloquently declares that the poet creates humane values and imagines the forms that shape the social order: thus each mind recreates its own private universe, and “Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the World.” Adonais, a pastoral elegy in Spenserian stanzas, commemorates the death of John Keats by declaring that, while we “decay/ Like corpses in a chapel,” the creative spirit of Adonais, despite his physical death, “has outsoared the shadow of our night.”

*The One remains, the many change and pass;
Heaven's light forever shines, Earth's shadows fly;
Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of Eternity,
Until Death tramples it to fragments.*

The verse drama Hellas (published 1822) celebrates the Greek revolution against Turkish rule and reiterates the political message of Laon and Cythna—that the struggle for human liberty can be neither totally defeated nor fully realized, since the ideal is greater than its earthly embodiments. After Byron's arrival in Pisa late in 1821, Shelley, inhibited by his presence, completed only a series of urbane, yet longing lyrics—most addressed to Jane Williams—during the early months of 1822. He began the drama “Charles the First,” but soon abandoned it. After the Shelleys and Edward and Jane Williams moved to Lerici, Shelley began “The Triumph of Life,” a dark fragment on which he was at work until he sailed to Leghorn to welcome his friend Leigh Hunt, who had arrived to edit a periodical called The Liberal. Shelley and Edward Williams drowned on July 8, 1822, when their boat sank during the stormy return voyage to Lerici. Mary Shelley faithfully collected her late husband's unpublished writings, and by 1840, aided by Hunt and others, she had disseminated his fame and most of his writings. The careful study of Shelley's publications and manuscripts has since elucidated his deep learning, clear thought, and subtle artistry. Shelley was a passionate idealist and consummate artist who, while developing rational themes within traditional poetic forms, stretched language to its limits in articulating both personal desire and social altruism.

And from a different angle, we learn from Wikipedia additional traits of Shelley's personality:

Percy Bysshe Shelley (4 August 1792 – 8 July 1822) was one of the major English Romantic poets, and is regarded by some as among the finest lyric, as well as epic, poets in the English language. A radical in his poetry as well as in his political and social views, Shelley did not see fame during his lifetime, but recognition for his poetry grew steadily following his death. Shelley was a key member of a close circle of visionary poets and writers that included Lord Byron; Leigh Hunt; Thomas Love Peacock; and his own second wife, Mary Shelley, the author of Frankenstein. Shelley is perhaps best known for such classic poems as Ozymandias, Ode to the West Wind, To a Skylark, Music, When Soft Voices Die, The Cloud and The Masque of Anarchy. His other major works include a groundbreaking verse drama The Cenci (1819) and long, visionary poems such as Queen Mab (later reworked as The Daemon of the World), Alastor, The Revolt of Islam, Adonais, Prometheus Unbound (1820)—widely considered to be his masterpiece,—Hellas: A Lyrical Drama (1821), and his final, unfinished work, The Triumph of Life (1822). Shelley's close circle of friends included some of the most important progressive thinkers of the day, including his father-in-law, the philosopher William Godwin, Leigh Hunt. Though Shelley's poetry and prose output remained steady throughout his life, most publishers and journals declined to publish his work for fear of being arrested for either blasphemy or sedition. Shelley's poetry sometimes had only an underground readership during his day, but his poetic achievements are widely recognized today, and his advanced political and social thought impacted the Chartist and other movements in England, and reach down to the present day. Shelley's theories of economics and morality, for example, had a profound influence on Karl Marx; his early, perhaps first, writings on nonviolent resistance influenced both Leo Tolstoy and Mahatma Gandhi. Shelley became a lodestone to the subsequent three or four generations of poets, including important Victorian and Pre-Raphaelite poets such as Robert Browning and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. He was admired by Oscar Wilde, Thomas Hardy, George Bernard Shaw, Bertrand Russell, W. B. Yeats, Upton Sinclair and Isadora Duncan. Henry David Thoreau's civil disobedience was apparently influenced by Shelley's non-violence in protest and political action. Shelley's popularity and influence has continued to grow in contemporary poetry circles.

Shelley's unconventional life and uncompromising idealism, combined with his strong disapproving voice, made him an authoritative and much-denigrated figure during his life and afterward. He became an idol of the next two or three or even four generations of poets, including the important Victorian and Pre-Raphaelite poets Robert Browning, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Algernon Charles Swinburne, as well as Lord Byron, Henry David Thoreau, W. B. Yeats, Aleister Crowley and Edna St. Vincent Millay, and poets in other languages such as Jan Kasprowicz, Rabindranath Tagore, Jibanananda Das and Subramanya Bharathy. Henry David Thoreau's civil disobedience and Mahatma Gandhi's passive resistance were influenced and inspired by Shelley's nonviolence in protest and political action. It is known that Gandhi would often quote Shelley's Masque of Anarchy, which has been called "perhaps the first modern statement of the principle of nonviolent resistance." Shelley wrote several essays on the subject of vegetarianism, the most prominent of which were "A Vindication of Natural Diet" (1813) and "On the Vegetable System of Diet". Shelley was a strong advocate for social justice for the "lower classes". He witnessed many of the same mistreatments occurring in the domestication and slaughtering of animals, and he became a fighter for the rights of all living creatures that he saw being treated unjustly. I admire Shelley's social justice ideas, his progressive thinking, his atheism, his nonviolence in protest and political action, his idealism, his poetry, but much less his unconventional life and his careless attitude towards women.

The Socialist Party of Great Britain - Shelley: A Socialist Poet

I became acquainted with Shelley in 1944. At the time I was eighteen years of age and a Republican remand prisoner in Belfast jail. I liked poetry and, searching for something readable in the prison library—a cupboard which they opened twice weekly to the accompaniment of bawling screws, who could see no justification for delay in lifting one of the books—I found a treasure: The Complete Works of Percy Bysshe Shelley. Eventually I got my own copy of Shelley and, over many, many years, I have prized it as the first real socialist literature I ever read. It is, I think, fitting that, on the bi-centenary of his birth, an appreciation of his life's work should appear in a socialist journal. Poets, with their abstract notions of freedom and justice, can momentarily help a prisoner transcend the ignominy and degradation that the prison system imposes. But Shelley's ideas of freedom and justice were no way abstract; his was no mere solace for the soul. Yes, there were the odes To The West Wind, To A Skylark, To A Cloud; beautiful word music in the classical tradition of English metrical composition. But, more importantly, there was the wisdom that stripped to its essential ugliness a system of society that dissipates, wastes and destroys wealth in order to make its rich richer while mentally and physically impoverishing the producers of that wealth. There was the vision of a new world, a world of dignity and equality where cash would not be the measure of human need. And there was the indignation, the anguish, even the pain—sometimes written in a spontaneity of anger that defied the discipline of well-marshalled prosody. Here was a text book of revolutionary thought that showed the futility of the cause for which I was imprisoned and extended my vision beyond the empty rhetoric of nationalism.

During his lifetime Shelley had come to Ireland to protest at the misery of the peasantry. Some Irish nationalists have equated this with sympathy for Irish nationalism but Shelley, whose constituency was the toiling masses everywhere, did not subscribe to the myth that the English working class were the beneficiaries of English imperialism. Thus, after hearing of the Peterloo Massacre at Manchester in 1819, Shelley wrote the Masque of Anarchy in which he describes the contemporary condition of the working class in England:

Asses, swine have litter spread
And with fitting food are fed;
All things have a home but one -
Thou, Oh Englishman, hast none!
This is Slavery—savage men,
Or wild beasts within a den
Would endure not as ye do—
But such ills they never knew.

This poem, consisting of some ninety one short stanzas of varying lengths was written at Leghorn in Italy. According to his wife, Mary, when Shelley heard how the military murderers had waded into a peaceful reform protest "it... aroused in him violent emotions of indignation and compassion". According to some purists, that anger adversely affected the quality of the poem. Whatever its poetic qualities, Shelley's Masque of Anarchy must rank, from a working—class standpoint, as the most chdactic of English poetical works. His verse castigates every rotten facet of capitalism: its law, its judiciary, its priests, its parasite class and the foulness of its oppression. His words bear the reader along the path of anger and frustration seeking, it would seem, retribution, revenge. But Shelley, in an age when violence was the tool of revolution, was too deeply perceptive of the need for democratic action if the revolution which he craved was to realize his vision. True, he makes us angry, makes us loathe this evil that murders people for profit but, on the crest of our anger, he stops us:

Then it is to feel revenge
Fiercely thirsting to exchange Blood for blood - and wrong for wrong -
Do not thus when ye are strong.

What then? What should we do when "we are strong"? Shelley, the democratic socialist says we should use the unassailable power of our numbers. Poetically, he says we should think... decide:

Stand ye calm and resolute,
Like a forest, close and mute,
With folded arms and looks which are Weapons of unvanquished war.
Rise like Lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you
Ye are many—they are few.

In 1888 Marx's daughter, Eleanor, and her partner, Edward Aveling published an appreciation of Shelley under the title Shelley's Socialism. The justification for their assumption is abundant throughout Shelley's poems and prose writings. In one of his notes to Queen Mab, Shelley quotes Godwin with approval: "there is no real wealth but the labour of man". Prometheus Unbound,

The Masque of Anarchy, Queen Mab, The Ode to Liberty, these, with his prose writings, his prologues, his sonnets and his songs chronicle the misery of the peasant and the wage slave but always, there is the optimism of the true revolutionary; the clarity of vision, as here in Prometheus Unbound, of a future where:

The Loathsome mask has fallen the man remains Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man
Equal, unclassed, tribless and nationless,
Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king,
Over himself, just, gentle, wise.

Queen Mab is a vision of the past, present and future of mankind. In it Shelley attacks kings, war, commerce and, in particular, priests and religion. In fact the criticism of christianity, in the poem as well as in prose notes attached to it was so hard-hitting that when it was republished in the 1820s the publisher was sent to prison for blasphemy. Queen Mab became the work that publishers used in defiance of the restrictive press laws of the time. Each time they were convicted of blasphemy. But as a result Queen Mab, and thus Godwin's social ideas, came to be widely read in Chartist and radical circles. In this passage from Queen Mab he criticises the way money contaminates all human relationships:

All things are sold: the very light of Heaven Is venal;
Earth's unsparing gifts of love,
The smallest and most despicable things
That lurk in the abysses of the deep,
All objects of our life, even life itself,
And the poor pittance which the laws allow
Of liberty, the fellowship of man,
Those duties which his heart of human love
Should urge him to perform instinctively,
Are bought and sold as in a public mart
Of undisguising selfishness, that sets
On each its price, the stamp-mark of her reign.

He saw money, "paper coin—that forgery of the title deeds", as capitalism's instrument of theft; he saw slavery as a natural result of property society; he saw the poverty and alienation of the masses and, especially, did he decry the intellectual poverty and deception which capitalism inflicted on its wage slaves. In part V of Queen Mab Shelley attacks commerce which he sees as a product of selfishness in the sense of people wanting to sell their surplus for money rather than give it to others to satisfy their needs:

Commerce! Beneath whose poison-breathing shade
No solitary virtue dares to spring,
But Poverty and Wealth with equal hand
Scatter their withering curses, and unfold
The doors of premature and violent death,
To pining famine and full-fed disease,
To all that shares the lot of human life,
Which poisoned, body and soul, scarce drags the chain,
That lengthens as it goes and clanks behind.

It is quite clear that Shelley was expressing Godwin's idea that, in a just society, producers would give away their surplus produce free rather than sell it for money. Hence his opening description of commerce as "the venal interchange of all that human art or nature yield; which wealth should purchase not, but want demand, and natural kindness hasten to supply". When he later describes what will happen when people are motivated by the "consciousness of good" he naturally states that they will have no need of "mediative signs of selfishness"—of money—and that "every transfer of the earth's natural gifts shall be a commerce of good words and works".

This commerce of sincerest virtue needs
 No mediative signs of selfishness,
 No jealous intercourse of wretched gain,
 No balancings of prudence, cold and long;
 In just and equal measure all is weighed,
 One scale contains the sum of human weal,
 And one, the good man's heart.

Part V of Queen Mab ends as follows:

But hoary-headed Selfishness has felt
 Its death-blow, and is tottering to the grave:
 A brighter morn awaits the human day,
 When every transfer of earth's natural gifts
 Shall be a commerce of good words and works;
 When poverty and wealth, the thirst of fame,
 The fear of infamy, disease and woe,
 War with its million horrors, and fierce hell
 Shall live but in the memory of Time,
 Who, like a penitent libertine, shall start,
 Look back, and shudder at his younger years.

In one sense this argument as to whether or not Godwin and Shelley were socialists is anachronistic since the modern idea of socialism, as the solution to the problems of a majority wage-working class within a capitalist industrial society, had not yet come into being. This is partly why in this article we have used the word "communist" rather than "socialist" to describe the moneyless equal society advocated by critics of the essentially agrarian class society that existed before industrial capitalism developed. It was of course the low level of development of the means of production that accounts for the frugal, even Spartan, character which the pre-industrial communists were obliged to give to the egalitarian society they advocated, but it still remains true that people like (in England) More, Winstanley and Godwin and Shelley and (in France) Morelly, Babeuf and Buonarrotti were forerunners of the socialist industrial society of abundance that we modern socialists now advocate.

ALBERTO MORAVIA – BIOGRAPHY BY ALBERTO MORAVIA AND ALAIN ELKANN

I have probably Italian genes. I don't know if it can be scientifically proven, although a substantial part of my family lived in Milano before the Holocaust and my father stayed there in 1922. I feel at home there, but so also in Haifa, Paris, Athens and Coria in Spain. Researchers believe that the origin of my family name can be from Coria in Spain or Cori near Rome. Maybe from both towns that currently have a population of about 12,000 people each. Anyhow, I enjoy Italian literature from Dante to Moravia, playwrights from Goldoni to Pirandello, art from Michelangelo to Modigliani, operas from Verdi to Puccini, classic composers from Vivaldi to Paganini, songs from Napolitan to Modugno, and films from Fellini to Antonioni. One of the authors I like most is Alberto Moravia, and our affinities go beyond the fact that he was Italian and Jewish. His books are the most modern and realistic, with a moral message, his style is stark and unadorned as my style – although I admire Hugo I could never write in his style, he fights hypocrisy in his books as I do in mine, but his books' protagonists are alienated and incapable of finding happiness, much like Antonioni's and Fellini's in their films. It is amazing how the most jovial and happy population on earth – the Italians are described as alienated and misanthropes in Moravia's books and Antonioni's films. Anyhow, I never met an alienated Italian, and all the Italians friends and businessmen that I know are jovial, happy, and far from alienated.

From the multitude of articles and entries on Moravia I've chosen to bring here part of: Alberto Moravia, The Art of Fiction No. 6 - Interviewed by Anna Maria de Dominicis & Ben Johnson: "My works are not autobiographical in the usual meaning of the word. Perhaps I can put it this way: whatever is autobiographical is so in only a very indirect manner, in a very general way. I am related to Girolamo, but I am not Girolamo. I do not take, and have never taken, either action or characters directly from life. Events may suggest events to be used in a work later; similarly, persons may suggest future characters; but suggest is the word to remember. One writes about what one knows. For instance, I can't say I know America, though I've visited there. I couldn't write about it. Yes, one uses what one knows, but autobiography means something else. I should never be able to write a real autobiography; I always end by falsifying and fictionalizing—I'm a liar, in fact. That means I'm a novelist, after all. I write about what I know." Maybe that was the reason that he has chosen to publish his biography in the form of an interview with Elkann. I fully concur with what Moravia says about autobiographical novels – I have written a novel and a play which are "based on true events" as they write in movies, but most of them are fiction, as the protagonists of the novel and play, or the muse, compelled me to develop the story in a different way than what happened in reality, and also in this book I do not guarantee that what I write is what happened, as "some of the events in this book are based on memory, and memory is not always correct, all the events in this book should be treated as fictitious." So, thank you Alberto for putting it in a much better way that I can that autobiographies could be fictitious. I also write about what I know, all my ten books that were published deal with issues that I know quite well, I would never dare to write as Emile Zola a novel like Germinal, as I don't understand anything about mines, but unlike Zola who made a thorough research on this topic, or my friend Yitzhak Gormezano Goren who made a research of a few years on Dona Gracia, I write about topics that I know as business, ethics, literature, films, or plays in my academic and other books. I respect very much Zola, as in L'Argent he made an authentic novel, he described so well the business environment, and Aristide Saccard is so genuine, although before conducting his research he did not know anything about it. I wrote about the same topics, and I know very well the environment and the protagonists, yet Zola sounds much more authentic than me.

And Moravia continues: "The very fact of representing the left wing, or a "wing" of any sort, implies a partisan position and nonobjectivity. For that reason, one is impotent to criticize in a valid sense. Social criticism must necessarily, and always, be an extremely superficial thing. But don't misunderstand me. Writers, like all artists, are concerned with representing reality, to create a more absolute and complete reality than reality itself. They must, if they are to accomplish this, assume a moral position, a clearly conceived political, social, and philosophical attitude; in consequence, their beliefs are, of course, going to find their way into their work. What artists believe, however, is of secondary importance, ancillary to the work itself. A writer survives in spite of his beliefs. Lawrence will be read whatever one thinks of his notions on sex. Dante is read in the Soviet Union." Here again I fully concur with Moravia and I have followed his example in my books and articles about social criticism, trying to represent reality, to create a more absolute and complete reality in my cases especially. I assume a moral position, and I have a clearly conceived political, social, and philosophical attitude, so my works even my academic works are never fully objective, as they permeate my beliefs. I wrote all my books not because I wanted to earn money – I never receive a penny for my books and articles although they were sold by my publishers in the aggregate to thousands of readers, nor because I wanted to receive a literary or academic recognition, win prizes, or being famous, I wrote them only with one purpose – to make this world a better world, a just world, to help humankind and the oppressed.

Moravia continues: "A work of art, on the other hand, has a representative and expressive function. In this representation the author's ideas, his judgments, the author himself, are engaged with reality. Criticism, thus, is no more than a part, an aspect—a minor aspect—of the whole. I suppose, putting it this way, I am, after all, a moralist to some degree. We all are. You know, sometimes you wake up in the morning in revolt against everything. Nothing seems right. And for that day or so, at least until you get over it, you're a moralist. Put it this way: every man is a moralist in his own fashion, but he is many other things besides." This is true especially for me as I wake up in revolt against so many things that I feel compelled to deal with those issues. I could have opt to live secluded "lathe biosas" - get through life without drawing attention to yourself", as Epicurus said, but I could not do it, it was stronger than me, it was the only way for me to overcome my disgust from the way the world was going, I know that I do not change anything, but the mere fact that I fight against all the wrongs gives me comfort or therapy, and appeases my conscience, and who knows – maybe my efforts and the efforts of thousands of others would make an impact and change ultimately the world for the better. I appreciate much more my fight than riches and power, as undoubtedly if I did not fight for moral causes I could have been much richer and be CEO of large companies, but I prefer to be "the richest man in town" as George Bailey from It's a Wonderful Life, rich in moral, in principles, in humanity. But I do not want to sound like a preacher, only a moralist, as I have so many things to tell besides that, and like Moravia, my books and especially this one, comprise essays and surveys on literature, plays, films, languages, Ladino, philosophy, arts, music, politics, outstanding people...

Moravia says: "My interest in the theater dates back a good many years. Even as a youngster I read, and I continue to read and enjoy, plays—for the most part, the masters: Shakespeare, other of the Elizabethans, Molière, Goldoni, the Spanish theater, Lope de Vega, Calderón. I'm drawn most, in my reading, to tragedy, which, in my opinion, is the greatest of all forms of artistic expression, the theater itself being the most complete of literary forms. Unfortunately, contemporary drama is nonexistent. Neither O'Neill, Shaw, Pirandello, nor anyone else has created drama—tragedy—in the deepest meaning of the word. The basis of drama is language, poetic language. Even Ibsen, the greatest of modern dramatists, resorted to everyday language and, in consequence, by my definition failed to create true drama." This time I concur only with the first part of the paragraph, as I like Moravia read as a youngster and continue to read and enjoy plays by Sophocles, Moliere, Racine, Goldoni, Calderon, and of course Shakespeare. But I fully disagree with what he says that contemporary drama is nonexistent – the modern playwrights have created drama, tragedies and comedies, that are as good as those of the masters if not better, and of course more relevant to nowadays – O'Neill, Shaw, Ibsen, Miller, Williams, Lorca and Pirandello have created drama in the deepest meaning of the world. Who said that the basis of drama is language, poetic language? It is only one of its components, and if playwrights resort to everyday language they should be praised for that as they open wide doors to the majority of the population, not only intellectuals, and they make us much better persons.

Alberto Moravia (November 28, 1907 – September 26, 1990), born Alberto Pincherle, was an Italian novelist and journalist. His novels explored matters of modern sexuality, social alienation, and existentialism. Moravia is best known for his debut novel Gli indifferenti (published in 1929), and for the anti-fascist novel Il Conformista (The Conformist), the basis for the film The Conformist (1970) directed by Bernardo Bertolucci. Other novels of his adapted for the cinema are Agostino, filmed with the same title by Mauro Bolognini in 1962; Il Disprezzo (A Ghost at Noon or Contempt), filmed by Jean-Luc Godard as Le Mépris (Contempt) (1963); La Noia (Boredom), filmed with that title by Damiano Damiani in 1963 and released in the US as The Empty Canvas in 1964; and La ciociara, filmed by Vittorio de Sica as Two Women (1960). Cedric Kahn's L'Ennui (1998) is another version of La Noia. Moravia once remarked that the most important facts of his life had been his illness, a tubercular infection of the bones that confined him to a bed for five years, and Fascism, because they both caused him to suffer and do things he otherwise would not have done. "It is what we are forced to do that forms our character, not what we do of our own free will." Moravia was an atheist. His writing was marked by its factual, cold, precise style, often depicting the malaise of the bourgeoisie. It was rooted in the tradition of nineteenth-century narrative, underpinned by high social and cultural awareness. In his world, where inherited social, religious and moral beliefs were no longer acceptable, he considered sex and money the only basic criteria for judging social and human reality. Moravia believed that writers must, if they were to be successful in representing reality, "assume a moral position, a clearly conceived political, social, and philosophical attitude" but also that, ultimately, "A writer survives in spite of his beliefs." Between 1959 and 1962 Moravia was president of PEN International, the worldwide association of writers.

Alberto Pincherle (the pen-name "Moravia" was the maiden surname of his paternal grandmother) was born in Via Sgambati in Rome, Italy, to a wealthy middle-class family. His Jewish Venetian father, Carlo, was an architect and a painter. His Catholic Anconitan mother, Teresa Iginia de Marsanich, was of Dalmatian origin. His family had interesting twists and developed a complex cultural and political character. The brothers Carlo and Nello Rosselli, founders of the anti-fascist resistance movement Giustizia e Libertà, murdered in France by Benito Mussolini's order in 1937, were paternal cousins, and his maternal uncle, Augusto De Marsanich, was an undersecretary in the National Fascist Party cabinet. Moravia did not finish conventional schooling because, at the age of nine, he contracted tuberculosis of the bone; this confined him to bed for five years. He spent three years at home, and two in a sanatorium near Cortina d'Ampezzo, in northeastern Italy. Moravia was an intelligent boy and devoted himself to reading books: some of his favourite authors included Giosuè Carducci, Boccaccio, Fyodor Dostoevsky, James Joyce, Ariosto, Carlo Goldoni, William Shakespeare, Molière, Gogol, Mallarmé. He learned French and German, and wrote poems in French and Italian. In 1925 at the age of 18, he left the sanatorium and moved to Bressanone. During the next three years, partly in Bressanone and partly in Rome, he began to write his first novel, Gli indifferenti (Time of Indifference), published in 1929. The novel is a realistic analysis of the moral decadence of a middle-class mother and two of her children.

In 1927, Moravia met Corrado Alvaro and Massimo Bontempelli, and started his career as a journalist with the magazine 900, which published his first short stories, including "Cortigiana stanca" ("The Tired Courtesan" or in French as "Lassitude de courtisane", 1927), "Delitto al circolo del tennis" ("Crime at the Tennis Club") (1928), "Il ladro curioso" ("The Curious Thief") and "Apparizione" ("Apparition") (both 1929). Gli indifferenti was published at his own expense, costing 5,000 Italian lira. Literary critics described the novel as a noteworthy example of contemporary Italian narrative fiction. The next year, Moravia started collaborating with the newspaper La Stampa, then edited by author Curzio Malaparte. In 1933, together with Mario Pannunzio, he founded the literary review magazines Caratteri ("Characters") and Oggi ("Today"), and started writing for the newspaper Gazzetta del Popolo. The years leading to World War II were problematic for Moravia as an author; the Fascist regime prohibited reviews of Le ambizioni sbagliate (1935), seized his novel La mascherata ("Masquerade") (1941), and banned publication of Agostino (Two Adolescents) (1941). In 1935 he traveled to the United States to give a lecture series on Italian literature.

L'imbroglione ("The Cheat") was published by Bompiani in 1937. To avoid Fascist censorship, Moravia wrote mainly in the surrealist and allegoric genres; among the works is Il sogno del pigro ("The Dream of the Lazy"). But, the Fascist seizing of the second edition of La mascherata, in 1941, thereafter forced him to write under a pseudonym. That same year, he married the novelist Elsa Morante, whom he had met in 1936. They lived in Capri, where he wrote Agostino. After the Armistice of September 8, 1943, Moravia and Morante took refuge in Fondi, on the border of Ciociaria; the experience inspired La ciociara ("The Woman of Ciociara") (1958). In May 1944, after the liberation of Rome, Alberto Moravia returned. He began collaborating with Corrado Alvaro, writing for important newspapers such as Il Mondo and Il Corriere della Sera; the latter published his writing until his death.

At war's end, his popularity steadily increased, with works such as La Romana (The Woman of Rome) (1947), La Disubbidienza (Disobedience) (1948), L'Amore Coniugale e altri racconti ("Conjugal Love and other stories") (1949) and Il Conformista ("The Conformist") (1951). In 1952 he won the Premio Strega for I Racconti, and his novels began to be translated abroad. That same year "La Provinciale" was adapted to film by Mario Soldati; in 1954 Luigi Zampa directed La Romana, and in 1955 Gianni Franciolini directed I Racconti Romani ("The Roman Stories") (1954) a short collection that won the Marzotto Award. In 1953, Moravia founded the literary magazine Nuovi Argomenti ("New Arguments"), which featured Pier Paolo Pasolini among its editors. In the 1950s, he wrote prefaces to works such as Belli's 100 Sonnets, Brancati's Paolo il Caldo and Stendhal's Roman Walks. From 1957 onward, he also reviewed and criticised cinema for the weekly magazines L'Europeo and L'Espresso. His criticism is collected in the volume Al Cinema ("At the Cinema") (1975).

In 1960, Moravia published La Noia (Boredom or The Empty Canvas), the story of the troubled sexual relationship between a young, rich painter striving to find sense in his life and an easygoing girl in Rome. Becoming known as one of his most famous novels, it won the Viareggio Prize. An adaptation was filmed by Damiano Damiani in 1962. Another adaptation of the book is the basis of Cedric Kahn's film L'ennui ("The Ennui") (1998). Several films were based on his other novels: in 1960, Vittorio De Sica adapted La Ciociara, starring Sophia Loren; in 1963 Jean-Luc Godard filmed Il Disprezzo (Contempt); in 1964 Francesco Maselli filmed Gli Indifferenti (1964). In 1962 Moravia and Elsa Morante parted; he went to live with the young writer Dacia Maraini. Increasingly, he concentrated on theatre; in 1966, he, Maraini and Enzo Siciliano founded the company called "Il Porcospino", which staged works by Moravia, Maraini, Carlo Emilio Gadda, and others.

In 1967 Moravia visited China, Japan, and Korea. In 1971 he published the novel Io e lui ("I and He") [The Two of Us] about a screenwriter and his independent penis and the situations to which he thrusts them, and the essay Poesia e romanzo ("Poetry and Novel"). In 1972 he went to Africa, which inspired his work A quale tribù appartieni? ("Which Tribe Do You Belong To?"), published in the same year. His 1982 trip to Japan, including a visit to Hiroshima, inspired a series of articles for L'Espresso magazine about the atomic bomb. The same theme is in the novel L'Uomo che Guarda ("The Man Who Looks") (1985) and the essay L'Inverno Nucleare ("The Nuclear Winter"), including interviews with some contemporary principal scientists and politicians. The short story collection, La Cosa e altri racconti ("The Thing and Other Stories"), was dedicated to Carmen Llera, his new companion (forty-five years his junior). They married in 1986. In 1984 Moravia was elected to the European Parliament as member from the Italian Communist Party. His experiences at Strasbourg, which ended in 1988, are recounted in Il Diario Europeo ("The European Diary"). In 1985 he won the title of "European Personality". In September 1990, Alberto Moravia was found dead in the bathroom of his Lungotevere apartment, in Rome. In that year, Bompani published his autobiography, Vita di Moravia ("Life of Moravia").

Moral aridity, the hypocrisy of contemporary life, and the substantial incapability of people finding happiness in traditional ways such as love and marriage are the regnant themes in the works of Alberto Moravia. Usually, these conditions are pathologically typical of middle-class life; marriage, in particular, is the target of works such as Disobedience and L'amore coniugale ("Conjugal Love") (1949). Alienation is the theme in works such as Il disprezzo ("Contempt" or "A Ghost at Noon") (1954) and La noia ("The Empty Canvas") from the 1950s, despite observation from a rational-realistic perspective. Political themes are often present: an example is La Romana ("The Woman of Rome") (1947), the story of a prostitute entangled with the Fascist regime and with a network of conspirators. The extreme sexual realism in La noia ("The Empty Canvas") (1960) introduced the psychologically experimental works of the 1970s. Moravia's writing style was highly regarded for being extremely stark and unadorned, characterised by very elementary, common words within an elaborate syntax. A complex mood is established by mixing a proposition constituting the description of a single psychological observation mixed with another such proposition. In the later novels, the inner monologue is prominent.

We bring here three reviews on the excellent autobiography of Alberto Moravia. I strongly recommend to read the biography, as it is a perfect blending of autobiography, interview, and biography, a co-production of two great men – Moravia and Elkann who interviews him. Moravia is excellent in interviews, and that is why he has chosen to publish his biography in the form of an interview with Alain Elkann. Anyhow, he did not live to see his biography published as it was published on the day that he died. Alain Elkann (born March 23, 1950) is an American novelist, intellectual, and journalist. Currently, Elkann is the conductor of cultural programs on Italian television. A recurring theme in his books is the history of the Jews in Italy, their centrality to Italian history, and the relation between the Jewish faith and other religions. He was a collaborator of important Italian writers such as Alberto Moravia and Indro Montanelli. He wrote novels, essays and articles, among which a book he co-wrote with Italian Chief Rabbi Elio Toaff (former religious leader in Rome) called How to be a Jew and other works and a books of conversation with him called The Messiah and the Jews (Il Messia e gli ebrei). He has also published a book with Milan archbishop Carlo Maria Martini, as well as a book about Islam with Prince El Hassan bin Talal of Jordan. Elkann argues that all Jews should develop a strong connection to Israel. Born in a very rich family and married to a very rich wife, he could have been a "plaboy", like many of his contemporaries, but he has chosen to be a novelist and journalist, and has made a very important impact on the culture of the Western world.

Amazon - THE EXTRAORDINARY self-possession of Alberto Moravia can be traced to the many months he endured as a child and as a young man, confined to his bed, entirely alone, with nothing but books and his imagination to carry him through a long struggle against tuberculosis of the bone. He had no friends, no social life, no years at a university to connect him to the world. The result was a kind of unblinking gaze and acceptance of life which made him first one of the great novelists of the age, and finally one of the great memoirists. The Time of Indifference, his first novel (published this season by Steerforth), begun when he was only eighteen and published three years later, in 1929, changed the Italian literary landscape forever. That early fame never died and later novels - The Woman of Rome, The Conformist - only enhanced his reputation. Moravia put his life into his books but only now, with this unusual autobiography in the form of an interview with his friend, the writer Alain Elkann, is it possible to understand the literary use he made of the bourgeois world of his childhood in Rome, of his encounter with Fascism under Mussolini, of his months in hiding from the Germans in the mountains south of Rome, and of his marriages to two of the leading writers of his time - Elsa Morante and Dacia Maraini. I read of course the biography in Italian, but I bring here a comment by William Weaver, the translator into English, who writes that he knew Moravia well and the biography captures the sound and tone of his conversation - amused, full of life and incident, and above all honest about himself, Italy, and the world. This book was Moravia's last - the first copies came from the press on the day he died in 1990. It appears for the first time in English.

From Publishers Weekly

The first copies of this, Moravia's last book, came off the press in Italy 10 years ago, on the day he died. A unique interview-autobiography, the book offers a series of questions and answers that allowed the renowned Italian novelist to share his thoughts on the events that inspired his imagination. A material that is sure to be of special interest to academics and students of Italian literature and politics. Throughout, Moravia's style of speech parallels that of his prose. A intensely self-possessed, sprinkled with piercing analysis, striking observations, unconventional opinions and daring statements, all sustained by a self-assured nonchalance that never edges into arrogance. While the extended interview, conducted by Moravia's friend Elkann, contains typical musings on books, writers and personalities, Moravia clearly prefers to speak about his life. Censored both by Mussolini's fascist government and the Vatican, he countered by using allegory to indirectly present reality. The strength of this book is in the insight it provides into how Moravia's literary works were built upon his experiences. As a child and young man, Moravia suffered from tuberculosis. Confined to his bed with no friends or social life, only books and his imagination offered solace. At the age of 18, he began drafting his first novel, The Time of Indifference, perhaps the first European existentialist novel, which when published three years later was an immediate success. While the interview format of this autobiography proves monotonous, the author's innate delectation for storytelling and his craving for adventure, both real and imaginary, ensure a bevy of dynamic anecdotes.

From Booklist - Reviewed with Alberto Moravia's The Time of Indifference. Bonnie Smothers

Moravia's autobiography is in the form of an interview between the two writers, but it is more like the film-scripted conversation My Dinner with Andre in its well-thought-out questions and polished answers than an interview in a magazine. Moravia and Elkann knew each other well, which undoubtedly accounts for the charming civility that runs through this book. Moravia was Italy's leading man of letters during his lifetime. He died in 1990, on the day that finished copies of this book arrived from the printers. The book has not been available in English until now. In the U.S., we are more familiar with the name Moravia in film credits, as many of his novels were adapted for film, particularly by Bernardo Bertolucci, whose film based on a Moravia novel, The Conformist, was awarded an Academy Award for its screenplay. Reading this book is like taking an independent seminar in Italian culture with Moravia, a well-bred, sensitive man who embraced life passionately. He talks about the major Italian writers (Italo Calvino, Umberto Eco, Luigi Pirandello, his close friend Pier Paolo Pasolini, his lovers Elsa Morante and Dacia Maraini), painters (Giorgio de Chirico, Carlo Levi), politicians (Aldo Moro, Giuseppe Mazzini), and directors (De Sica, Rossellini, Visconti, Fellini) and slips in great anecdotes about these people and so many more. Moravia's first novel, Gli Indifferenti (The Time of Indifference), was first published in 1929, when Moravia was 21 years old, and established him as a world-class writer. The story is simple; it concerns the reactions of members of a bourgeois family to impending financial crisis. The mother, Mariagrazia, clutches her bored, unscrupulous lover, Leo, who sexually covets her daughter, Carla, though Mariagrazia's jealousy centers on her friend, Lisa, who chases Mariagrazia's son, Michele. Michele is the protagonist, if for no other reason than his actions bring the drama to its climax. When Michele discovers that Leo is seducing his sister, he wants to respond aggressively and decisively, but as usual, after an initial surge of energy, his resolve dissipates and indifference threatens to halt any action. Moravia's use of internal monologues is extremely clever and effective in conveying Michele's pain in particular. The novel itself displays elements of the dramatic play in its unity of time and setting, but one may agree with Moravia that its stronger achievement is its claim as the first existential novel. It's a very special treat for readers to have this first novel reissued with the autobiography. Moravia often discusses it in the autobiography; but, just reading the two together, first the novel and then immediately the autobiography, is so much fun and so very enlightening.

Alberto Moravia's Artistic Activism by Benjamin Ivry – a review of a new biography of Alberto Moravia by Rene de Ceccatty published by Flammarion in Paris.

Art is its own form of activism, we are reminded by a major new biography of the Italian novelist Alberto Moravia, published by les éditions Flammarion in Paris. Born Alberto Pincherle (his father was a Jewish architect) in 1907, Moravia was a cousin of Carlo and Nello Rosselli, the Jewish anti-fascist activists who were murdered in 1937 by French right wing extremists on Mussolini's orders, as described in "Carlo Rosselli: Socialist Heretic and Antifascist Exile" by Stanislaw Pugliese. Moravia's activism was expressed in novels like "The Conformist," (1951) which explores how educated and cultured Europeans can be so morally paralyzed as to allow events like the Rosselli murders to occur. His first novel, "The Time of Indifference," (1929) already scorned the suffocating stasis of Italian bourgeois life during the early years of Mussolini's reign. Long married to another writer, Elsa Morante, from a Modena Jewish family, Moravia was forced to publish anonymously as antisemitic laws developed in the 1930s. In 1968 his play, "Il Dio Kurt" (Kurt the God) revisited the theme of the Shoah, while Moravia's preface to a 1976 edition of Giacomo Debenedetti's remarkable "16/10/1943," about the deportation of Rome's Jews, expresses explicit "solidarity with the unfortunate people whom Kappler's SS arrested on that distant October morning in order to send them to their deaths in the death camp gas chambers." Throughout Moravia's career he had close alliances with Jewish authors, including the Frenchman Benjamin Crémieux, who died in Buchenwald; painter/writer Carlo Levi; and art historian Meyer Schapiro. When Moravia decided to create his memoirs, "Life of Moravia," in dialogue form, his chosen interlocutor was the Italian Jewish writer Alain Elkann. Although clueless on English language literature, referring to "Pickwick's Papers" by Dickens and the "intellectual couple" Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, this dense, indeed Proustian, new biography by critic and translator René de Ceccatty urgently deserves translation into English.

ANNE FRANK – AUTOBIOGRAPHY: HET ACHTER HUIS

I have chosen to finish this survey on the 36 best biographies that I have read on the 36 most prominent personalities, by an autobiography of a girl, a normal girl who had a tragic death, a girl like millions of other girls, some of them had similar tragic endings in the last decades in Syria, Africa or Yugoslavia. So, why do I include her together with personalities who have changed the world as Balzac, Chaplin, Gandhi, de Gaulle, Zola, Tolstoy, Chanel, or Miller? Exactly for the same reason, as Anne Frank, the Dutch little Girl, changed the world, unfortunately not in her lifetime that was too short, but her diary did change the world and is still changing the world. Millions of children and grownups have read Anne Franks' diary in the last decades. Her story has influenced the world, at least the humane parts of the world, not less than the humanistic writings of Zola and Tolstoy, and the non-violence ideology of Gandhi. I believe in personification. In all my courses, I gave lectures, case studies, and examples from plays and films on business ethics issues of specific persons, and it was much more impressive than studying the ethical books of Kant and Aristotle. A genuine diary of a small girl had an unforgettable impact on human rights than the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I know that for sure because of the story of another small girl – the Muslim Malala Yousafzai.

Anne Frank was transported to a concentration camp in August 2014, a few weeks after I was born. She was murdered with all her family (except her father) a few months later because she was Jewish. If the Nazis who killed her would have conquered Egypt I would have not been born, as my parents would have died, killed by the Nazis and their Arab collaborators. Fast forward to 2014, 70 years later, nothing has changed, at least in the Middle East. Malala Yousafzai, a Muslim girl of about the same age of Anne Frank in 1944 (she was born on July 12 1997 in Mingora, Pakistan), received the Nobel Peace Prize in 2014 for her struggle against the suppression of children and young people and for the right of all children to education. At the age of 11 Malala Yousafzai fought for girls' right to education, she wrote a blog for the BBC, and the New York Times made a documentary about her life. Yousafzai rose in prominence, giving interviews in print and on television. Because of that she has suffered an attack on her life by Taliban gunmen in 2012, the followers as the other Muslim fundamentalists of the Nazi totalitarian and murderous ideology. On the afternoon of October 9, 2012, Yousafzai boarded her school bus in the northwest Pakistani district of Swat. A gunman asked for her by name, then pointed a pistol at her and fired three shots. One bullet hit the left side of Yousafzai's forehead, travelled under her skin through the length of her face, and then went into her shoulder. In the days immediately following the attack, she remained unconscious and in critical condition, but later her condition improved enough for her to be sent to the Queen Elizabeth Hospital in Birmingham, England, for intensive rehabilitation. However, in her case, luckily she recovered from her wounds and became a leading advocate of girls' rights to education. The assassination attempt sparked a national and international outpouring of support for Yousafzai. Deutsche Welle wrote in January 2013 that Yousafzai may have become "the most famous teenager in the world." United Nations Special Envoy for Global Education Gordon Brown launched a UN petition in Yousafzai's name, demanding that all children worldwide be in school by the end of 2015; it helped lead to the ratification of Pakistan's first Right to Education Bill.

Annelies Marie Frank (12 June 1929 – February 1945) was a German-born diarist and writer. She is one of the most discussed Jewish victims of the Holocaust. Her diary, The Diary of a Young Girl, which documents her life in hiding during the German occupation of the Netherlands in World War II, is one of the world's most widely known books and has been the basis for several plays and films. Born in the city of Frankfurt, Germany, she lived most of her life in or near Amsterdam, the Netherlands. Born a German national, Frank lost her citizenship in 1941 and thus became stateless. The Frank family moved from Germany to Amsterdam in the early 1930s when the Nazis gained control over Germany. By May 1940, they were trapped in Amsterdam by the German occupation of the Netherlands. As persecutions of the Jewish population increased in July 1942, the family went into hiding in some concealed rooms behind a bookcase in the building where Anne's father worked. In August 1944, the group was betrayed and transported to concentration camps. Anne and her sister, Margot, were eventually transferred to Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where they died (probably of typhus) in February or March 1945, just weeks before the camp was liberated in April. Otto Frank, the only survivor of the family, returned to Amsterdam after the war to find that Anne's diary had been saved by one of the helpers, Miep Gies, and his efforts led to its publication in 1947. It was translated from its original Dutch version and first published in English in 1952 as The Diary of a Young Girl, and has since been translated into over 60 languages. The diary, which was given to Anne on her thirteenth birthday, chronicles her life from 12 June 1942 until 1 August 1944.

In July 1945, after the Red Cross confirmed the deaths of the Frank sisters, Miep Gies gave Otto Frank the diary and a bundle of loose notes that she had saved in the hope of returning them to Anne. Otto Frank later commented that he had not realized Anne had kept such an accurate and well-written record of their time in hiding. In his memoir, he described the painful process of reading the diary, recognizing the events described and recalling that he had already heard some of the more amusing episodes read aloud by his daughter. He saw for the first time the more private side of his daughter and those sections of the diary she had not discussed with anyone, noting, "For me it was a revelation ... I had no idea of the depth of her thoughts and feelings ... She had kept all these feelings to herself". Moved by her repeated wish to be an author, he began to consider having it published.

In her writing, Frank examined her relationships with the members of her family, and the strong differences in each of their personalities. She considered herself to be closest emotionally to her father, who later commented, "I got on better with Anne than with Margot, who was more attached to her mother. The reason for that may have been that Margot rarely showed her feelings and didn't need as much support because she didn't suffer from mood swings as much as Anne did." The Frank sisters formed a closer relationship than had existed before they went into hiding, although Anne sometimes expressed jealousy towards Margot, particularly when members of the household criticised Anne for lacking Margot's gentle and placid nature. As Anne began to mature, the sisters were able to confide in each other. In her entry of 12 January 1944, Frank wrote, "Margot's much nicer ... She's not nearly so catty these days and is becoming a real friend. She no longer thinks of me as a little baby who doesn't count." Frank frequently wrote of her difficult relationship with her mother, and of her ambivalence towards her. On 7 November 1942 she described her "contempt" for her mother and her inability to "confront her with her carelessness, her sarcasm and her hard-heartedness," before concluding, "She's not a mother to me." Later, as she revised her diary, Frank felt ashamed of her harsh attitude, writing: "Anne, is it really you who mentioned hate, oh Anne, how could you?" She came to understand that their differences resulted from misunderstandings that were as much her fault as her mother's, and saw that she had added unnecessarily to her mother's suffering. With this realization, Frank began to treat her mother with a degree of tolerance and respect.

The Frank sisters each hoped to return to school as soon as they were able, and continued with their studies while in hiding. Margot took a shorthand course by correspondence in Bep Voskuijl's name and received high marks. Most of Anne's time was spent reading and studying, and she regularly wrote and edited her diary entries. In addition to providing a narrative of events as they occurred, she wrote about her feelings, beliefs, and ambitions, subjects she felt she could not discuss with anyone. As her confidence in her writing grew, and as she began to mature, she wrote of more abstract subjects such as her belief in God, and how she defined human nature. Frank aspired to become a journalist, writing in her diary on Wednesday, 5 April 1944:

"I finally realized that I must do my schoolwork to keep from being ignorant, to get on in life, to become a journalist, because that's what I want! I know I can write ..., but it remains to be seen whether I really have talent ... And if I don't have the talent to write books or newspaper articles, I can always write for myself. But I want to achieve more than that. I can't imagine living like Mother, Mrs. van Daan and all the women who go about their work and are then forgotten. I need to have something besides a husband and children to devote myself to! ... I want to be useful or bring enjoyment to all people, even those I've never met. I want to go on living even after my death! And that's why I'm so grateful to God for having given me this gift, which I can use to develop myself and to express all that's inside me! When I write I can shake off all my cares. My sorrow disappears, my spirits are revived! But, and that's a big question, will I ever be able to write something great, will I ever become a journalist or a writer?" She continued writing regularly until her last entry of 1/8/44.

Frank's diary began as a private expression of her thoughts; she wrote several times that she would never allow anyone to read it. She candidly described her life, her family and companions, and their situation, while beginning to recognise her ambition to write fiction for publication. In March 1944, she heard a radio broadcast by Gerrit Bolkestein—a member of the Dutch government in exile, based in London—who said that when the war ended, he would create a public record of the Dutch people's oppression under German occupation. He mentioned the publication of letters and diaries, and Frank decided to submit her work when the time came. She began editing her writing, removing some sections and rewriting others, with a view to publication. Her original notebook was supplemented by additional notebooks and loose-leaf sheets of paper. She created pseudonyms for the members of the household and the helpers. The van Pels family became Hermann, Petronella, and Peter van Daan, and Fritz Pfeffer became Albert Düssel. In this edited version, she addressed each entry to "Kitty," a fictional character in Cissy van Marxveldt's Joop ter Heul novels that Anne enjoyed reading. Otto Frank used her original diary, known as "version A", and her edited version, known as "version B", to produce the first version for publication. He removed certain passages, most notably those in which Anne is critical of her parents (especially her mother), and sections that discussed Frank's growing sexuality. Although he restored the true identities of his own family, he retained all of the other pseudonyms.

Otto Frank gave the diary to the historian Annie Romein-Verschoor, who tried unsuccessfully to have it published. She then gave it to her husband Jan Romein, who wrote an article about it, titled "Kinderstem" ("A Child's Voice"), which was published in the newspaper Het Parool on 3 April 1946. He wrote that the diary "stammered out in a child's voice, embodies all the hideousness of fascism, more so than all the evidence at Nuremberg put together." His article attracted attention from publishers, and the diary was published in the Netherlands as Het Achterhuis (The Annex) in 1947, followed by five more printings by 1950. It was first published in Germany and France in 1950, and after being rejected by several publishers, was first published in the United Kingdom in 1952. The first American edition, published in 1952 under the title Anne Frank: The Diary of a Young Girl, was positively reviewed. The book was successful in France, Germany, and the United States, but in the United Kingdom it failed to attract an audience and by 1953 was out of print. Its most noteworthy success was in Japan, where it received critical acclaim and sold more than 100,000 copies in its first edition. In Japan, Anne Frank quickly was identified as an important cultural figure who represented the destruction of youth during the war.

A play by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett based upon the diary premiered in New York City on 5 October 1955, and later won a Pulitzer Prize for Drama. It was followed by the 1959 movie The Diary of Anne Frank, which was a critical and commercial success. Biographer Melissa Müller later wrote that the dramatization had "contributed greatly to the romanticizing, sentimentalizing and universalizing of Anne's story." Over the years the popularity of the diary grew, and in many schools, particularly in the United States, it was included as part of the curriculum, introducing Anne Frank to new generations of readers. In 1986 the Dutch Institute for War Documentation published the "Critical Edition" of the diary. It includes comparisons from all known versions, both edited and unedited. It includes discussion asserting the diary's authentication, as well as additional historical information relating to the family and the diary itself. Cornelis Suijk—a former director of the Anne Frank Foundation and president of the U.S. Center for Holocaust Education Foundation—announced in 1999 that he was in the possession of five pages that had been removed by Otto Frank from the diary prior to publication; Suijk claimed that Otto Frank gave these pages to him shortly before his death in 1980. The missing diary entries contain critical remarks by Anne Frank about her parents' strained marriage and discuss Frank's lack of affection for her mother. Some controversy ensued when Suijk claimed publishing rights over the five pages; he intended to sell them to raise money for his foundation. The Netherlands Institute for War Documentation, the formal owner of the manuscript, demanded the pages be handed over. In 2000 the Dutch Ministry of Education, Culture and Science agreed to donate US$300,000 to Suijk's Foundation, and the pages were returned in 2001. Since then, they have been included in new editions of the diary.

The diary has been praised for its literary merits. Commenting on Anne Frank's writing style, the dramatist Meyer Levin commended Frank for "sustaining the tension of a well-constructed novel", and was so impressed by the quality of her work that he collaborated with Otto Frank on a dramatization of the diary shortly after its publication. Meyer became obsessed with Anne Frank, which he wrote about in his autobiography The Obsession. The poet John Berryman called the book a unique depiction, not merely of adolescence but of the "conversion of a child into a person as it is happening in a precise, confident, economical style stunning in its honesty". In her introduction to the diary's first American edition, Eleanor Roosevelt described it as "one of the wisest and most moving commentaries on war and its impact on human beings that I have ever read." John F. Kennedy discussed Anne Frank in a 1961 speech, and said, "Of all the multitudes who throughout history have spoken for human dignity in times of great suffering and loss, no voice is more compelling than that of Anne Frank." In the same year, the Soviet writer Ilya Ehrenburg wrote of her: "one voice speaks for six million—the voice not of a sage or a poet but of an ordinary little girl."

As Anne Frank's stature as both a writer and humanist has grown, she has been discussed specifically as a symbol of the Holocaust and more broadly as a representative of persecution. Hillary Rodham Clinton, in her acceptance speech for an Elie Wiesel Humanitarian Award in 1994, read from Anne Frank's diary and spoke of her "awakening us to the folly of indifference and the terrible toll it takes on our young," which Clinton related to contemporary events in Sarajevo, Somalia and Rwanda. After receiving a humanitarian award from the Anne Frank Foundation in 1994, Nelson Mandela addressed a crowd in Johannesburg, saying he had read Anne Frank's diary while in prison and "derived much encouragement from it." He likened her struggle against Nazism to his struggle against apartheid, drawing a parallel between the two philosophies: "Because these beliefs are patently false, and because they were, and will always be, challenged by the likes of Anne Frank, they are bound to fail." Also in 1994, Václav Havel said "Anne Frank's legacy is very much alive and it can address us fully" in relation to the political and social changes occurring at the time in former Eastern Bloc countries.

Primo Levi suggested Anne Frank is frequently identified as a single representative of the millions of people who suffered and died as she did because "One single Anne Frank moves us more than the countless others who suffered just as she did but whose faces have remained in the shadows. Perhaps it is better that way; if we were capable of taking in all the suffering of all those people, we would not be able to live."^[79] In her closing message in Müller's biography of Anne Frank, Miep Gies expressed a similar thought, though she attempted to dispel what she felt was a growing misconception that "Anne symbolises the six million victims of the Holocaust", writing: "Anne's life and death were her own individual fate, an individual fate that happened six million times over. Anne cannot, and should not, stand for the many individuals whom the Nazis robbed of their lives ... But her fate helps us grasp the immense loss the world suffered because of the Holocaust."

Otto Frank spent the remainder of his life as custodian of his daughter's legacy, saying, "It's a strange role. In the normal family relationship, it is the child of the famous parent who has the honor and the burden of continuing the task. In my case the role is reversed." He recalled his publisher's explaining why he thought the diary has been so widely read, with the comment, "he said that the diary encompasses so many areas of life that each reader can find something that moves him personally". Simon Wiesenthal expressed a similar sentiment when he said that the diary had raised more widespread awareness of the Holocaust than had been achieved during the Nuremberg Trials, because "people identified with this child. This was the impact of the Holocaust, this was a family like my family, like your family and so you could understand this." In June 1999 Time magazine published a special edition titled "Time 100: The Most Important People of the Century". Anne Frank was selected as one of the "Heroes & Icons", and the writer, Roger Rosenblatt, described her legacy with the comment, "The passions the book ignites suggest that everyone owns Anne Frank, that she has risen above the Holocaust, Judaism, girlhood and even goodness and become a totemic figure of the modern world—the moral individual mind beset by the machinery of destruction, insisting on the right to live and question and hope for the future of human beings." He notes that while her courage and pragmatism are admired, her ability to analyze herself and the quality of her writing are the key components of her appeal. He writes, "The reason for her immortality was basically literary. She was an extraordinarily good writer, for any age, and the quality of her work seemed a direct result of a ruthlessly honest disposition."

A beloved classic since its initial publication in 1947, this vivid, insightful journal is a fitting memorial to the gifted Jewish teenager who died at Bergen-Belsen, Germany, in 1945. Born in 1929, Anne Frank received a blank diary on her 13th birthday, just weeks before she and her family went into hiding in Nazi-occupied Amsterdam. Her marvelously detailed, engagingly personal entries chronicle 25 trying months of claustrophobic, quarrelsome intimacy with her parents, sister, a second family, and a middle-aged dentist who has little tolerance for Anne's vivacity. The diary's universal appeal stems from its riveting blend of the grubby particulars of life during wartime (scant, bad food; shabby, outgrown clothes that can't be replaced; constant fear of discovery) and candid discussion of emotions familiar to every adolescent (everyone criticizes me, no one sees my real nature, when will I be loved?). Yet Frank was no ordinary teen: the later entries reveal a sense of compassion and a spiritual depth remarkable in a girl barely 15. Her death epitomizes the madness of the Holocaust, but for the millions who meet Anne through her diary, it is also a very individual loss. --Wendy Smith

From Publishers Weekly

This startling new edition of Dutch Jewish teenager Anne Frank's classic diary?written in an Amsterdam warehouse, where for two years she hid from the Nazis with her family and friends?contains approximately 30% more material than the original 1947 edition. It completely revises our understanding of one of the most moving and eloquent documents of the Holocaust. The Anne we meet here is much more sarcastic, rebellious and vulnerable than the sensitive diarist beloved by millions. She rages at her mother, Edith, smolders with jealous resentment toward her sister, Margot, and unleashes acid comments at her roommates. Expanded entries provide a fuller picture of the tensions and quarrels among the eight people in hiding. Anne, who died in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in March 1945, three months before her 16th birthday, candidly discusses her awakening sexuality in entries that were omitted from the 1947 edition by her father, Otto, the only one of the eight to survive the death camps. He died in 1980. This crisp, stunning translation provides an unvarnished picture of life in the "secret annex." In the end, Anne's teen angst pales beside her profound insights, her self-discovery and her unbroken faith in good triumphing over evil. Photos not seen by PW.

Imagine that someday you are remembered for all eternity at a very particular time and at a very particular age. You could be remembered forever as being 25 on September the 11th or you could be remembered as being 44 when JFK was shot. It seems awfully cruel for someone to be remembered between the ages of 13 to 15. Do you remember what you were like at that age? Would you want anyone to think of you as that old for as long as your name is remembered? Such is the fate of Anne Frank. Now, I never read this book when I was young. High schools, in my experience, tend to assign the play version of this story when they want to convey Anne Frank's tale. Anne tends to be remembered as the little girl who once wrote, "I still believe that people are really good at heart" in spite of her sufferings. So I should be forgiven for expecting this book to be the dewy-eyed suppositions of a saintly little girl. Instead, I found someone with verve, complexity, and a personality that I did not always particularly like. What I discovered, was the true Anne Frank. The diary of Anne begins when she is 13 years of age and the Jews are already wearing yellow stars in Amsterdam. Anne is your usual precocious girl, flirting with boys and being impudent when she can get away with it. When at last the time comes for the Franks to go into hiding (Margot Frank, Anne's sister, has been issued an order for her removal) they do so with another family, the Van Daans. In a small floor hidden above Otto Frank's old workplace the two families are aided by faithful friends and employees. Over the course of the diary we watch and listen through Anne's eyes as, for two years, the people in the attic are put through terrible deprivations and trials. There are good times and bad, but Anne is a singularly biased narrator and her observations must usually be taken with a grain of salt. After a while you become so comfortable with Anne's observations and voice that the final page of the narrative comes as a shock when the capture of Anne and her family is finally announced.

I recently had the mixed pleasure of finding and rereading my own diary from around the age of 14. After forcing myself to look through the occasional passage here and there I was forced to conclude that for her age, Anne is a marvelous writer. She has a sense of drama, tension, and narrative that is particularly enthralling. It's painful to think about what a great writer she could have been had she lived any longer. Honestly, the Anne I met in this book showed all the worst characteristics of her age. I found her detestation of her own mother to be particularly repugnant. Then I remembered... she's an early adolescent. Of course she hates her mother! Of course she's just simply awful a lot of the time. But you can see who she's becoming, and that's what makes the book so hard to get through. You can see her growth and her character. You know that she's learning and trying to understand what it means to be a human being during World War II. It's all the more awful that this would be the age she was preserved at. The book is remarkable on so many levels. I think young teenage girls will understand Anne's plight intrinsically. Who couldn't? Who doesn't remember the rocky years of 13-15? The need for attention? The sobbing for no particular reason? By the end of the diary, Anne becomes far more philosophical. She no longer records the family's every move and action. Instead, she ponders questions like whether or not young people are lonelier than old people. Or what it means to be good. Though you may not like the protagonist of this book at all times, you come to understand and sympathize with her.

She is a remarkable author, all the more so when you consider that this diary was written for her eyes alone at the time. If I could require kids to read something in school, I think this would top the list. It probably remains the best Holocaust children's book in existence today.

Anne's profoundly powerful words and insights covered a range of topics and emotions during her two years in hiding. These few excerpts demonstrate why Anne Frank is more relevant than ever today.

On Deportations

"Our many Jewish friends and acquaintances are being taken away in droves. The Gestapo is treating them very roughly and transporting them in cattle cars to Westerbork, the big camp in Drenthe to which they're sending all the Jews....If it's that bad in Holland, what must it be like in those faraway and uncivilized places where the Germans are sending them? We assume that most of them are being murdered. The English radio says they're being gassed."

- October 9, 1942

On Nazi Punishment of Resisters

"Have you ever heard the term 'hostages'? That's the latest punishment for saboteurs. It's the most horrible thing you can imagine. Leading citizens--innocent people--are taken prisoner to await their execution. If the Gestapo can't find the saboteur, they simply grab five hostages and line them up against the wall. You read the announcements of their death in the paper, where they're referred to as 'fatal accidents'."

- October 9, 1942

"All college students are being asked to sign an official statement to the effect that they 'sympathize with the Germans and approve of the New Order.' Eighty percent have decided to obey the dictates of their conscience, but the penalty will be severe. Any student refusing to sign will be sent to a German labor camp."

- May 18, 1943

On Writing and Her Diary

"Mr. Bolkestein, the Cabinet Minister, speaking on the Dutch broadcast from London, said that after the war a collection would be made of diaries and letters dealing with the war. Of course, everyone pounced on my diary."

- March 29, 1944

"When I write, I can shake off all my cares."

- April 5, 1944

Describing her Despair

"I've reached the point where I hardly care whether I live or die. The world will keep on turning without me, and I can't do anything to change events anyway. I'll just let matters take their course and concentrate on studying and hope that everything will be all right in the end."

- February 3, 1944

"...but the minute I was alone I knew I was going to cry my eyes out. I slid to the floor in my nightgown and began by saying my prayers, very fervently. Then I drew my knees to my chest, lay my head on my arms and cried, all huddled up on the bare floor. A loud sob brought me back down to earth..."

- April 5, 1944

On Her Old Country, Germany

"Fine specimens of humanity, those Germans, and to think I'm actually one of them! No, that's not true, Hitler took away our nationality long ago. And besides, there are no greater enemies on earth than the Germans and Jews."

- October 9, 1942

On Still Believing

"It's a wonder I haven't abandoned all my ideals, they seem so absurd and impractical. Yet I cling to them because I still believe, in spite of everything, that people are truly good at heart. It's utterly impossible for me to build my life on a foundation of chaos, suffering and death. I see the world being slowly transformed into a wilderness, I hear the approaching thunder that, one day, will destroy us too, I feel the suffering of millions. And yet, when I look up at the sky, I somehow feel that everything will change for the better, that this cruelty too shall end, that peace and tranquility will return once more"

Anne Frank's Quotes:

"How wonderful it is that nobody need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world."

"Think of all the beauty still left around you and be happy."

"I can shake off everything as I write; my sorrows disappear, my courage is reborn."

"I've found that there is always some beauty left -- in nature, sunshine, freedom, in yourself; these can all help you."

"No one has ever become poor by giving."

"Parents can only give good advice or put them on the right paths, but the final forming of a person's character lies in their own hands."

"I don't think of all the misery, but of the beauty that still remains."

"Because paper has more patience than people. "

"The best remedy for those who are afraid, lonely or unhappy is to go outside, somewhere where they can be quite alone with the heavens, nature and God. Because only then does one feel that all is as it should be and that God wishes to see people happy, amidst the simple beauty of nature. As long as this exists, and it certainly always will, I know that then there will always be comfort for every sorrow, whatever the circumstances may be. And I firmly believe that nature brings solace in all troubles."

"Look at how a single candle can both defy and define the darkness."

"People can tell you to keep your mouth shut, but that doesn't stop you from having your own opinion."

"Whoever is happy will make others happy."

“In the long run, the sharpest weapon of all is a kind and gentle spirit.”

“Where there's hope, there's life. It fills us with fresh courage and makes us strong again.”

“In spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart.”

“I don't want to have lived in vain like most people. I want to be useful or bring enjoyment to all people, even those I've never met. I want to go on living even after my death!”

“We all live with the objective of being happy; our lives are all different and yet the same.”

“Women should be respected as well! Generally speaking, men are held in great esteem in all parts of the world, so why shouldn't women have their share? Soldiers and war heroes are honored and commemorated, explorers are granted immortal fame, martyrs are revered, but how many people look upon women too as soldiers?...Women, who struggle and suffer pain to ensure the continuation of the human race, make much tougher and more courageous soldiers than all those big-mouthed freedom-fighting heroes put together!”

“Although I'm only fourteen, I know quite well what I want, I know who is right and who is wrong. I have my opinions, my own ideas and principles, and although it may sound pretty mad from an adolescent, I feel more of a person than a child, I feel quite independent of anyone.”

“A quiet conscience makes one strong!”

“Human greatness does not lie in wealth or power, but in character and goodness. People are just people, and all people have faults and shortcomings, but all of us are born with a basic goodness.”

“I think a lot, but I don't say much.”

“Memories mean more to me than dresses.”

“There's only one rule you need to remember: laugh at everything and forget everybody else! It sounds egotistical, but it's actually the only cure for those suffering from self-pity.”

“As long as this exists, this sunshine and this cloudless sky, and as long as I can enjoy it, how can I be sad?”

“You can be lonely even when you are loved by many people, since you are still not anybody's one and only.”

“Those who have courage and faith shall never perish in misery”

“Earning happiness means doing good and working, not speculating and being lazy. Laziness may look inviting, but only work gives you true satisfaction.”

“But feelings can't be ignored, no matter how unjust or ungrateful they seem.”

The best 36 biographies of the most admired personalities, that I have started reading: Shai Agnon, Woody Allen, Ingmar Bergman, Ludwig van Beethoven, Bertolt Brecht, Miguel de Cervantes, Winston Churchill, Leonardo da Vinci/Eine Kindheitserinnerung des Leonardo da Vinci by Sigmund Freud, Michelangelo Buonarroti, Alfred Dreyfus, Bob Dylan, Ernest Hemingway, Heinrich Heine, Albert Einstein, Isaac Newton, Napoleon, Moliere, Marcel Pagnol, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Rothschild, William Shakespeare, George Bernard Shaw, August Strindberg, The Brothers Mann \(Heinrich and Thomas\), Tennessee Williams, Yisrael Meir Lau, Steve Jobs, Lee Iacocca, Lorenzo da Ponte, Marcel Proust, Augustus, Henri IV, Goethe, Elias Canetti, Yitzhak Navon. I am very eager to read them, but I really don't know what to do first – Write this book, that started as an update of my CV, and reached 1,500 pages+, as every day I have new ideas. Expand my book "Ethics Pays" to include all the geographical and statistical details. Issue an expanded/updated version (in Hebrew) of my book "Social, Economic and Governmental Justice: Essays and Articles" to include all the new essays and articles that I have written since the first edition, but also the Ethical Code of Sibat/Ministry of Defense, new case studies, courses, etc. Issue an expanded/updated version (in Hebrew) that will focus on the essays and articles written on personal, literature, and current topics, including my diary, correspondence, poetry and satires, possibly with an addendum in English, French, Spanish and Ladino, and other languages. Publish my two children books in Hebrew and possibly other languages of – Ijiko/Jungle book with illustrations of Elena Gat, and Rain Fairy with illustrations of Joseph Cory. Publish the two versions of my plays in Hebrew – Nelly Doron, Nelly's Choice. Write, if I receive an adequate funding, two academic books: The Future of Capitalism in a Sustainable Society in English, The Great Recession of 2007-2010 in Hebrew. All these books in a format of ebook and printed book, published by well-known publishers or self-published by me on my website, as well as websites of leading organizations as Transparency International and Israeli organizations, Israeli and international universities (more than a thousand of them have already my former printed books), as I published my ebook on Social Justice a few years ago.

Subsequently, to continue reading novels, biographies, plays, non-fiction, poetry, professional books in the ten languages that I master and possibly in the 40 other languages with reading capabilities, as explained in this book. Watching every year dozens of plays, fifty lectures on many topics, hundreds of films, festivals, visiting new countries, attending cultural events in Europe and the US. What is more important – write this book or continue reading the biographies of Emile Zola, Churchill, Proust, Hemingway, Renoir, Allen? Write the geographic book or visit new countries, with cruises on the Mississippi, the Danube, the Volga? I can chose to take it easy as I was forced to do because of health problems – read interesting novels in Hebrew, English or French, or opting for the more difficult alternative – reading in difficult languages (for me) – Russian, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Polish, Swedish, Esperanto, Dutch and Haitian. I can do a bit of everything, continue to read 500 books in parallel or read one book at a time, or 10-15 books each day of a fortnight, and even so divide the day between difficult languages, non-fiction, plays, easy languages, going often to the theater, watching every week a lecture. Or just spend hours in trying to decide what to do, while in the meantime I don't progress in anything, reading newspapers, watching TV? So many dilemmas! At least I am not bored as everything interests me – writing in so many styles, reading in so many languages, watching classic plays and films. Not forgetting an initiative of my students who want to hear my courses and are doing their utmost to find a way with the university in which I could resume my teaching activities...

JACQUES CORY – AN ALTERNATIVE BIOGRAPHY – FRENCH CULTURE & SCIENCE

It is amazing how prolific is the French mind, and what gigantic was the French contribution to the world civilization on most of its facets – literature – novels, poetry, drama; arts – painting, sculpture, architecture; films – technology, directors, actors; sociology, philosophy, travel, science, humor, history, medicine, transportation, psychology, business, ethics, liberte – egalite – fraternite, humanism, democracy, law, welfare, photography, fashion, French cuisine and wines.. In my book I try to be cosmopolitan and fair as much as possible to all cultures and civilizations, but as my origins are in the European culture, I am Jewish and Israeli, and my two other leading cultures and mother tongues are French and Ladino – I put a special emphasis on all those – not because they are the best but because I know them most. I have dealt in this book very much on European culture, mainly languages and literature, Jewish and Israeli topics, quite a lot on Ladino culture, and also much on French culture. In order to give a more balanced account of the facets which compose my personality, I have chosen to devise in this chapter an alternative life, not because I don't like my present life, which is excellent in all aspects and I would not change it at all (not even the mishaps that gave me a push to innovate in new aspects), but because I would like to explore virtually what could have been my life if I have lived in France, the country I love most after Israel (j'ai deux amours - mon pays et Paris – like Josephine Baker I have two loves my country and Paris), in the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century – the era I like most, and not in the second half of the 20th century and first half of the 21st century. As an Epicurean I show little interest in participating in the politics of the day, since doing so leads to trouble. In my life I advocated seclusion. This principle is epitomized by the phrase lathe biōsas (λάθε βιώσας), meaning "live in obscurity", "get through life without drawing attention to yourself", i.e., live without pursuing glory or wealth or power, but anonymously. However, in an alternative life I would opt to draw more attention on myself, not being a politician or a very important personality, but living in Paris, the center of the world, in the light, but not the spotlight. However, in this alternative life I would not seek power, and not meet the most powerful people of my times, be a leader of masses or a manager of thousands of people.

I wish therefore to have lived in the nineteenth century in France, being born on the date that Rachel was born - in February 21, 1821, a couple of months before Napoleon died on May 5 in Saint Helena, I will not have any problem in travelling all over the world, and meet whomever I chose with the full cooperation of the people I'll meet. A kind of "Back to the Past", travelling through time, without having an opportunity to change the course of events, as killing young Hitler or Stalin in order to prevent catastrophes. I would prefer to live as a grown-up, let's say 30 years old, healthy, wealthy, and I will remain at this age until I disappear, let's say on October 28, 1929, a day before the Crash, as I wouldn't want to experience the atrocities of World War II, the Holocaust, and the Great Depression. My uncle lived for more than 104 years, so 108 years is not too much to ask for, at least for my virtual biography. Why not choosing an alternative life starting on the French Revolution of 1789, living through the glorious days of Napoleon, and throughout most of the 19th century until close to its end? The reason is very simple – as I loathe violence I would not want to live the bloody times of the Revolution with all its decapitations, and all the public acclaim of those monstrosities, the "glorious" and completely purposeless wars of Napoleon with millions of casualties. I know that I'll have to experience in my lifetime the wars of 1870/1871, the First World War with millions of casualties in 1914/1918, the Crimean War of 1853/1856, revolutions of 1830, 1848, the Parisian commune of 1871, colonial wars, etc. But after World War I the French people thought that it is the last war, that it had returned to France Alsace and Lorraine, that the warmongers empires of Germany, Russia and Austro-Hungary have ceased to exist and were replaced by republics, and that a new era of democracy, social consciousness, flourishing economy, equality for women, has started.

Anyhow, this is what they thought, and that is why I have chosen to quit this alternative life before the disillusion of the Great Depression, Nazism, Fascism, Stalinism, the Spanish Civil War, the wars in Asia and in Africa, Anschluss, Munich, World War II, Hiroshima, Nagasaki...

I would chose to have an agnostic, and intellectual Parisian family that had a "literary salon", and I intend to host in my salon all the who's who in literature, painting, music, science, etc. from 1821 to 1929. I chose to live with the same wife, children, and grandchildren that I have now, as there can't be better ones in the whole world. As I chose to live in the 19th century I don't have the dilemma of living or not in Israel, as this country did not exist, nor would I be specific of my religion – I want to be agnostic, so it really does not matter from which religion came my forefathers. I chose Paris as it was in this century from the twenties of the 19th century to the twenties of the 20th century – the center of the world, at least the cultural world, it was the time of La Belle Epoque, the roaring twenties, all the who's who in painting, the most modern American authors, it seemed that Paris was a magnet to all the world's creative imagination. In this alternative life I would experience an immense progress and change in all the fields – technology, science, architecture, arts, literature, transportation, democracy, with the changes from the absolute monarchy of the Bourbons, Louis-Philippe, the Second Republic, Napoleon III, the Third Republic, rise of socialism, falling down of empires, even communism in USSR. My interest would be primarily in my fields of occupation and meeting prominent people in those fields, but not meeting politicians, unless needed for my work. However, it goes without saying that I would be a Dreyfusard, anti-racist, anti-colonialist, anti-violence unless in legitimate defense, anti-terrorism, anti-slavery, anti-isolationism, democrat, republican, multi-cultural, cosmopolitan, I would vote for humane capitalism parties somewhere in the left, I would favor globalization without exploiting weaker nations, without any active involvement in politics, and if I would meet politicians, kings, and Emperors, I would only ask them – WHY?

Why has Napoleon missed the opportunity to become the best ruler ever – if he would have chosen to become a democratic leader of France, caring for the welfare of his people, without conquering most of Europe, not even one country, without becoming a despot, causing the death of millions, the subjugation of tens of millions. Don't do harm would say an Epicurean, an ethicist, a doctor, you came from a poor family, why all those airs de grandeur, emperor – you want to compete with the corrupted Bourbons? The French people made a revolution to get rid of them, and received a worse tyrant. And the same applies to Napoleon III, to the Kaisers of Germany, to the Tzars of Russia, the Emperors of Austro-Hungaria, the absolute and obsolete kings in Europe and all over the world. And Queen Victoria, the "benevolent" mother, who ruled the "democratic" UK (without universal suffrage, the right of voting to women and many segments of the population), with a neoliberal economy, with extreme poverty, with child labor, with very long working hours: builders worked 64 hours a week in summer and 52 in winter, while domestic servants worked 80 hour weeks, with a horrendous colonialist policy enslaving half of the world. She retained a substantial influence in spite of the so-called democratic government, but even if not - she should have resigned, ashamed of the horrible conditions of her people as opposed to the luxury of her life. Monarchs who did almost nothing for their citizens, usurping power, while their people starved to death, with an idle aristocracy, who needed them? But the same criticism goes to presidents, prime ministers and ministers in totalitarian states and in semi-democratic or almost democratic states, with the same social and economic problems, warmonger policies, colonialism, racism, without real liberte-egalite-fraternite and humanism...

In this alternative life, I would not work in business, nor be a politician, and of course I would not want to work in the colonies, but rather be an author, an academic, and a scientist – as an author I would invent a new form of literature, books that will combine on the same topic – a novel, poetry, drama, biography, correspondence, articles, and non fiction, possibly in several languages, similar to the scope of this book. Victor Hugo wrote excellent poetry, drama, novels, biographies, non-fiction and correspondence, but he never wrote a book that comprises all those form of literature together, and he wrote exclusively in French. This new form of literature can have a tremendous impact as it will chose the best form of expression for every topic of the book and the best language for every segment. In the nineteenth century intellectual people knew at least five to seven languages, if not more – French, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Spanish, and their mother tongue – one of those or Russian, Dutch, Polish, Swedish, Portuguese, Romanian, Czech. Even in the twentieth century there are many intellectuals who are polyglots and who speak perfectly the languages that I speak only basically. In the twenty first century people know even less languages (at least until they adopt my recommendations on studying at least 5 languages at school), but they can translate automatically in an ebook texts in foreign languages, and introduce thousands of links to such books, complementing the forms of expressions with videos, films, songs, theater, lectures, photos, paintings, music, philosophy, as I have done in this book. All this in the tradition of the Renaissance Men, Encyclopedic Knowledge, and Polymaths of the past. I am not speaking of geniuses as Plato, Aristotle, Kant, Hegel, Bell, and of course Leonardo da Vinci, who were known to have an encyclopedic knowledge and excelled in all fields. I prefer to refer to one "contemporary" Camille Saint-Saens \(1835-1921\) who was such a polymath. He lived almost exactly as in my alternative life (born 14 years after 1821 and dying 8 years before 1929), and we could have been very good friends.

Berlioz made his well-known bon mot about Saint-Saëns, "He knows everything, but lacks inexperience" ("Il sait tout, mais il manque d'inexpérience"). Saint-Saëns was a musical prodigy, making his concert debut at the age of ten, and was one of the best pianist and organist of his time. But he was also one of the best composers of all times, excelling in all forms of music – concerti, symphonies, operas, chamber music, vocal music, ballets, short pieces, songs, he was a pioneer in recorded music and music for films, he wrote music for plays, sonatas, piano, organ, violin, cello, wind instruments, religious music - Oratorio, Requiem... His best-known works include Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso (1863), the Second Piano Concerto (1868), the First Cello Concerto (1872), Danse macabre (1874), the opera Samson and Delilah (1877), the Third Violin Concerto (1880), the Third \("Organ"\) Symphony (1886) and The Carnival of the Animals (1887). Saint-Saens was also a prolific writer and produced poems, a play, critical essays, and works on science, astronomy, travel and history. Saint-Saëns was outstanding in many subjects. In addition to his musical prowess, he distinguished himself in the study of French literature, Latin and Greek, divinity, and mathematics. His enthusiasms included philosophy, archaeology and astronomy, of which, particularly the last, he remained a talented amateur all his life. If I would not have to work for my living I believe that in a century or so I could master many fields of literature and science and could contribute to society intellectually with books encompassing all the forms of literature in many languages that would describe in a perfect way the biography of a personality, a novel on a whole period, as the Iliad, the Odyssey, Les Misérables, A la recherche du temps perdu, Les Rougon Macquart, La comedie humaine, Les hommes de bonne volonte, Don Quijote, Shakespearean History Plays, War and Peace, Les rois maudits, etc.

I started my academic career at the age of 60 and it lasted only 10 years, but imagine that I would have an academic career that would last a century in humanistic, social, and scientific topics, how many students would I have the privilege to teach, in how many languages, on how many topics, combining in a multi-disciplinary approach literature and science. I have achieved excellent results when I combined in my teaching – literature, ethics, history, philosophy, films, plays, novels, economics, business, politics, sociology, in several languages. I have noticed that the impact on the students and the readers is much stronger if it encompasses several modes of expression, in group dynamics with cases & role playing, and is not confined to a frontal lecture or even worse - reading from notes, from a book, making a presentation with Power Point. When I lecture I let the stream of consciousness guide me and bring me every time to a different direction, making my lectures more interesting, more spontaneous, more genuine, never the same but always with the same impact and the same topic. If I could be a polymath academic I would make research more accessible to ordinary people, approximately right and not precisely wrong as many academic papers that I read. Academic accuracy is so strenuous, rigorous (and boring) that it misses its point in many cases. I might agree that in sciences you have to be very rigorous but why be so in ethics, philosophy, political sciences, literature, and economics which is not a science at all and does not have mathematical rules as many economists would like to maintain.

In my alternative life I would like to be an academic, a professor teaching the combined three kinds of curriculums: 1. Social Sciences encompassing economics, political sciences, sociology, psychology and anthropology in a multi-disciplinary approach. 2. Humanistics encompassing literature, arts, history, philosophy, languages. 3. Sciences encompassing physics, chemistry, mathematics, biology, and engineering. I would like to encompass in a Renaissance way all those topics during a century or so and make a substantial contribution to humankind. I have already discussed earlier on my multi-disciplinary contribution to literature and Humanistics that would encompass in the same books all the forms of expression, making the book much more captivating and the message much more convincing. In Social Sciences I would revert the modern tendency to specialize in restricted segments of economics or sociology – while my view is that there is a complete harmony and cohesiveness between all the Social Sciences, especially as I think that none of them is a science and that psychology rules most of the Social Sciences and especially economics and political sciences. My contribution would be in finding the optimal way of governing a nation – to refine the Scandinavian model which did not exist in the nineteenth century (Ibsen emphasizes on that), to found all those subjects on ethics, freedom, equality, and fraternity, social cohesiveness, along the lines of the Second Republic movement and of all my books on business ethics, globalization, social justice and social responsibility.

In Sciences I would like to make a contribution in medicine – finding a cure to cancer, like Louis Pasteur, who is renowned for his discoveries of the principles of vaccination, microbial fermentation and pasteurization. He is remembered for his remarkable breakthroughs in the causes and preventions of diseases, and his discoveries have saved countless lives ever since. He reduced mortality from puerperal fever, and created the first vaccines for rabies and anthrax. His medical discoveries provided direct support for the germ theory of disease and its application in clinical medicine. He is best known to the general public for his invention of the technique of treating milk and wine to stop bacterial contamination, a process now called pasteurization. He is regarded as one of the three main founders of bacteriology, together with Ferdinand Cohn and Robert Koch, and is popularly known as the "father of microbiology". I hope that this ambition does not sound like the vain talk of Beauty Queens who want to make World Peace...

I am afraid that many readers would not like the whole book and would ridicule this chapter of alternative biography, especially those readers who would not like my philosophy of life, my business ethics, my literature preferences, who would be offended of being called peacelovings, ultra-Orthodox, fundamentalists, backwards, my origins, anti-Semites and anti-Israelis. Actually, many people could be offended by this book – Scandinavians who receive the best compliments but I criticize also their leaders' attitude towards Israelis, the right-wing Israelis who may be content that I attack so harshly Islamic fundamentalists and peacelovings, that I think that it would be useless to dismantle the Israelis settlements, but would not like how I attack as well their party and their neoliberal ideology. Peacelovings and Peace Now activists, so many of them are intellectuals, writers and academics, would call this book the ultimate expression of a dilettante, avec des airs de grandeur – nefsi kebir – presumptuous, and would not pay attention to the humane, social, and anti-racist basis of this book. Israeli patriots would call me cosmopolitan with very loose Israeli roots, who reads only superficially Hebrew literature and prefer to read French, English and Portuguese literature, because he probably thinks that the Hebrew literature is not good enough. But I have reiterated time and again how I and my family have profound roots in Israel, that I have never left it, although I had plenty of opportunities (and reasons) even for a few years as most of my friends did in Sabbaticals and alike. I have stayed in Israel during the Six Day War although I had a job in Switzerland, when our lives were all in jeopardy, and in spite of the unfair conduct of the government towards the youngs, immigrants, underprivileged. I am staying in Israel now despite the failures of Likud governments in most of their policies, without security, with an outrageous neoliberal economy, corruption, and worldwide isolation. On the contrary one of the purposes of this book is to find ways to combat this unjustified isolation. But this author, they would say would like in an alternative biography to be French, not even Jewish. He would like to meet Camille Saint-Saens and Victor Hugo, instead of wanting to be a Zionist in the earlier days of Zionism or a colon in Palestine, also in the nineteenth century.

As a matter of fact – this chapter of an alternative biography is a fantasy, as of course it would not happen, but what point is it to have a phantasy on a more of the same basis? Most of my cultural approach and foundations, my cosmopolitan background, my predilections, would culminate in this alternative biography. Why is it so bad to prefer in an alternative life to contribute much more to society in all its forms – social, intellectual, scientific? To meet in order to promote my ideas and learn alternate ideas the most important personalities of this century in all the fields of interest that I have? I have already mentioned that there are people who prefer to die young as shahids and meet 72 virgins in heaven. I have already mentioned that I prefer to read 72 novels, 72 plays, 72 biographies, etc. in this world or in the other world (if it exists) where I could meet 720 prominent authors, 72 prominent personalities, as 72 virgins is too boring and also... exhausting, while reading books, watching plays and films, meeting interesting people, and visiting new countries is never tiring and always exhilarating. This is exactly what I consider in my alternative biography, on top of that I would like to make a much more striking contribution to humankind to the modest (some would say negligible) contribution that I made in this world – although I believe that being a good citizen paying all his taxes, serving his country, a good husband, good father and grandfather, good boss, good in my business and academic career, on top of that writing so many books, is quite an achievement, not as important as in my alternative biography, but much more meaningful than most of the lives of the people I know.

Most of all, I would like to meet the interesting authors and personalities, some of them mentioned above: Ibsen, Strindberg, d'Annunzio, Nietzsche, Twain, Kipling, Conan Doyle, Wilde, Shaw, Jerome, Tagore, Freud, Thomas Mann, Heinrich Mann, Zola, Chekhov, Lorca, Mallarmé, Wells, Gide, Gorky, France, Lawrence, Joyce, James, Kafka, Einstein, Apollinaire, Scott Fitzgerald, Pirandello, Hasek, Tolstoy, Proust, Lewis, O'Casey, Hemingway, Brecht, Woolf, Faulkner, Remarque, Blasco Ibanez, Dos Passos, Somerset Maugham, London, Maupassant, Gilbert and Sullivan, Dostoevsky, Verne, Dumas pere et fils, George Eliot, Disraeli, Lewis Carroll, Rimbaud, Flaubert, Marx, Dickens, Hugo, Gautier, Turgenev, Darwin, Baudelaire, Thackeray, Gaskell, Melville, Poe, the sisters Brontë, the brothers Goncourt, Balzac, Andersen, Gogol, Lermontov, Stendhal, Pushkin, Mickiewicz, Musset, Vigny, Goethe, Scott, Manzoni, Heine, Coopert, Shelley and Byron just before their death, Machado de Assis, Herzl after having published Altneuland, Shai Agnon after having published some of his stories, Eça de Queiroz, Martí, de Pereda, Galdos, Zorilla, and many of the other authors mentioned in my Survey on Modern Literature, from Europe, America, Asia, Africa, Australia, Arabs, Jews...

And I would want to meet until 1929 at least as youngsters Jean-Paul Sartre, André Malraux, Jean Anouilh, read the first novels - Climats, Les silences du Colonel Bramble, and biographies – George Sand, Disraeli, Shelley, by Andre Maurois, read Thérèse Desqueyroux by François Mauriac, Antigone by Jean Cocteau, Topaze and Marius by Marcel Pagnol. I would want to meet also political and social authors who were themselves outstanding personalities: first of all the authors on the Dreyfus Affair: Georges Clemenceau who wrote Des Juges – Affaire Dreyfus, and also La mellee sociale, Jean Jaures who wrote Les Preuves – L’Affaire Dreyfus, and also Vers la republique sociale, Colonel/General Georges Picquart who wrote L’Affaire Picquart devant la cour de cassation, Charles Peguy – one of my favorite authors who wrote L’Argent (that I read) and Cahiers, and of course Emile Zola – who wrote L’Affaire Dreyfus – La verite en marche. Probably, the people that I would meet would like to meet me also, because of my reputation, my salon, my donations, my inventions, my books, even Kafka... I would like to meet prominent film directors and actors as David Wark Griffith, Charles Chaplin, Mack Sennett, Mauritz Stiller, Ernst Lubitsch, Buster Keaton, Douglas Fairbanks, Erich von Stroheim, Greta Garbo, Cecil B. DeMille, etc., theater actresses as Rachel and Sarah Bernhard and actors, famous composers and musicians, as Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Brahms, Schumann, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Tchaikowsky, Offenbach, Verdi, Puccini, Rossini, Mahler, Gounod, Saint-Saens, Bizet, Paganini, Debussy, Ravel, Berlioz, Arthur Rubinstein, etc., famous sculptors as Rodin, architects and city planners as Le Corbusier, Gustave Eiffel, and the Baron Haussmann, painters as Delacroix, Courbet, Honoré Daumier, Claude Monet, Manet, Edgar Degas, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Camille Pissarro, Pablo Picasso, Toulouse-Lautrec, Gauguin, Seurat, Van Gogh (and buy from him 100 paintings), Turner, etc. I would like to meet as well the most prominent scientists and inventors of my "generations" – Einstein, Marie Curie, Niepce, Daguerre, Melies, Becquerel, Foucault, Pasteur, Breguet, Michelin, Bleriot, Renault... I would like to be wealthy in order not to be worried by pecunary considerations, but not for living an extravagant life and build golden castles in the desert, just to live as I live now in the upper Middle Class. To have enough money to do what I like, write what I like without worrying if the book would be published or not, as I could publish my books on my own, finance my inventions on my own, without having to live on the meager university's grants and salaries. I would like to travel all over the world, meet Livingstone in Africa, visit India, Japan, and China, South America, all Europe and the US, Canada, Philippines, Indonesia, South Africa, Egypt, Morocco, Algeria, Australia, Nigeria, and Palestine.

I have written at length in this chapter on my literature achievements in my alternative life, and in this book on my economic/socio-capitalistic ideology which would have a central role in my alternative life, but as I aspire to scientific achievements in my alternative life in France, I would like to emphasize now more on this topic, as in this century some of the most important inventions were discovered in Paris/France, and I bring here the most important French inventions in the last 2 centuries, while most of inventions in modern times were in US & UK.

Penicillin (1896) - In 1896, the French medical student Ernest Duchesne originally discovered the antibiotic properties of Penicillium, however his research went mostly unnoticed. It took until 1928 for Scottish biologist Alexander Fleming to re-discovered penicillin. Penicillin enabling doctors to fight bacterial infections, save lives, and cure syphilis, gangrene and tuberculosis.

Modern dentistry by Pierre Fauchard (father of modern dentistry, early eighteenth century). Modern Cataract surgery by Jacques Daviel in 1748 (even if early cataract surgery already existed in the antiquity). Here I would like to mention that when I had my cataract surgery in 1996 in Israel the technology has reached the highest probability of success – 97%, but I didn't want to take any risks – so I went to "the best surgeon", with a private surgery at a private hospital and at a very high cost, and guess what – the so-called best surgeon succeeded to fail in the brackets of 3%, did not reckon his mistake, mislead me, I almost lost my eye because of his malpractice... Discovery of Osmosis in 1748 by Jean-Antoine Nollet. The word "osmosis" descends from the words "endosmose" and "exosmose", which were coined by French physician René Joachim Henri Dutrochet (1776–1847) from the Greek words ἐνδον (endon : within), ἔξω (exo : outside), and ὁσμος (osmos : push, impulsion). Ramjet by René Lorin in 1913, and much later the Concorde by Aérospatiale and the British Aircraft Corporation (1969). I flew several times on the Concorde and it is indeed a miracle – how you can leave Paris at noon after being at your office in the morning, arrive at half past eight in the morning to New York, have a full day negotiations in New York, and return at night to Paris. The only problem with the Concorde is that I was the only passenger ever who did not enjoy their gourmet meals (I ate vegetarian), their exceptional wines (I had water), their cheeses (I am allergic to lactose), their coffee (I don't drink coffee), as we say in Ladino/Turkish – vender joyas a bahjavanés – to sell jewels to peasants, not a connoisseur or a feinschmecker!

In the linguistic section of this book I brought examples of plays in Yiddish, and in this chapter on plays I give examples of many plays in 20 more languages. But I have read plays in many other languages, sometimes partly and with translations in parallel – in Greek - Electra by Euripides, Oedipus the King by Sophocles, Lysistrata by Aristophanes, and I have brought an extract of the Odyssey in Greek and English in the Greek chapter of this book, in Dutch - Ghosts and An Enemy of the People by Ibsen, but also Suiker by Hugo Claus, plays in Luxembourgish, Arabic, Interlingua, Polish, Ukrainian, Veneto, Gascon, and many other languages. I have learned that the best way to understand a play is to read it in its original language, and I give in this chapter many examples to this with Brecht's plays in German, plays in French, English, etc.

This part of the book on plays is dedicated to the professors of business ethics, and primarily to Professor Henri-Claude de Bettignies, my mentor, to Henk Van Luijk and Itzhak Saporta. It is dedicated as well to my family, who like Dr. Stockmann's family supported me through all the ordeals: Petra, Ejlif and Morten, and their Israeli counterparts: Shirley, Joseph and Amir, but most of all to my wife Ruthy, who like Stockmann's wife Katherine, was the family's cornerstone.

4. CORY'S SUBJECTIVE IMPRESSIONS ON READING PLAYS & WATCHING DRAMA

Of all the literary works, I prefer most the plays, as they are concise, can be imagined while reading them as you watch the play in the theater, appealing primarily to your emotions. Plays are relevant, even after 3,000 years, whether there are the Greek classics - Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, Plautus; Comedia del Arte plays – Goldoni; Classical plays – Shakespeare, Racine, Moliere, Goethe, Schiller; Modern plays – Ibsen, Arthur Miller, Tchekhov, Strindberg, Anouilh, Sartre, Shaw, Lorca, Pagnol, Williams, Sobol; Avant-Garde plays – Ionesco, Beckett, Brecht, Pirandello, Levin, Genet, etc. Antigone, which is taught at school, is relevant (allegiance to your values or to the law, family ties or public peace), as can be found on the entry: Antigone on the Contemporary World Stage, with all the wonderful adaptations of the play in Argentina, Congo, Finland, Haiti, India, US, France (Anouilh) and Japan. When Antigone was playing at the National Museum of Tokyo in 2004, the adaptation focused on the dilemmas of modern Japan, comparing the Greek tragedy to the heritage of Japan in World War II. I don't understand how many young people nowadays have no idea who is Tchekhov, Ibsen or Strindberg. An educated and intellectual person should have a humanistic "suitcase" of extensive knowledge of at least the main plays of twenty playwrights, as stated above, at least the best novels of twenty authors as detailed in this book, the main poems of at least twenty poets, the main works of twenty composers, twenty painters, extensive knowledge of philosophers, history, geography, the Bible, etc. They should learn about at least a hundred classic films, visit museums, go to the theater, to concerts, operas, they should learn at least five languages fluently as stipulated in this book. And all this regardless of what are their main study subjects – electronics, physics, chemistry, biology, medicine, economics, business, political sciences, sociology or Talmud. The most important study subject of an intellectual person is plays, as the plays develop the conscience, ethics, humanism, much more than any other subject learned at school or university.

I studied at high school Julius Caesar but I didn't have the opportunity to see the play for many years, until one night that I was in Paris on business I saw that the play was performed at a huge stadium on the outskirts of the city, with the direction of Robert Hossein, one of the leading French directors. The stadium was full and the only place available was on the last row. I noticed that most of the people were young theater lovers, this was very heartening, as in Israel most of the public going to the theater are people aged 50+. I like to go to the theater in all the cities I visit and to mingle with the local intelligentsia, this is the same "public" in New York, Lima, Paris, London, Rome, Geneva, Haifa, Tel Aviv, San Francisco, Budapest, Toronto, Washington, Madrid, Frankfurt, Berlin, Sydney, Singapore, Edinburgh, Avignon, etc., not the aristocracy or nouveau-riches, coming to show off as in many instances in Opera halls. They come to the theater, pay reasonable prices (not anymore in Broadway), and enjoy an intellectual evening. So, reluctantly, I bought the last ticket, as normally I prefer to sit on rows 1-6, at a "spitting" distance from the actors. I remembered that one night I saw the last performance of Death of a Salesman with Dustin Hoffman on Broadway. At the end of the play, after a standing ovation of 10 minutes, Hoffman talked for 15 minutes, with tears in his eyes, about the play and his emotional experience. I was on the first row, and this was one of the most exhilarating nights of my life, as I get my kicks out of theater, not of champagne... But, with Julius Caesar, I wanted to see at last my youth's heroes Brutus, Cassius, Marc Anthony and Caesar. This was an avant-premiere, which explains why there were so many young people as the prices were very low. I arrived to my seat, and to my great surprise I noticed that I was seating next to Robert Hossein, the director, who gave instructions to his actors with a remote control in situ, and during all the long performance, I had the unique experience to see how a play is staged and how actors are instructed and motivated in real life – a reality show, with one of the best directors in the world!

5. THE THREEPENNY OPERA IN BERLIN IN GERMAN & TI'S LECTURE BASED ON IT

But this was not the only time that I saw a play on the last row, as compared to the hundreds of times that I saw plays on the first rows. When I was in Berlin in 2010, I saw ten plays, each night a play, but most of all I wanted to see my favorite play - Brecht's and Weill's Threepenny Opera in German at the same theater when it was first performed in 1928. It was also sold out, but I decided to go with Ruthy, my wife, to a performance and try to purchase at the last minute a ticket. And indeed we got two tickets in the last row at the last moment and had a fantastic and unique experience. The unique spell of this play can be achieved only in German.

On the day after, I gave a lecture on business ethics at the headquarters of Transparency International in Berlin, the largest ethical organization in the world. I based my lecture on the three acts of the play and gave a memorable speech to the top management of the organization:

Dr. Jacques Cory, gave a lecture on June 4, 2010, as Keynote Speaker to the management of Transparency International - TI - at its headquarters in Berlin. Moderator: Dr. Francois Valerian, Head of Private Sector Programmes, with the participation of Dr. Miklos Marschall, Regional Director Europe and Central Asia, and other executives. The topic of the lecture was "Drawing Lessons from the Great Recession of 2007-2010", and it was divided in three parts along the main themes of Die Dreigroschenoper, The Threepenny Opera, by Bertolt Brecht. The response to the lecture was enthusiastic, with a vivid Q&A of more than half an hour.

The first part on transparency, common to TI and Cory's books, appears in the first act of the play: The ballad singer in the Prologue - the ballad of Mack the Knife: "Und Macheath, der hat ein Messer, Doch das Messer sieht man nicht", And Macheath has got a knife, but the knife is seen by no one. Analogies between Mack the Knife and the criminals of Wall Street who hid their schemes and thefts offshore and off balance sheet, and no one saw their knives.

Und der Haifisch, der hat Zähne
Und die trägt er im Gesicht
Und MacHeath, der hat ein Messer
Doch das Messer sieht man nicht

And the shark, he has teeth
And he wears them in his face
And MacHeath, he has a knife
But the knife you don't see

An 'nem schönen blauen Sonntag
Liegt ein toter Mann am Strand
Und ein Mensch geht um die Ecke,
Den man Mackie Messer nennt

On a beautiful blue Sunday
Lies a dead man on the Strand
And a man goes around the corner
Whom they call Mack the Knife

Und Schmul Meier bleibt verschwunden
Und so mancher reiche Mann
Und sein Geld hat Mackie Messer
Dem man nichts beweisen kann

And Schmul Meier is missing
And many a rich man
And his money has Mack the Knife,
On whom they can't pin anything.

Jenny Towler ward gefunden
Mit 'nem Messer in der Brust
Und am Kai geht Mackie Messer,
Der von allem nichts gewußt

Jenny Towler was found
With a knife in her chest
And on the wharf walks Mack the Knife,
Who knows nothing about all this.

Und die minderjährige Witwe
Deren Namen jeder weiß
Wachte auf und war geschändet

And the minor-aged widow,
Whose name everyone knows,
Woke up and was violated

Mackie welches war dein Preis?

Mack, what was your price?

Refrain

Und die einen sind im Dunkeln
Und die anderen sind im Licht
Doch man sieht nur die im Lichte
Die im Dunklen sieht man nicht

And some are in the darkness
And the others in the light
But you only see those in the light
Those in the darkness you don't see

Doch man sieht nur die im Lichte
Die im Dunklen sieht man nicht

But you only see those in the light
Those in the darkness you don't see

The second part on the dilemma of profitability versus ethics, which according to Cory are compatible but according to many businessmen are an oxymoron. At the end of the second act Macheath and Jenny sing: "Erst kommt das Fressen, dann kommt die Moral", Voracity is the first thing, Morals follow on. We do not talk just about food, but voracity, excess, lavishness, salaries of hundreds of million dollars to the CEOs in parallel to layoffs of millions. When "Fressen" comes first, we never have time or resources for Ethics or Social Responsibility. That is why most of the translations of the play are wrong, as the following one, when they translate Erst kommt das Fressen by First comes food. My knowledge of German is quite limited by I know for sure that fressen is devour (and so says the dictionary), eat like an animal, like a pig. This changes completely the moral content of the play. If you translate fressen by eat or food you imply that those who are thieves and murderers do so out of necessity because they are hungry. But Mack the Knife was not hungry, and the crooks of Wall Street who caused unethically but legally the Great Recession are not hungry either. They devour like pigs the savings of the poors, of the middle class, of our pensions, they are rich people who steal because they are criminals, because they know that they will not be punished, that others will foot the bill of their crimes!

Ballade über die Frage "Wovon lebt der Mensch" (What keeps mankind alive?) - Deutsch

Macheath:

Ihr Herrn, die ihr uns lehrt, wie man brav leben,
Und Sünd und Missetat vermeiden kann,
Zuerst müsst ihr uns was zu fressen geben,
Dann könnt ihr reden, damit fängt es an.
Ihr, die ihr euren Wanst und unsre Bravheit liebt,
Das eine wisst ein für allemal,
Wie ihr es immer dreht, und wie ihr's immer schiebt,
Erst kommt das Fressen, dann kommt die Moral.
Erst muss es möglich sein auch armen Leuten,
Vom grossen Brotlaib sich ihr Teil zu schneiden.

Jenny:

Denn wovon lebt der Mensch?

Macheath:

Denn wovon lebt der Mensch?
Indem er stündlich, den Menschen peinigt, auszieht, anfällt, abwürgt und frisst.
Nur dadurch lebt der Mensch,
Vergessen kann, dass er ein Mensch doch ist.

Chor:

Ihr Herren, bildet euch nur da nichts ein,
Der Mensch lebt nur von Missetat allein!

English

Macheath:

You gentlemen who tell us how to live properly,
And how to avoid all sins and crime,
Must first makes sure that we have food to eat.
Then you can resume your talking, that's where it begins.
You with your paunch and us with our bravery,
You know what's best for all of us.
No matter how much you twist it, or try to change the truth,
First comes food, then comes the morals.
And it also must be possible for the poor,
To cut themselves a slice of the bread.

Jenny:

What keeps mankind alive?

Macheath:

What keeps mankind alive?
It's a fact that hourly people torture, oppress, strangle, and eat.
Only after man goes through that,
Can he forget that he is a man.

Chorus:

Your Gentlemen, imagine there is only you,
Mankind lives on crime alone!

The third part of the lecture and of the play is at the end of the third act when Mack the Knife is "Gerettet, gerettet!", reprieved, reprieved, and instead of being hanged for all his crimes the Queen of England (or the US President, European Prime Ministers, and so on), gives Mack the castle of Marmarel, likewise a pension of ten thousand pounds, like the criminals of the Great Recession who were bailed out (they could indeed sing with Mack the Knife – bailed out, bailed out...), whose schemes cost the world more than ten trillion dollars, as they were too big to fail, transferring the losses from their companies to the governments, i.e. to us. After socializing the losses in 2008, they privatized the profits in 2009, with salaries and bonuses of billions leading the world as the pied piper of Hamelin to a Doomsday Depression towards 2020, with losses of hundreds of trillions, while no government would be able to bailout them or us!

Der reitende Bote (The Riding Messenger) - Deutsch

Peachum:

Verehrtes Publikum wird sind soweit,
Und Herr Macheath wird aufgehängt,
Denn in der ganzen Christenheit,
Da wird dem Menschen nichts geschenkt,
Damit ihr aber nun nicht denkt,

Das wird von uns auch mitgemacht,
 Wird Herr Macheath nicht aufgehängt,
 Sondern wir haben uns einen anderen Schluss ausgedacht,
 Damit ihr wenigstens in der Oper seht,
 Wie einmal Gnade vor Recht ergeht.
 Und darum wird, weil wir's gut mit euch meinen,
 Jetzt der reitende Bote des Königs erscheinen.

Chor:

Horch, horch, horch,
 Horch, horch, horch,
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Des Königs reitender Bote
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Des Königs reitender Bote,
 Des Königs reitender Bote kommt, Bote kommt, Bote kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Des Königs reitender Bote kommt, Bote kommt, Bote kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Horch, wer kommt!
 Des Königs reitender Bot

Macheath:

Gerette gerette!
 Ja, ich wusste es ja, ich wusste es,
 Wenn die Not am höchsten, ist die Rettung am nächsten.
 Wenn die Not am höchsten, ist die Rettung am nächsten.

Polly:

Gerettet, gerettet, mein lieber Mackie ist,
 Ich bin sehr glücklich.

Frau Peachum:

So wendet alles sich am End zum Glück.
 So leicht und freidlich wäre unser Leben, wenn die reitenden Boten des Königs immer kämen.

Peachum:

Darum bleibt alle stehen, wo irh stehet,
 Und singt den Choral der Ärmsten der Armen,
 Deren schwieriges Leben ihr heute dargestellt habt.
 Denn in Wirklichkeit ist gerade ihr Ende schlimm.
 Die reitenden Boten des Königs kommen sehr selten,
 Und die getreten werden, treten wieder.

English

The public so far have been honored, And Mr. Macheath will be hanged,
 In the name of Christianity.
 Nothing is given to these people,
 And noone thinks about it.
 That why we've joined together,
 To hang Macheath.
 But we've come up with an alternative ending,
 For you just to see in the opera.
 About how righteousness is enforced.
 The king's messenger appears.

Chorus:

Hark, hark, hark!
 Hark, hark, hark!
 Hark, who comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 The king's riding messenger!
 Hark, who comes!
 The king's riding messenger!
 The king's riding messenger comes, the messenger comes, the messenger comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 The king's riding messenger comes, the messenger comes, the messenger comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 Hark, who comes!
 The king's riding messenger!

Macheath:

I've been rescued! I've been rescued!
 Yes! I knew it! Yes! I knew it!
 When the need is at it's highest, the rescue always comes.
 When the need is at it's highest, the rescue always comes.

Polly:

Saved! My dearest Mackie is saved!
 I am so lucky!

Mrs. Peachum:

So it all ends in luck.
 So easy and free would our lives be if the kings messenger always showed up to save the day.

Mr. Peachum:

So everyone remains standing where they are,
 Singing hymns arm in arm.
 Their difficult lives have been represented here today,
 For in reality the ending is just as bad.
 The king's riding messengers rarely come,
 Those who have treaded will tread again.

6. CORY'S ACADEMIC COURSES BASED ON PLAYS, NEW ETHICAL COLLEAGUES

I also had the unique experience to see a dress rehearsal of The Crucible at the Haifa Theater, when I was a member of its Board of Directors. I sat next to the director, and this performance alone was worth the hundreds of volunteer workhours that I did for the theater, interviewing the actors, the directors, the managers and all the others in order to prepare a strategic planning for the theater (see Cory's website), which was rejected by the mayor, but this is another story. The 4 plays mentioned above were part of Cory's Course curriculum in Business Ethics. But I taught also full courses based on plays, novels, films and documentaries, which had a longlasting influence on my students, appealing to their emotions, and giving me the best evaluation of my students at the University of Haifa, elected as the best lecturer of the whole university. My courses dealt with ethical dilemmas in works as: Wall Street and ethics with Wall Street, the CEO and ethics with All My Sons, wrongdoing to minority shareholders with L'argent – Money by Emile Zola, ethical activism with Erin Brockovich, ecological issues with A Civil Action, human greed with The Visit, transparency and the media with The Insider, social responsibility and banking with It's a Wonderful Life, victims of corruption with Jean de Florette and Manon, and sessions analyzing ethical dilemmas in: Class Action, F.I.S.T., The China Syndrome, Glengarry Glen Ross, Other People's Money, Topaze, Executive Suite, Revizor, Don Quijote, The Great Gatsby, The Merchant of Venice, Rhinoceros, An Enemy of the People, Nelly's Choice, etc. The methodology of the course was based on group dynamics analyzing the ethical dilemmas of the films' protagonists.

I wrote a play Nelly's Choice, Le choix de Nelly, published in France, the Hebrew version is at the library of the University of Haifa, extracts from it are on Cory's website, and reading of the play was performed at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, on July 30, 2008. The music of the play, prepared by Cory for the reading of the play can be heard on Cory's website. One can read the review of the play by Joshua Sobol, one of the leading world playwrights, and the analysis of the book on Cory's website and book: Selected Issues in Business Ethics and Social Responsibility. The original version of the play Nelly Doron was published with Cory's eBook Social, Economic and Governemental Justice: Essays and Articles, and the Play Nelly Doron.

Before focusing my interest on business ethics and writing my PhD dissertation and books on business ethics to minority shareholders, the first academic research on this subject in the whole world, my friends and acquaintances were primarily businessmen. But when I started to conduct research on those subjects, I "lost" many of my business friends and a large part of my business as well, as focusing on business ethics is not perceived so well in the business world. But, I gained better friends, outstanding people, as the world famous playwright Joshua Sobol, the Insead academic and mentor Henri-Claude de Bettignies, CNAM academic Yvon Pesqueux, and Dutch business ethics writer and professor Henk Van Luijk, the banker Harry Recanati, the writer and activist Itzhak Gormezano Goren, the Israeli academics Ilan Meshulam, Itzhak Saporta, and Ido Landau, the poet Zvi Aviel, the government official Shahar Horev, the Transparency International Israel president Galia Saguy, the professor and Chairman of companies Meir Heth, the well known journalist Arie Avneri, Ran Lachman, Nahum Biger, etc.

Henri-Claude de BETTIGNIES, the Aviva Chair Emeritus Professor of Leadership and Responsibility and Emeritus Professor of Asian Business and Comparative Management at INSEAD is also the Distinguished Emeritus Professor of Globally Responsible Leadership at the China Europe International Business School (CEIBS) and former Director of the Euro-China Centre for Leadership and Responsibility (ECCLAR) that he created in Shanghai, at CEIBS, in 2006. Between 1988 and 2005, with a joint appointment at Stanford University (Graduate School of Business), he shared his time equally between Europe, California and the Asia Pacific region (particularly with the INSEAD campus in Asia). He was educated at the Sorbonne (Licence ès Lettres), at the Catholic University of Paris (EPP), then at the Harvard Business School (ITP). He worked in Africa (MIFERMA, Mauritania), at the University of California (IIR, Berkeley), in New York (for IBM), and then in Tokyo for 5 years. Professor de Bettignies joined INSEAD in 1967 as Assistant Professor and initiated the development of the Organizational Behavior department. Professor since 1975, he started and developed INSEAD's activities in Japan and the Asia Pacific region which led, in 1980, to the creation of the Euro-Asia Centre, of which he was Director General until 1988. Professor de Bettignies started the development of the Ethics initiative at INSEAD, and pioneered a new approach (AVIRA) to enlighten business leaders. Over a 16 years period the AVIRA programme brought together - in Fontainebleau, California and Singapore - 900 Chairmen and CEOs from 60 countries, keen to enrich their vision and enhance their "responsible" leadership competence. Henri-Claude teaches MBAs, E-MBAs and executives at CEIBS and at INSEAD in the areas of ethics and CSR, HR management and corporate transformation, culture and management. He directs a number of executive programmes in Europe and in Asia. He is the Founder and Director of CEDRE (Centre for the Study of Development and Responsibility). Teaching - Managing Change & Change of Management in Asia; Strategies for Asia-Pacific; The Transformation of Japan: Implications for the World; AVIRA: Changing CEOs' Mindset; Culture and Management in Asia; Joint-Venture Management in Asia; Individual, Business and Society: The Ethical Dilemma.

7 Questions from Henk van Luijk

Step by step through a moral dilemma (Henk van Luijk)

1. What is the main moral issue?
2. Who are the participants in the case?
3. Who has to make a decision?
4. What information is needed?
5. What arguments can be provided?
6. What is my conclusion?
7. How do I feel about it?

Step 1. What is the main moral issue?

- Formulate potential key moral issues in the question form: Is it morally acceptable/neccessary?...
- Select the most acute issue for further investigation.

Formulating the key moral question:

Is it morally acceptable that the person A is carrying out action X although...?

Step 2. Who are the participants in the case?

Participant groups:

- Everyone/all (stakeholders) whose values, rights, interests have to be considered in the given case

Step 3. Who has to make a decision?

- Whose task/duty is to decide?

Responsible persons and/or institutions

All those who can influence the decision in the given case and from who this can be reasonably expected.

(Don't include the persons who caused the problem/dilemma)

Step 4. What information is needed?

- Is extra information needed to make a rational decision?

Variants:

1. Information is sufficient;
2. Extra information would do good but it is not essential;
3. Extra information is needed.

Step 5. What arguments can be provided?

- List the arguments for
- List the arguments against
- Consider the arguments from the perspective of:
 - Principles
 - Consequences.

Principle-oriented perspective

“Your moral duty is to select an action alternative that does not contradict a valid moral norm, value, right, irrespective of the consequences of the choice”.

- Honesty
- Privacy (primarily – rights)
- Loyalty
- Justice

Consequences-oriented perspective

“ Your moral duty is to select an action alternative whose consequences will bring as much benefit to the participant groups as possible”

Cost-benefit type analysis, considering interests of all the participating groups

- Affect on the environment
- Performance
- Company reputation
- Workplace climate

Rule of thumb

When principles and consequences are in conflict, priority is granted to the principles: Unless you have a reasoned background to claim that consequences in the given situation are more important than principles.

Step 6. What is the conclusion?

6.1 Weigh all pros and contras:

- Principles
- Consequences
- Use the rule of thumb when there is a conflict between them

6.2 Formulate the conclusion which would answer the key moral issue

6.3 Determine sequence of actions which would not vary from the conclusion and consider the counterarguments (minimize the “moral remainder”)

Step 7. How do I feel?

(Listening to the conscience)

- Am I ready to voice my position in public/a discussion with the participating persons?
- Would I behave the same in a similar situation in the future?

(Thank to Prof Raminta Pucetaite from Lithuania for this)

Joshua (Yehoshua) Sobol (יהושע סובול) (born 24/8/1939), is an Israeli playwright, writer, and director. Joshua Sobol was born in Tel Mond. His mother's family fled the pogroms in Europe in 1922 and his father's family immigrated from Poland in 1934 to escape the Nazis. Sobol is married to Edna, set and costume designer. They have a daughter, Neta, and a son, Yahli Sobol, a singer and writer. Sobol studied at the Sorbonne, Paris, and graduated with a diploma in philosophy. Sobol's first play was performed in 1971 by the Municipal Theatre in Haifa, where Sobol worked from 1984 to 1988 as a playwright and later assistant artistic director. The performance of his play The Jerusalem Syndrome, in January 1988, led to widespread protests, whereupon Sobol resigned from his post as artistic director. In 1983, after the Haifa production of his play Weininger's Night (The Soul of a Jew), he was invited to participate in the official part of the Edinburgh Festival. Between 1983 and 1989 Sobol wrote three related plays: Ghetto, Adam and Underground, which constitute together The Ghetto triptich. Ghetto premiered in Haifa in May 1984. It won the David's Harp award for best play. That year, Peter Zadek's German version of the play was chosen by Theater Heute as best production and best foreign play of the year. It has since been translated into more than 20 languages and performed in more than 25 countries. Following Nicholas Hytner's production of the English-language version by David Lan at the Royal National Theatre of Great Britain in 1989, the play won the Evening Standard and the London Critics award for Best Play of the Year and was nominated for the Olivier Award in the same category. It was coldly received in New York, however. In his review of the play in the New York Times, Frank Rich described it as a "tedious stage treatment of the Holocaust." Since 1995, Sobol has collaborated with Viennese director Paulus Manker on a number of projects exploring new forms of the theatrical experience.

In 1995, Der Vater (The Father) a work by Niklas Frank and Joshua Sobol commissioned for the Wiener Festwochen (Vienna Festival) opened at the Theater an der Wien under the direction of Paulus Manker. The play is about Niklas Frank's father, Hans Frank, who was Hitler's Governor general in Poland and was hanged in Nuremberg in 1946. In 1996, they created Alma for the Wiener Festwochen. Alma is a polydrama based on the life of Alma Mahler-Werfel. It played in Vienna for six successive seasons and toured to Venice, Lisbon, Los Angeles, Berlin, Jerusalem and Prague. In the Vienna production, the scenes of Alma's life were performed simultaneously on all floors and in all rooms of a former Jugendstil sanatorium near Vienna. The guests were invited to abandon the immobilized position of spectator in a conventional drama, replace it with the mobile activity of traveller, thus partaking in a "theatrical journey". By choosing the events, the path, and the person to follow after each event, each participant constructed her or his personal version of the "Polydrama". In 2000, Sobol and Manker created F@LCO – A CYBER SHOW, a multimedia musical about the Austrian pop singer Falco. See also - Culture of Israel.

Society's Expectations of Corporate Performance - Today (Some Discussions about a 'Global Performance') - Yvon Pesqueux (Wikipedia in French), Full CV, CNAM.

Abstract: Society's expectations regarding the performance of major corporations could not really have been examined before now. This is to say that, within the political context of the modern world, society had no expectations of corporations, which were considered as one social construct among others. From a broad political perspective, societal expectations could be seen expressed in the exercise of representative democracy. The political context (the 'liberal moment' herein), which has developed since the early 1980s actually changed the general perspective. (1st argument) The main consequence is a shift in the dominant representation of the corporation, so that it is currently considered a vector of profit rather than a 'socio-technical' system. (2nd argument). Of course, the ambiguity of the very notion of performance did make it possible to integrate expectations beyond just profits (3rd argument); nonetheless, these expectations must be judged both in terms of hope and reality. (Conclusion) Alexandrian Summer By Yitzhak Gormezano Goren, Translated by Yardenne Greenspan, New Vessel Press, 200 pages, Review by Joshua Furst, Forward.

Late in Israeli writer Yitzhak Gormezano Goren's luminous 1978 novel "Alexandrian Summer," which has just been published for the first time in English in a fluid translation by Yardenne Greenspan, a tired rabbi watches disapprovingly as a group of Egyptian-Jewish society ladies play cards on the Sabbath. He weakly reproaches them, though he knows that his words will have no sway over their behavior. "When his father, God have mercy on his soul, was the head rabbi of the community," Goren writes, "people would be ashamed to be seen taking part in sacrilege. Times have changed, and Jews have changed. He was different from his father, too." And with that, the rabbi closes his eyes in exhaustion and lets go of the impulse to chastise them further. The moment touches on a number of the central ideas with which "Alexandrian Summer" is concerned. The rabbi's resignation at the way cultural norms and social expectations change, his wish for a past that can't be recovered, his recognition that this wish reasserts itself with every generation—it all points to the tension between assimilation and piety that has pulled at the Jewish people for a millennium. It asks the eternally debated question: Does faith or culture define who we are?

Goren, an Egyptian-Jewish novelist and playwright whose family immigrated to Israel in 1951, comes down firmly on the side of culture. The culture he cherishes is not the stereotypical Jewish culture of bubbes and latkes and Yiddish-inflected jokes about ailing digestive tracts. Neither is it the ascendant Jewish culture of Israel with its promise of a land of our own (though Israel and the challenge it presents to Jewish identity hammers persistently at the edges of the story). Rather, Goren longs for the chaotic polyglot Egypt of his youth, "the Alexandria of the days of King Farouk... which has been feeding [his] imagination for over twenty years." With its mix of Arab and Greek and Turkish and Coptic influences, it's Sephardic Jews who, in 1951, when the story is set, felt every bit as entitled (and sometimes more entitled) to the decadent Mediterranean leisure the city offered as anyone else who called it home.

One of the great triumphs of “Alexandrian Summer” is the richness of its evocation of this city and the multiple cultures pressed together within it. We meet characters from every aspect of society: those women playing cards on the Sabbath while gossiping about their children’s chances of landing good Jewish wives; belly dancers who taunt and tease and sell their bodies to the men at the seaside clubs; British diplomats paternalistically celebrating the Orientalism of the place; a skinny little Italian kid whose job it is to light the gas lamps each night and “[doesn’t] even get off his bike, but instead pedal[s] his way from lamp to lamp, naively believing that at the same time God [is] riding his heavenly bike in much the same fashion, lighting the stars in the sky.” However saturated the story is with sociological and historical facts about Alexandria, what drives the action is Goren’s adoration and longing for this lost place and the freedoms it afforded the people living within it. After a brief evocation of memory in which Goren, as author, imagines himself walking up to his old home, knocking on the door and asking the Arab servant who answers if his former self is home, the story takes the form of slowly accumulating memory.

At first the book presents itself as a Jewish-Egyptian response to the Mediterranean summer idyll genre, so familiar from the films of Eric Rohmer and his imitators in the French art cinema of the 1970s and ’80s. Each short chapter evokes a moment from the lives of the two families sharing the house: the author’s own and the glamorous, cosmopolitan Hamdi-Ali’s, there for the summer so that their eldest son, the glamorous jockey David, can compete in the annual horse races around which much of Alexandria’s excitement swirls. Characters rise into focus and then recede. A sultry eroticism pervades. We watch as Goren’s younger self, now called Robby, and Victor Hamdi-Ali, the aggressive, neglected second son of the family, explore their pubescent sexuality together. We watch David pursue Robby’s petulant sister Anabella, and we watch Anabella alternately tease and rebuke him. Each character is given a brief, loving portrait.

For all his love for these characters, Goren doesn’t flinch at the hypocrisies that a more defensive writer would gloss over: the way that, even though they’re treated as not quite equal to the other cultures in the city, they believe themselves to be better than the rest; the casually racist attitudes they have toward Arabs. In fact, his skepticism of these attitudes is at the heart of the book. As the story builds, and David triumphs in a race against the legendary Bedouin jockey Ahmed Al-Tal’ooni, a central metaphor begins to take shape. David, the prince of the Hamdi-Ali clan, has been chosen to represent the hopes of all the Jews of Egypt. If he can keep winning against this Goliath, he will be king. It’s a classic story of Jewish ascendancy, ironically inverted by the historical fact that in Egypt at this time, the Jews had already lost - they just didn’t know it yet. When, inevitably, David (who, in this iteration, doesn’t have the drive to carry the hopes of his people on his shoulders) begins to falter, the story starts to center on his father, Joseph, and Goren’s true vision comes into focus. Joseph’s real name is Yusef. He was raised in Turkey and, though he keeps this secret, born Muslim.

He converted to Judaism to please his wife, about whom he says, “You are my family, you are my tradition, you are my homeland.” He represents an alternative to the winner-take-all mythos of David and Goliath — a unity between the Arab and the Jew - and he is the true hero of this story. As goes his fortune, so does Goren’s hope for a pluralistic, cosmopolitan, outward-looking Judaism. By the time the beleaguered rabbi makes his appearance late in the book, “Alexandrian Summer” comes to embody the cyclical pattern of Jewish experience, the way that in good times, Jews assimilate into the cultures in which they find themselves and in bad they cling to their beleaguered heritage and hope against hope that the mob passes them by. In Alexandria, Egypt, in the summer of 1951, Goren’s characters cling to the former even as events force them to prepare for the latter. They may comprehend that their future is in Israel, but their hearts will remain forever in Egypt. (read also - Andre Aciman's Introduction of the novel).

Moral Rupture in Israeli Leadership, 1/5/2014, Arie Avneri, Chairman of Ometz

Ehud Olmert's conviction of a serious crime would seem extraordinary and disappointing. For the first time in the history of the State, a former prime-minister might find himself incarcerated. This conviction has been followed by the citizens' ominous sense of frustration, even despair, at regime corruption that might occasionally change shape but in fact never ceases. Present regime corruption appears serious indeed and signifies defilement that has been ongoing for far too many years and only gets worse. A fish begins to stink at the head. The late President of Israel Ezer Weizman had to resign after being exposed as having received favors from a tycoon. Another President has been convicted of sex crimes and sentenced to a lengthy prison term.

Olmert is not the only prime-minister entangled with the law and acting in twilight for years. Three others – Ariel Sharon, Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu – were subject to police criminal investigation regarding various corruption affairs and barely escaped indictment.

In the State's present dismal reality, where the dealings of past and present prime-ministers are overlooked and ignored, none of the three deserves a clear bill. This black list includes former government ministers who served prison sentences (Gonen Segev, Aryeh Deri, Rafael Pinhasi, Avraham Hirschson, and Shlomo Benizri) as well as former ministers who have been convicted without calumny (Tzachi Hanegbi, Haim Ramon). The list of public criminals and suspects who have fallen and broken faith is too replete with names. Among others it includes deputy ministers, Members of Knesset past and present who have been duly prosecuted, former Chief Rabbis who have strayed, ousted police chiefs and superintendents, Chiefs of Staff, generals and senior security officials who tripped, convicted mayors, and senior members of the judiciary who have fallen as well, public servants in key positions who embezzled, CEOs of large public bodies who were corrupted, and on and on. The fact that some of them were not prosecuted for lack of evidence, and others pronounced not guilty for benefit of the doubt, or controversially acquitted, does not mean they are innocent – far from it. Sometimes this is due to faulty investigation apparatuses that failed to collect vital evidence.

At other times considerable leniency has been exercised in formulating the indictment, let alone the exaggerated mercy shown by judges to senior public figures or tycoons of the first rank facing them as defendants. Shame has vanished from the flawed norms that have taken hold of the State, and it is replaced by flattery and kowtowing. Convicted senior political criminals are highly desired lecturers at events held by state and public bodies, and take part in public occasions, receiving handshakes, pats on the back and kisses galore. The prominent example of this is Ehud Olmert. Even prior to his conviction for accepting bribery, while he was still convicted for the lighter offense of breach of faith and was acquitted of other crimes under controversial circumstances, Olmert was still the darling of the social elite and academia, and closely linked with the political sector. This is the way of the world, and no one protested. ...

7. JOSHUA SOBOL'S GHETTO (HEBREW)

Joshua Sobol has written dozens of plays that are performed all over the world, and the most known of them is Ghetto. The ethical and moral dilemmas in this play are excruciating, and I chose to focus in my courses on the business ethics dilemmas of this outstanding play. Ghetto (Hebrew: גטו) is a play by Israeli playwright Joshua Sobol about the experiences of the Jews of the Vilna Ghetto during Nazi occupation in World War II. The play focuses on the Jewish theatre in the ghetto, incorporating live music and including as characters historical figures such as Jacob Gens, the chief of the Jewish Police and later Head of the ghetto. It is part of a triptych of plays about the resistance movement, which also includes Adam and Underground. Ghetto premièred at the Haifa Municipal Theatre in Israel, and the Freie Volksbühne, Berlin, in 1984, with folk and jazz singer, Esther Ofarim as Hayyah. It was performed in the Olivier Theatre at the Royal National Theatre, London, in an English-language version by David Lan, based on a translation by Miriam Schlesinger. This production opened on 27 April 1989. It was directed by Nicholas Hytner and designed by Bob Crowley. Alex Jennings played Kittel, Jonathan Cullen played Srulik, and Maria Friedman played Hayyah. It won the 1989 Evening Standard Award for Best Play. A production directed by Gedalia Besser opened at the Circle in the Square Theatre in New York on 30 April 1989. The business ethics dilemmas of this multi-layers masterpiece focus mainly on the question: can you conduct business with unethical people and can you collaborate with them, and at what cost. When having to make ethical choices how far can you go, and should you risk even your own life in order not to compromise with your principles.

Joshua Sobol gave an excellent review on Cory's play Nelly's Choice, and Cory reviewed most of Sobol's plays, both reviews are included in Cory's books – see links - Correspondence between Joshua Sobol, one of the leading playwrights in the world, and Jacques Cory, in Hebrew. Review of Cory's play "Nelly's Choice" by Joshua Sobol \(emails translated into English\).

The tragedy of the Holocaust is the closest to Sobol's heart. Ghetto is a masterpiece, and a theatrical perfection. The protagonists' ethical dilemmas are fascinating with endless ramifications. I couldn't be Gens, the Jewish head of the Ghetto, in any circumstance, as I don't agree with the Utilitarians that you can measure utility, I'm Kantian and I believe that in no way you have to make very unethical acts in order to achieve a more ethical result. Or in a popular way – to steal a bank in order to distribute the money to the poors, or according to Sophie's Choice to sacrifice your elder child in order to save your younger child, or to sacrifice Iphigenia in order to win the Trojan War. If a Nazi would order me to chose between one of my children and save him, I'd prefer to die with all my children. Anyhow, I know for sure, that in no way you have to sign a pact with the devil, the Mafia, or unethical tycoons and politicians, because in most, if not all of the cases, it is useless and he'll con you, so you lose with them in any case, as we see also in Sophie's case and in Ghetto with the hopeless attempt of Gens to save at least part of the Jews by sacrificing all the others. If a Nazi would offer me to head the Ghetto I would tell him that I know that their intention is to kill all of us and I am not going to cooperate with him, as his intention is only to make it easier for the Nazis the murder of all the Jews. Even if I knew that he is willing to free a few thousands of Hungarian Jews in return for trucks I wouldn't cooperate either as you don't make pacts with the devil in any case, and this is absolute, even if you are Faust and you are promised youth and love, or in other cases wealth and power.

My experience with unethical businessmen was that whenever I tried it I always losed, when they promised me to compensate me for my losses that were due to their wrongdoing and we reached an agreement they backed out of this agreement at the last moment and in the meanwhile they benefited from the fact that I didn't sue them while they were raising tens of millions of dollars from the public, and after they raised the money they were not afraid of the negative publicity, so they cancelled the agreement. If you are a utilitarian you might agree with the Nazis and back them as they benefited the majority of the German population by confiscating the money of the minority of Jews and employed it to build Autobahns and give work to the masses. There should be a compass that gives you an ethical direction, whether it is God and the Bible, Aristotle, your conscience, or your ethical leader. You shouldn't commit a crime in any case, this is absolute and applies also if you have to invest $11 per car in order to retrofit all the Ford Pintos, even if the result is more expensive than to give indemnities to the 300 victims that would die if you don't make the retrofit. You should always ask yourself what if among the victims were you wife, you child, your mother, or God forbids even you. This is called personification, and is the most efficient vehicle for ethical thought as it applies to all of us.

The world is indifferent when hundreds of thousands children are killed in the Arab civil wars but when one small child is drowned and found dead in a Turkish coast (of all places in Bodrum where we stayed a few years ago at Club Med) the world is flabbergasted from one picture of this dead child. I personally think that it is completely irrational, as I am shocked by the news in the same way than by a photo, unless the photo would be substituted in your mind by the photo of your dead child and would personify for you the tragedy of the event. Israel suffered from that dilemma as we never allowed to show the victims of the suicide bombing, the hundreds of children killed by the Palestinians terrorists backed by Arafat and his government during the Second Intifada. But when one Palestinian child was killed inadvertently by the Israeli forces they published his picture over and over, and the world was shocked by this picture and could not grasp the tragedy of the hundreds of Israeli children killed on purpose by the Palestinians, because we didn't publish the atrocious pictures, or because they are indifferent to Jewish casualties as many of them were during World War II. But sometimes the personification works on behalf of the Jews also, as in the case of Anne Frank, that I bring in this book as well.

Anne's diary was translated into dozens of languages and moves Japanese girls as well as Israeli girls, much more than the fate of hundreds of thousands Jewish or African children killed by inhumane armies even if they were killed in a more atrocious way or suffered much more than Anne Frank. Everyone can personify the fate of Anne as she speaks in our language but very few can personify the fate of an anonymous African child, sometimes because of racism or even if not you cannot imagine plagues, rapes and beheaded victims, unless you see it of course in Daesh's films. What is the difference between a beheaded victim or a victim burned atrociously and another victim killed by disease in a concentration camp – it is more photogenic or what? Anyhow, I am shocked in the same way, because I remember and I grasped since childhood the fate of the thousands of beheaded victims of the French revolution and of my Spanish and Portuguese forefathers burned by the Inquisition. And all of them belong to the same "people" – the people who believe that they are right, who thinks that they have to burn the Conversos or behead the kings or even revolutionaries as Danton, because God, Christian or Moslem, or The Cause asked them to do so, and they invite the masses of citizens to the Place de la Concorde in Paris to watch the beheaded king, or the heretics at the Auto-da-fes on Plaza Mayor in Madrid, or the Daesh victims that you can watch nowadays on the Internet, the new Plaza Mayor.

In short, Joshua Sobol brings forward in his immortal plays the eternal dilemmas – the Categorical Imperative/Univeral Law of Kant A categorical imperative denotes an absolute, unconditional requirement that must be obeyed in all circumstances and is justified as an end in itself. It is best known in its first formulation: Act only according to that maxim whereby you can, at the same time, will that it should become a universal law – that all human beings should be treated as if they were your sons, in an ethical way, and we shouldn't do to others what we don't want to be done to us – the Golden Rule. So, for us, the philosophers and practitioners of Business Ethics, Ghetto describes the situations that we encounter in our everyday life, in business, in society, in the family, with our friends, neighbors or enemies – but he does so in the extreme conditions of the Ghetto when the Jews know that the Germans who rule effectively the Ghetto (Kittel) with the collaboration of Gens, and the question that Sobol raises is how far you should go in compromising with the devil, is Gens a positive hero, a negative hero, or even a more negative hero than the German Kittel. But Sobol, as always, is not categoric, as he does not write soap operas, his protagonists are complex characters, with positive and negative traits, and the reader/watcher of the play should draw his own conclusion on the play's dilemmas as I did.

Out of Sobol's Ghetto version in English – we chose to bring the characters and music:

Characters

Srulik- the narrator, whose memory of the last days of the ghetto serves as the crux of the story. He is the artistic director of the ghetto theatre and a ventriloquist, who is never seen without his wise-cracking dummy

Kittel- the SS commander in charge of the ghetto. He is a paradox- he is vicious in his treatment of the residents, but has an artistic and sensitive side and is often seen carrying his saxophone case along with his schmeisser

Hermann Kruk- the librarian of the ghetto and a socialist. He is working on a chronicle of life in the ghetto and rarely sets foot outside the library, preferring to ensure that the events taking place around him are preserved for posterity. The character is based on a real person, also named Herman Kruk, whose diaries chronicled life in the Vilna ghetto. In the 2000 Seattle Public Theater production, director Lauren Marshall created a second lead female character by recasting Kruk as the female Hannah Kruk, thus introducing a degree of sexual tension into (her) relationship with Gens and Dr. Paul.

Weiskopf- an entrepreneur and former factory worker, who ensures that a new workshop for mending Nazi uniforms is established in the Ghetto. He is selfish and power-hungry, and only interested in making a name for himself among the ghetto leadership

Hayyah- a former singer, who is admired by Kittel for her excellent voice and haunting beauty. Srulik and Kruk also harbor romantic feelings for her, but neither are given the chance to act on them

Jacob Gens- Chief of the Jewish police and later Head of the ghetto. A deeply conflicted man who always does his best to save the lives that he can, even if it means working with the Nazis and letting some die so that others may live. He has a good working relationship with Kittel, who sees him as his protege. This allows Gens to arrange for lives to spare that might not be otherwise. He is deeply patriotic and a Zionist.

Dr. Ernst Paul- a professor of Judaica at the Rosenberg Institute for the Study of Judaism without Jews. He is focused on "preserving the Jewish culture" before the inevitable destruction of their race, and forces Kruk to help him catalog Vilna's cultural treasures. He is played by the same actor who plays Kittel.

Numerous minor characters that may be played each by individuals or by an ensemble as small as 15, including the Hasid- a fortune teller

Ooma and Judith- actresses

3 actors- playing ghetto citizens and numerous stage roles

Elia Geivish

Yitzhok Geivish

Yankel Polikanski- 3 young black marketeers who are hanged for murdering the Hasid

Dessler- a Jewish ghetto policeman and later head of the Jewish police

A small musical ensemble is also required, at least including 2 violins, accordion, trumpet, clarinet, guitar and percussion. A bass, a trombone and a clarinet may be added to the ensemble.

Music

The play incorporates traditional Jewish songs with jazz numbers and other traditional songs, all performed live on the stage by the actors and the musical ensemble.

" חיה: איזה תועלת יש בתיאטרון במצב שלנו?

קרוק: גם אני חשבתי כך בהתחלה. שללתי את הקמת התיאטרון בגטו. היום אני מודה בטעותי.

חיה: זאת לא הייתה טעות אתה צדקת. התיאטרון מעניק לאנשים אשליה, מסיח את דעתם מהעיקר.

קרוק: זה לא כל כך פשוט. הפאשיזם מנסה לשלול את ערך האדם. לטעת באדם הרגשה שהוא פחות מבהמה. ליצור היררכיה בין בני אדם. רק כך יכול להתבסס הפאשיזם; על בני אדם שהתבהמו. המאבק נגד הפאשיזם מתחיל בסירוב להשלים עם חלוקת בני האדם לעליונים ולנחותים, ולהתבהם.

חיה: מה לזה ולתיאטרון?

קרוק: מול ספר טוב, מול יצירה גדולה- אין אדון ואין עבד. כל אמנות גדולה מחזירה לאדם את ממדיו האמיתיים, מזכירה לבני אדם שהם שווים. הפעילות התרבותית שאנו מקיימים בגטו, ובכלל זה התיאטרון, הם חלק מהמאבק שלנו לשמור על צלם האדם. הפאשיסטים יכולים להרוג אותנו, זה קל. אבל אנחנו, פה בגטו, הוכחנו שבדבר העיקרי הם נכשלו: הם לא הצליחו לשלול מאיתנו את צלם האדם. את השאיפה לרוחני. לאמת, לטוב וליפה. הם אסרו עלינו להכניס פרחים לגטו, ואנחנו מגישים איש לרעהו עלי

שלכת. אולי אלה הפרחים הכי יפים שבני אדם הגישו
מימיהם."

What is the benefit of a theater in the Ghetto?
The theater gives to the people an illusion, a break out of their miserable situation. Fascism tries to give people the feeling that they are worth than animals, to establish a hierarchy among men. The struggle against fascism starts when we refuse to categorize people as superior and inferior. In front of a masterpiece there is no master and slave, it brings to men their real dimensions. Reminds them that all men are equal, that we are human. They can kill us, it is easy, but we have proven here in this ghetto that they will not break us, that we are still human.

8. ANALYSIS- A. MILLER'S ALL MY SONS (ENGLISH) IN CORY'S BOOKS/COURSES

The best example of an analysis of ethical dilemmas of a play, a course and a book by Jacques Cory is my analysis of Arthur Miller's All My Sons, that concludes my first book: Business Ethics: The Revolution of Minority Shareholders, published by Kluwer in 2001, pp. 238-241:

"The monumental play of Arthur Miller, All My Sons, can be treated as a case study in business ethics as it summarizes the principal themes of the book. From each scene one can draw a conclusion that refers to one of the chapters of the book. This book has tried to juxtapose professional literature on ethics, classical literature with ethical subjects, and real life cases of ethical dilemmas in American, French and Israeli companies. The conclusion of the book will be faithful to this method, which emphasizes the reality of fiction.

Joe Keller is a rich American industrial, who has sent during the war defective aircraft parts to the Air Force, causing the death of 21 pilots. His son, Larry, a pilot himself, who hears those news during the war, disappears with his aircraft. By the end of this unforgettable play, we learn that before dying, Larry has sent to his fiancée Ann a farewell letter explaining to her that he can no longer live with a guilty conscience of his father's crime. Joe is an ethics criminal, but legally he has managed to be acquitted. He returns home after the acquittal, and society exculpates him.

"Everybody knew I was getting out that day; the porches were loaded. Picture it now; none of them believed I was innocent. The story was, I pulled a fast one getting myself exonerated. So I get out of my car, and I walk down the street. But very slow. And with a smile. The beast! I was the beast, the guy who sold cracked cylinder heads to the Army Air Force; the guy who made twenty-one P-40's crash in Australia. Kid, walkin' down the street that day I was guilty as hell. Except, I wasn't, and there was a court paper in my pocket to prove I wasn't, and I walked... past... the porches. Result? Fourteen months later I had one of the best shops in the state again, a respected man again; bigger than ever." (Six Great Modern Plays, Arthur Miller, All My Sons, p. 381-2)

His environment forgives him, as he is rich, has a lot of nerve, is self-confident, he managed to outsmart the court, and who cares if he has caused the death of 21 pilots... Society is therefore an accessory to Joe Keller's crime, with its benevolence to ethics criminals. Conclusion, as long as society will let criminals get away with their ethical crimes and will not ostracize them, it will be very difficult to fight effectively ethical crimes, as the law will almost always exculpate the criminals, who are often the strongest and smartest, and have at their disposal the best lawyers and the largest funds.

Joe Keller, is worried that Ann intends to marry his son Chris, that Ann's father who was his partner and his crime accomplice is going to be released from prison, and that Ann's brother, George Deever, suspects his complicity. Joe tries to corrupt them by offering a job in his factory to George and to his father, they try to marry George with a friend, they embrace him with attention. When it does not succeed, Joe threatens George and blames his father for the crime he himself has committed. Conclusion, all is permitted to safeguard your interests - corruption, threats, deceit. You blame the others for your own crimes. The victims are the 'speculators' of Joe Keller, the lambs are treated as wolves, and the wolves are disguised as innocent grandmothers. From the moment we start to behave unethically, there are no more limits.

But one should nevertheless keep up appearances, even at the price of self deceit. Kate Keller, Joe's wife, who knows perfectly well that Joe is guilty, refuses to admit that Larry is dead, because if she admits it, it would mean that Joe had murdered his own son. She is therefore forced to oppose the wedding of Chris with Ann, as Larry has to remain alive and disappeared. It is her compromise with her conscience, but it is exactly this lie that is the basis of the denouement, as it is impossible to base your existence on lies. Her conscience allows her to admit that her husband has murdered 21 'anonymous' pilots, but does not let her admit that he murdered his own son, as if there was a difference between blood and blood. "Your brother's alive, darling, because if he's dead your father killed him. Do you understand me now? As long as you live, that boy is alive. God does not let a son be killed by his father." (Miller, All My Sons, p. 418)

Conclusion, one can always compromise with his conscience on all degrees of ethical and other crimes. Joe is convinced that he did not murdered the pilots, as he does not know them personally, he does not personify them, exactly like in Marcel Pagnol's Le Châli. We can commit a crime against Jean de Florette as he is a stranger, we can kill 21 pilots, we can wrong the rights of minority shareholders, as we do not know them, they are weak and cannot retaliate.

Chris, Joe's son who works with his father, suspects the culpability of his father. He is the member of the second generation of ethics criminals, a precursor of Michael, the son of Don Corleone, who has started his career with good intentions but who was ultimately corrupted by his environment. In 1947, the year Miller wrote his masterpiece, as in the year 2000, the ethical dilemma is the same. Chris appeases his conscience by saying that everything is permitted in the business world: "This is the land of the great big dogs, you don't love a man here, you eat him! That's the principle; the only one we live by – it just happened to kill a few people this time, that's all. The world's that way, how can I take it out on him? What sense does that make? This is a zoo, a zoo!" (Miller, All My Sons, p. 429) But even Chris has his scruples and he cannot solve the dilemma between his conscience and the love and respect he owes to his father.

And as Joe does not succeed in convincing his son Chris, he tries the well-known stratagem, by telling him that 'everybody does the same', therefore - vox populi vox dei, a doctrine that led to the most violent crimes in history, as you do not measure your conduct according to your conscience or ethics, but according to what you perceive or you fool yourself to believe are the norms of society: "Who worked for nothin' in that war? When they work for nothin', I'll work for nothin'. Did they ship a gun or a truck outa Detroit before they got their price? Is that clean? It's dollars and cents, nickels and dimes; war and peace, it's nickels and dimes, what's clean? Half the Goddam country is gotta go if I go!" (Miller, All My Sons, p. 430) And everybody continues to join the parade... Conclusion, everything is allowed if it is the norm of society even if it is unjust, as you cannot survive otherwise in the business world. Everything consists in dollars, francs or shekels, there is no other thing, war, peace, morals, ethics, family, friends, country. From the moment that we admit that everything is based on profits, everything is really permitted. It is therefore the complete bankruptcy of the business world, an obscure world, dangerous, merciless, without compassion, where everybody is a wolf to the other, where everything is allowed as long as you earn nickels and dimes.

At the end of the play, Joe learns that his son Larry has not disappeared but has committed suicide, without being able to forgive his father on his crime and assassination of 21 pilots, and his last words in his farewell letter to Ann are - that if he could he would have killed his own father for what he did. Joe is at last affected by his crime, which is personalized by the curse of his son. He quits his wife and his life, and before committing suicide he says: "Sure, he was my son. But I think to him they were all my sons. And I guess they were, I guess they were." (Miller, All My Sons, p. 432). Conclusion, from the moment that you admit that all are your sons and brothers, that you should not do unto the other what you would not want to be done to you, we return to the biblical, philosophical and literary precepts of love of others, which should be at the basis of the business world, and destroy the last vestiges of autocracy and cannibalism, of belligerence and corruption. In a world where 'cut throat competition' is a leit motive, where 'street fighter' is a hero, where the CEO is king, and where there are no scruples, one always murders ultimately his son and one has to commit suicide, at least virtually, by suppressing his conscience and killing it completely.

And the moral of the play and the book, is in the last words of Chris: "You can be better! Once and for all you can know there's a universe of people outside and you're responsible to it, and unless you know that, you threw away your son because that's why he died." (Miller, All My Sons, p. 432) The conclusion in our context is that beyond the company, the board of directors, the executives and the majority shareholders, there are also the stakeholders, the employees, the suppliers, the customers, the community, the nation, and also the minority shareholders. From the moment you forget them, when you only see your own portrait in the silver mirror, when you disregard the world, the environment and others, when you are no longer responsible toward your brothers and you are looking only after your own interests, it is equivalent to the murder of your own sons. And those of us who do not want to murder their sons, their conscience, their neighbors, have to resort to ethics that will guide them to a happy life, as maintained by Aristotle, a life of moderation, psychological, spiritual, and emotional equilibrium, that maybe will not give them the maximum profitability but will ensure them a successful combination of profitability with a peace of mind. The majority, the privileged, the people who control society have already reached the conclusion that the best way to govern a country is through democracy, where every minority, the weak and the underprivileged have also a fair share of the country governance."

Arthur Asher Miller (October 17, 1915 – February 10, 2005) was a prolific American playwright, essayist, and prominent figure in twentieth-century American theatre. Among his most popular plays are All My Sons (1947), Death of a Salesman (1949), The Crucible (1953) and A View from the Bridge (1955, revised 1956). He also wrote several screenplays and was most noted for his work on The Misfits (1961). The drama Death of a Salesman is often numbered on the short list of finest American plays in the 20th century alongside Long Day's Journey into Night and A Streetcar Named Desire. Miller was often in the public eye, particularly during the late 1940s, 1950s and early 1960s. During this time, he was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for Drama; testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee; and was married to Marilyn Monroe. He received the Prince of Asturias Award and the Praemium Imperiale prize in 2002 and the Jerusalem Prize in 2003, as well as the Dorothy and Lillian Gish Lifetime Achievement Award and the Pulitzer Prize. In 1947, Miller's play All My Sons, the writing of which had commenced in 1941, was a success on Broadway (earning him his first Tony Award, for Best Author) and his reputation as a playwright was established. Years later, in a 1994 interview with Ron Rifkin, Miller said that most contemporary critics regarded All My Sons as "a very depressing play in a time of great optimism" and that positive reviews from Brooks Atkinson of The New York Times had saved it from failure. In 1948, Miller built a small studio in Roxbury, Connecticut. There, in less than a day, he wrote Act I of Death of a Salesman. Within six weeks, he completed the rest of the play, one of the classics of world theater.^{[12][24]} Death of a Salesman premiered on Broadway on February 10, 1949 at the Morosco Theatre, directed by Elia Kazan, and starring Lee J. Cobb as Willy Loman, Mildred Dunnock as Linda, Arthur Kennedy as Biff, and Cameron Mitchell as Happy. The play was commercially successful and critically acclaimed, winning a Tony Award for Best Author, the New York Drama Circle Critics' Award, and the Pulitzer Prize for Drama. It was the first play to win all three of these major awards. The play was performed 742 times.

9. CORY'S FIRST MEMORY – EDMOND ROSTAND'S PLAY L'AIGLON (FRENCH)

My earliest memory was of a play I saw with my parents at the age of 3 or 4. La Comédie Française, the best French theater, has come on tour to Cairo, the French Diaspora, with Edmond Rostand's L'Aiglon. A very long play of more than 3 hours with 6 acts, yet for the young boy it was a revelation, the best childhood experience I ever had, and I remembered well the play, staying awake until the end, and hearing among the last verses of the play, those immortal lines of L'Aiglon. L'Aiglon is a play in six acts by Edmond Rostand based on the life of Napoleon II, who was the son of Emperor Napoleon I and his second wife, Empress Marie Louise. The title of the play comes from a nickname for Napoleon II, the French word for "eaglet" (a young eagle). The title role was created by Sarah Bernhardt in the play's premiere on 15 March 1900 at the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt. In October of the same year, the play (in an English translation by Louis N. Parker) premiered at New York's Knickerbocker Theatre, with Maude Adams in the title role. Its first performance in London was at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1901, with Bernhardt again playing the leading role. Rostand had written L'Aiglon specifically for Bernhardt, and it became one of her signature roles. Arthur Honegger and Jacques Ibert composed an opera in five acts, also with the title L'Aiglon, to a libretto by Henri Cain, based on Rostand's play. It was first performed at the Opéra de Monte-Carlo in 1937.

Napoleon II, the son of the emperor, died in Vienna, sick and hopeless. He says that he lived between his cradle and his death bed, without encountering any glory. History will not remember the sick young prince, but will always recall the baby who held the globe as a ball. Before dying, L'Aiglon forgives his mother who betrayed his father, left him to return with the child to Vienna, to her father the Emperor. But then he forgives the Empress...

*“Oh! comme mon berceau touche mon lit de mort!
(Il met la main entre le berceau et le lit en murmurant :)
Ma vie est là dans la ruelle.
[...]Et le sort,
Dans la ruelle mince - oh! trop mince et trop noire!-
N'a pu laisser tomber une épingle de gloire!”*

Alas ! how near my cradle to my death-bed !

[He points to the gap between the cradle and the bed.]

And all my life lies in that narrow space !

THERESA.

Oh!

THE DUKE.

In that gap, too narrow and too dark,
Fate ne'er let fall a single pin of glory.
Lay me upon the bed.

“Et l'Histoire, d'ailleurs, ne se souviendra pas

*Du prince que brûlaient toutes les grandes fièvres...
 Mais elle reverra, dans sa voiture aux chèvres,
 L'enfant au col brodé qui, rose, grave, et blond, Tient le globe du monde ainsi qu'un gros ballon!"*

*"Inspirez-moi, mon Dieu,
 La parole profonde et cependant légère
 Avec laquelle on peut pardonner à sa mère!"*
*"(Vivement, et posant avec une noblesse infinie la main sur les cheveux de Marie Louise agenouillée.)
 De l'Impératrice!
 (A ce mot qui pardonne et qui la recouronne, la mère éclate en sanglots.)"*

I tried to find a record of this performance during many hours on the Internet, the only thing that I found was that the Comedie Francaise was on tour in Cairo in 1950 (in this case it was not my earliest memory as I was six years old), and that Jean Weber who was most of his life an actor at the Comedie Francaise acted in L'Aiglon in 1949 at the Theatre des Celestins and in 1950 at the Theatre Sarah Bernhardt, but not at the Comedie Francaise, although of course he played the role of Napoleon II L'Aiglon in a film of 1931 when he was 25. Sarah Bernhardt, the best known French actress, was the first actor of L'Aiglon in 1900 at the age of 56 and she continued to play the role until she was 70, although the role is of a young man aged 21. I saw also several times the best known play of Edmond Rostand Cyrano de Bergerac (play/film).

I saw many performances at the Comedie Francaise when I studied at Insead in 1967 and 1968, and later on when I came to Paris on business, tourism, or for my PhD dissertation, and to many other theaters as well, most of it excellent theaters, with unforgettable plays, remarkable actors and directors, performing the best classical and modern plays. I remembered most my visit at the Odeon, where Jean-Louis Barrault directed the best plays, and he acted with his wife Madeleine Renaud. In the past Barrault performed there in 1960 the premiere of Ionesco's Rhinoceros. He was Berenger and directed the play. On the same year he was Cassius in Julius Caesar, Trofimov in Tchekhov's The Cherry Orchard, and also played in a comedy by Feydeau. But in May 1968, during the Students' Revolution in Paris, where I participated, Barrault opened his theater l'Odeon to the students who occupied it during a month. I was there, of course, and I heard Barrault trying to explain to the students that his theater was relevant in the class struggle and was not a frozen vestige of the past, irrelevant to the sufferings of French society, students and workers. What a long way for Cory, since L'Aiglon and the Lycee in Cairo...

10. BEST BUSINESS ETHICS NOTION: AN ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE (NORWEGIAN)

In order to summarize this chapter on Plays, we chose to bring the last lines of An Enemy of the People in Norwegian and English. No play has succeeded to give the reader and viewer a better notion on business ethics than this play, which I have seen several times in Israel and abroad, read many times in Norwegian and other languages (Ibsen wrote it in Danish...), seen the film in an English version with Steve McQueen (!) and in an Indian version (with a happy ending...), taught it to my students, showing them extracts of the plays and films. Ibsen wrote the play in 1882, describing Norway which was extremely unethical. Yet, a hundred years later, Norway is the most ethical country in the world, due in a large part to Ibsen's play. Ibsen, who was ostracized in his country and had to work abroad in Italy and Germany, was the forefather of modern ethics, like the Jewish prophets thousands of years ago. Outside Scandinavia, in the US, Israel and neoliberal countries, teachers of business ethics continue to be ostracized or marginalized, but ethics will prevail everywhere not in 100 years, but hopefully within 10 years.

Ibsen illustrates in a dramatic way the ethical dilemma of Dr. Stockman, the officer of the municipal Baths, who has discovered that the water of the Baths is polluted, and announces it publicly at the risk of alienating himself from his whole town, which could be ruined as a result of his discovery. He is indeed called The Enemy of the Public, dismissed from his job and ostracized by his community. In a decisive confrontation with the citizens' assembly, Dr. Stockman maintains that the majority has not the monopoly over truth and morality, and he advocates with vehemence the right of the minority to embrace the truth, which can be opposed to that of the majority, but which nevertheless is the unique moral truth, over which he will fight without heeding the consequences. Stockman, the individualist, who fights alone against everybody else, has even a predestined name very relevant to this book, as he is called stockman, the man with a stock, the individual shareholder.

"I propose to raise a revolution against the lie that the majority has the monopoly of the truth. What sort of truths are they that the majority usually supports? They are truths that are of such advanced age that they are beginning to brake up. And if a truth is as old as that, it is also in a fair way to become a lie, gentlemen. (Laughter and mocking cries.) Yes, believe me or not as you like; but truths are by no means as long-lived as Methuselah – as some folk imagine. A normally constituted truth lives, let us say, as a rule seventeen or eighteen, or at most twenty years; seldom longer. But truths as aged as that are always worn frightfully thin, and nevertheless it is only then that the majority recognizes them and recommends them to the community as wholesome moral nourishment. These 'majority truths' are like last year's cured meat – like rancid, tainted ham; and they are the origin of the moral scurvy that is rampant in our communities." (Ibsen, An Enemy of the People, p. 256-7)

If the majority of businessmen maintains that you cannot argue with success and that everything is permitted to obtain this success, there could still exist a minority that maintains that the absolute value is ethics and it is despicable to succeed by despoiling the rights of minority shareholders, stakeholders and, ultimately, everybody. The author of this book believes that this minority is probably right. They will ridicule us as they have done to Don Quixote, they will fight us as they have done to The Enemy of the People, but finally, the truth of the minority will be perceived as self-evident, as democracy, as Human Rights, as equality of mankind, black, yellow or white, men and women, Christians, Muslims or Jews, Americans, French, British, Dutch or Israelis. The play ends with the following lines brought here in Norwegian and English.

MORTEN

Men hvad skal vi gøre, når vi er ble't fri og fornemme mænd da?

DOKTOR STOCKMANN

Da skal I jage alle gråbenene over til det fjerne vesten, gutter!

Ejlif ser noget betænkelig ud; Morten hopper og råber hurra.

FRU STOCKMANN

Ak, bare det ikke blir disse her gråbenene, som jager dig, Tomas.

DOKTOR STOCKMANN

Er du rent gal, Katrine! Jage mig! Nu, da jeg er byens stærkeste mand!

FRU STOCKMANN

Den stærkeste – nu?

DOKTOR STOCKMANN

Ja, jeg tør sige så stort et ord, at nu er jeg en af de stærkeste mænd i hele verden.

MORTEN

Å nej da!

DOKTOR STOCKMANN sænker stemmen

Hys; I skal ikke tale om det endnu; men jeg har gjort en stor opdagelse.

FRU STOCKMANN

Nu igen?

DOKTOR STOCKMANN

Ja visst, ja visst! (samler dem om sig og siger fortrolig) Sagen er den, ser I, at den stærkeste mand i verden, det er han, som står mest alene.

FRU STOCKMANN smiler og ryster på hodet

Å du Tomas –!

PETRA trøstsig, griber hans hænder

Far!

Morten. And what are we going to do, when you have made liberal-minded and high-minded men of us?

Dr. Stockmann. Then you shall drive all the wolves out of the country, my boys!
(EJLIF looks rather doubtful about it; MORTEN jumps about crying "Hurrah!")

Mrs. Stockmann. Let us hope it won't be the wolves that will drive you out of the country, Thomas.

Dr. Stockmann. Are you out of your mind, Katherine? Drive me out! Now—when I am the strongest man in the town!

Mrs. Stockmann. The strongest—now?

Dr. Stockmann. Yes, and I will go so far as to say that now I am the strongest man in the whole world.

Morten. I say!

Dr. Stockmann (lowering his voice). Hush! You mustn't say anything about it yet; but I have made a great discovery.

Mrs. Stockmann. Another one?

Dr. Stockmann. Yes. (Gathers them round him, and says confidentially:) It is this, let me tell you—that the strongest man in the world is he who stands most alone.

Mrs. Stockmann (smiling and shaking her head). Oh, Thomas, Thomas!

Petra (encouragingly, as she grasps her father's hands). Father!

Henrik Johan Ibsen (20 March 1828 – 23 May 1906) was a major 19th-century Norwegian playwright, theatre director, and poet. He is often referred to as "the father of realism" and is one of the founders of Modernism in theatre. His major works include Brand, Peer Gynt, An Enemy of the People, Emperor and Galilean, A Doll's House, Hedda Gabler, Ghosts, The Wild Duck, Rosmersholm, and The Master Builder. He is the most frequently performed dramatist in the world after Shakespeare, and A Doll's House became the world's most performed play by the early 20th century. Several of his later dramas were considered scandalous to many of his era, when European theatre was expected to model strict morals of family life and propriety. Ibsen's later work examined the realities that lay behind many façades, revealing much that was disquieting to many contemporaries. It utilized a critical eye and free inquiry into the conditions of life and issues of morality. The poetic and cinematic early play Peer Gynt, however, has strong surreal elements. Ibsen is often ranked as one of the truly great playwrights in the European tradition. Richard Hornby describes him as "a profound poetic dramatist—the best since Shakespeare". He is widely regarded as the most important playwright since Shakespeare. He influenced other playwrights and novelists such as George Bernard Shaw, Oscar Wilde, Arthur Miller, James Joyce, Eugene O'Neill and Miroslav Krleža. Ibsen was nominated for the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1902, 1903 and 1904. Ibsen wrote his plays in Danish (the common written language of Denmark and Norway) and they were published by the Danish publisher Gyldendal. Although most of his plays are set in Norway—often in places reminiscent of Skien, the port town where he grew up—Ibsen lived for 27 years in Italy and Germany, and rarely visited Norway during his most productive years. Born into a merchant family connected to the patriciate of Skien, his dramas were shaped by his family background. He was the father of Prime Minister Sigurd Ibsen. Ibsen's dramas continue in their influence upon contemporary culture and film with notable film productions including A Doll's House featuring Jane Fonda and A Master Builder featuring Wallace Shawn.

It was a pleasure visiting Scandinavia, Norway – beautiful Oslo, rainy Bergen, the Fjords, enjoying especially Flom, where me and my family spent a few days; Sweden – Goteborg, beautiful Stockholm trying to figure the recent event where Cory's in-law Dan Shechtman received the Chemistry Nobel-prize, the museums, the streets, the palaces; Finland where we visited Helsinki and a farm nearby; Denmark – wonderful Copenhagen, that I describe as the paradise on earth as everything there is perfect, ethical, beautiful, the people, the scenery, the palaces, culture, ecology, and Denmark but also Sweden, Finland, Norway, get the best scores on all the parameters, except the climate of Scandinavia where it rains and is cold most of the time.

11. MODERN PLAYS IN OTHER LANGUAGES: PIRANDELLO, LORCA, STRINDBERG, CHEKHOV, PLAYS/TRANSLATIONS IN LADINO, CATALAN, PORTUGUESE, LATIN, HAITIAN, ROMANIAN, ICELANDIC, ESPERANTO, ASTURIAN, RUMANTSCH, GASCON

11.1 INTRODUCTION TO MODERN PLAYS AND TRANSLATIONS IN 21 LANGUAGES

I enjoy most modern plays (which I define as written after 1850, as I am so old fashioned that modern for me starts more than 150 years ago), but seriously I enjoy most avant garde plays by authors of my generation and my parents' generation, written since 1920: Sartre, Ionesco, Miller, Williams, Billetdoux, Albee, O'Neil, O'Casey, Pagnol, Odets, Lorca, Pirandello, Anouilh, Girandoux, Brecht, Genet, Levin, Sobol, Shamir, Pinter, Beckett, Bergman, Camus, Cocteau, Durrenmatt, Kishon, Gide, Moravia, Diamant. But I enjoy also very much playwrights from the two older generations, written from 1850 to 1920 – Ibsen, Strindberg, Rostand, Chekhov, Shaw, Wilde, Sholom Aleikhem. I enjoy most all those playwrights, but honestly I appreciate and admire very much all the other playwrights as well and I read and see their plays with sheer pleasure: Shakespeare, Corneille, Moliere, Hugo, Racine, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, Lope de Vega, Tirso de Molina, Virgil (The Aeneid), Calderon, Dumas fils, Goethe, Seneca, Gogol, Pushkin, Schiller, Beaumarchais, Chaucer, Dante (The Divine Comedy), Homer (The Iliad and Odyssey), etc. They are all my sons (or my fathers) and I enjoy reading all of them, but especially the newborns (I mean after 1850...). I read most of those playwrights in their original language – French, English, Spanish, Italian, Hebrew, Ladino, Yiddish, German, but I read all the plays in Russian, Norwegian/Danish (Ibsen wrote in Danish), Swedish, Greek and Latin in translations, as I read them before learning their languages, but even now it takes me a lot of time to read Ibsen in Norwegian and I do it only when I have enough time and patience.

Yet, It is very easy to read plays in foreign languages as there are no long descriptions and the dialogues are colloquial, in prose and in a simple language, especially in modern plays since 1850. I brought above texts of modern plays in English - All My Sons by Arthur Miller, French - L'Aiglon by Rostand, Norwegian - An Enemy of the People by Ibsen, Yiddish - The Dybbuk by Ansky (in the Yiddish chapter of Linguistics), German - The Threepenny Opera by Brecht, Hebrew - Ghetto by Sobol. Out of the plays in my library and on the Internet in 30 languages, we'll bring now extracts from modern plays in Italian by Pirandello - Six Characters in Search of an Author, Spanish by Lorca - The House of Bernarda Alba, Swedish by Strindberg - Miss Julie, Russian by Chekhov - Three Sisters, Ladino by Avraam Papo - The Vineyard of Navot, Catalan by Guimera - Terra Baixa, Portuguese by Garrett - Frei Luis de Sousa, Latin by Seneca - Medea (well, he may be dead for a long time, but his plays are as modern as ever), and modern translations of classical plays – Athalie by Racine in Ladino, Tartuffe by Moliere in Haitian and Romanian, Shakespeare - The Tempest in Esperanto and Romeo and Juliet in Icelandic. To this list we add finally three more languages – an original play in Asturian – Juan Looks for a Servant and Nothing Else by Pachin de Melas, an original play in Gascon – La Pastoral de Paisan by J.H.Fondeville, and a translation into Rumantsch of Francesca da Rimini by Silvio Pellico, with the Italian original. An outstanding cosmopolitan collection of a sample of the best plays and translations, altogether 21 plays in 21 languages, giving the gist of the dramas in each of those languages, modern classics staged all over the world and translated into dozens of languages, loved by millions, what can be more rewarding than to read in this book extracts of such masterpieces in their original languages and translations – All My Sons, L'Aiglon, An Enemy of the People, The Dybbuk, The Threepenny Opera, Ghetto, Six Characters in Search of an Author, The House of Bernarda Alba, Miss Julie, Three Sisters, Medea, Athalie, Tartuffe, The Tempest, Romeo & Juliet, to specific audiences masterpieces in Portuguese, Catalan, Asturian, Ladino, Gascon, and translation into Romanian, Haitian, Esperanto, Rumantsch, Icelandic...

11.2 SEI PERSONAGGI IN CERCA D'AUTORE/SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR BY LUIGI PIRANDELLO IN ITALIAN AND ENGLISH

Thus, one of the first books that I read in Italian was Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore/Six characters in search of an author, by Luigi Pirandello. It is one of my favorite plays, as in plays in contrast to music and art, I enjoy most avant garde plays. I bring here the final scene, which is easy to understand, and I could read the play without the assistance of a dictionary or translation. There is only one problem, as you can notice the translation is not identical to the original...

Costernazione generale. La Madre, spaventata, cercherà di interporsi, di separarli.

La madre (c.s.). Per carità! Per carità!

Il padre (senza lasciarlo). Devi obbedire! Devi obbedire!

Il figlio (colluttando con lui e alla fine buttandolo a terra presso la scaletta, tra l'orrore di tutti). Ma che cos'è codesta frenesia che t'ha preso? Non ha ritegno di portare davanti a tutti la sua vergogna e la nostra! Io non mi presto! non mi presto! E interpreto così la volontà di chi non volle portarci sulla scena!

Il capocomico. Ma se ci siete venuti!

Il figlio (additando il Padre). Lui, non io!

Il capocomico. E non è qua anche lei?

Il figlio. C'è voluto venir lui, trascinandoci tutti e prestandosi anche a combinare di là insieme con lei non solo quello che è realmente avvenuto; ma come se non bastasse, anche quello che non c'è stato!

Il capocomico. Ma dica, dica lei almeno che cosa c'è stato! Lo dica a me! Se n'è uscito dalla sua camera, senza dir nulla?

Il figlio (dopo un momento d'esitazione). Nulla. Proprio, per non fare una scena!

Il capocomico (incitandolo). Ebbene, e poi? che ha fatto?

Il figlio (tra l'angosciata attenzione di tutti, muovendo alcuni passi sul palcoscenico). Nulla... Attraversando il giardino... S'interromperà, fosco, assorto.

Il capocomico (spingendolo sempre più a dire, impressionato dal ritegno di lui). Ebbene? attraversando il giardino?

Il figlio (esasperato, nascondendo il volto con un braccio). Ma perché mi vuol far dire, signore? È orribile!

La Madre tremerà tutta, con gemiti soffocati, guardando verso la vasca.

Il capocomico (piano, notando quello sguardo, si rivolgerà al Figlio con crescente apprensione). La bambina?

Il figlio (guardando davanti a sè, nella sala). Là, nella vasca...

Il padre (a terra, indicando pietosamente la Madre). E lei lo seguiva, signore!

Il capocomico (al Figlio, con ansia). E allora, lei?

Il figlio (lentamente, sempre guardando davanti a sè). Accorsi; mi precipitai per ripescarla... Ma a un tratto m'arrestai, perché dietro quegli alberi vidi una cosa che mi gelò: il ragazzo, il ragazzo che se ne stava lì fermo, con occhi da pazzo, a guardare nella vasca la sorellina affogata.

La Figliastra, rimasta curva presso la vasca a nascondere la Bambina, risponderà come un'eco dal fondo, singhiozzando perdutoamente. Pausa.

Feci per accostarmi; e allora...

Rintronerà dietro gli alberi, dove il Giovinetto è rimasto nascosto, un colpo di rivoltella.

La madre (con un grido straziante, accorrendo col Figlio e con tutti gli Attori in mezzo al subbuglio generale). Figlio! Figlio mio!

E poi, fra la confusione e le grida sconnesse degli altri:

Ajuto! Ajuto!

Il capocomico (tra le grida, cercando di farsi largo, mentre il Giovinetto sarà sollevato da capo e da piedi e trasportato via, dietro la tenda bianca). S'è ferito? s'è ferito davvero?

Tutti, tranne il Capocomico e il Padre, rimasto per terra presso la scaletta, saranno scomparsi dietro il fondalino abbassato, che fa da cielo, e vi resteranno un po' parlottando angosciosamente, poi, da una parte e dall'altra di esso, rientreranno in iscena gli Attori.

La prima attrice (rientrando da destra, addolorata). È morto! Povero ragazzo! È morto! Oh che cosa!

Il primo attore (rientrando da sinistra, ridendo). Ma che morto! Finzione! finzione! Non ci creda!

Altri attori da destra. Finzione? Realtà! realtà! È morto!

Altri attori da sinistra. No! Finzione! Finzione!

Il padre (levandosi e gridando tra loro). Ma che finzione! Realtà, realtà, signori! realtà!

E scomparirà anche lui, disperatamente, dietro il fondalino.

Il capocomico (non potendone più). Finzione! realtà! Andate al diavolo tutti quanti! Luce! Luce! Luce!

D'un tratto, tutto il palcoscenico e tutta la sala del teatro sfolgoreranno di vivissima luce. Il capocomico rifiaterà come liberato da un incubo, e tutti si guarderanno negli occhi, sospesi e smarriti.

Ah! Non m'era mai capitata una cosa simile! Mi hanno fatto perdere una giornata!

Guarderà l'orologio.

Andate, andate! Che volete più fare adesso? Troppo tardi per ripigliare la prova. A questa sera!

E appena gli Attori se ne saranno andati, salutandolo:

Ehi, elettricista, spegni tutto!

Non avrà finito di dirlo, che il teatro piomberà per un attimo nella più fitta oscurità.

Eh, perdio! Lasciami almeno accesa una lampadina, per vedere dove metto i piedi!

Subito, dietro il fondalino, come per uno sbaglio d'attacco, s'accenderà un riflettore verde, che proietterà, grandi e spiccate, le ombre dei Personaggi, meno il Giovinetto e la Bambina. Il Capocomico, vedendole, schizzerà via dal palcoscenico, atterrito. Contemporaneamente si spegnerà il riflettore dietro il fondalino, e si rifarà sul palcoscenico il notturno azzurro di prima. Lentamente, dal lato destro della tela verrà prima avanti il Figlio, seguito dalla Madre con le braccia protese verso di lui; poi dal lato sinistro il Padre. Si fermeranno a metà del palcoscenico, rimanendo lì come forme trasognate. Verrà fuori, ultima, da sinistra, la Figliastra che correrà verso una delle scalette; sul primo scalino si fermerà un momento a guardare gli altri tre e scoppierà in una stridula risata, precipitandosi poi giù per la scaletta; correrà attraverso il corridoio tra le poltrone; si fermerà ancora una volta e di nuovo riderà, guardando i tre rimasti lassù; scomparirà dalla sala, e ancora, dal ridotto, se ne udrà la risata. Poco dopo calerà la tela.

FINE

[The MOTHER, frightened, tries to separate them.]

The Mother [pleading]. Please! please!

The Father [not leaving hold of the SON]. You've got to obey, do you hear?

The Son [almost crying from rage]. What does it mean, this madness you've got? [They separate.] Have you no decency, that you insist on showing everyone our shame? I won't do it! I won't! And I stand for the will of our author in this. He didn't want to put us on the stage, after all!

The Manager. Man alive! You came here . .

The Son [indicating FATHER]. He did! I didn't!

The Manager. Arent't you here now?

The Son. It was his wish, and he dragged us along with him. He's told you not only the things that did happen, but also things that have never happened at all.

The Manager. Well, tell me then what did happen. You went out of your room without saying a word?

The Son. Without a word, so as to avoid a scene!

The Manager. And then what did you do?

The Son. Nothing . . . walking in the garden . . . [Hesitates for a moment with expression of gloom.]

The Manager [coming closer to him, interested by his extraordinary reserve]. Well, well . . . walking in the garden . . .

The Son [exasperated]. Why on earth do you insist? It's horrible! [The MOTHER trembles, sobs, and looks towards the fountain.]

The Manager [slowly observing the glance and turning towards the SON with increasing apprehension]. The baby?

The Son. There in the fountain . . .

The Father [pointing with tender pity to the MOTHER]. She was following him at the moment . . .

The Manager [to the SON anxiously]. And then you . . .

The Son. I ran over to her; I was jumping in to drag her out when I saw something that froze my blood . . . the boy standing stock still, with eyes like a madman's, watching his little drowned sister, in the fountain! [The STEP-DAUGHTER bends over the fountain to hide the CHILD. She sobs.] Then . . . [A revolver shot rings out behind the trees where the BOY is hidden.]

The Mother [with a cry of terror runs over in that direction together with several of the ACTORS amid general confusion]. My son! My son! [Then amid the cries and exclamations one hears her voice.] Help! Help!

The Manager [pushing the ACTORS aside while THEY lift up the BOY and carry him off.] Is he really wounded?

Some Actors. He's dead! dead!

Other Actors. No, no, it's only make believe, it's only pretence!

The Father [with a terrible cry]. Pretence? Reality, sir, reality!

The Manager. Pretence? Reality? To hell with it all! Never in my life has such a thing happened to me. I've lost a whole day over these people, a whole day!

Curtain.

11.3 LA CASA DE BERNARDA ALBA/THE HOUSE OF BERNARDA ALBA BY FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA IN SPANISH AND ENGLISH

I enjoy very much reading Federico Garcia Lorca in Spanish, he is one of my favorite playwrights, and I've seen many of his plays, but unfortunately not in Spain. One of his best plays is La casa de Bernarda Alba/The House of Bernarda Alba, here we bring the final scene:

Aparece Bernarda. Sale en enaguas con un mantón negro.)

Bernarda: Quietas, quietas. ¡Qué pobreza la mía, no poder tener un rayo entre los dedos!

Martirio: (Señalando a Adela.) ¡Estaba con él! ¡Mira esas enaguas llenas de paja de trigo!

Bernarda: ¡Esa es la cama de las mal nacidas! (Se dirige furiosa hacia Adela.)

Adela: (Haciéndole frente.) ¡Aquí se acabaron las voces de presidio! (Adela arrebató un bastón a su madre y lo parte en dos.) Esto hago yo con la vara de la dominadora. No dé usted un paso más. ¡En mí no manda nadie más que Pepe!

(Sale Magdalena.)

Magdalena: ¡Adela!

(Salen la Poncia y Angustias.)

Adela: Yo soy su mujer. (A Angustias.) Entérate tú y ve al corral a decírselo. Él dominará toda esta casa. Ahí fuera está, respirando como si fuera un león.

Angustias: ¡Dios mío! Bernarda: ¡La escopeta! ¿Dónde está la escopeta? (Sale corriendo.)

(Aparece Amelia por el fondo, que mira aterrada, con la cabeza sobre la pared. Sale detrás Martirio.)

Adela: ¡Nadie podrá conmigo! (Va a salir.)

Angustias: (Sujetándola.) De aquí no sales con tu cuerpo en triunfo, ¡ladrona! ¡deshonra de nuestra casa!

Magdalena: ¡Déjala que se vaya donde no la veamos nunca más!

(Suena un disparo.)

Bernarda: (Entrando.) Atrévete a buscarlo ahora.

Martirio: (Entrando.) Se acabó Pepe el Romano.

Adela: ¡Pepe! ¡Dios mío! ¡Pepe! (Sale corriendo.)

La Poncia: ¿Pero lo habéis matado?

Martirio: ¡No! ¡Salió corriendo en la jaca!

Bernarda: No fue culpa mía. Una mujer no sabe apuntar.

Magdalena: ¿Por qué lo has dicho entonces?

Martirio: ¡Por ella! Hubiera volcado un río de sangre sobre su cabeza.

La Poncia: Maldita.

Magdalena: ¡Endemoniada!

Bernarda: Aunque es mejor así. (Se oye como un golpe.) ¡Adela! ¡Adela!

La Poncia: (En la puerta.) ¡Abre!

Bernarda: Abre. No creas que los muros defienden de la vergüenza.

Criada: (Entrando.) ¡Se han levantado los vecinos!

Bernarda: (En voz baja, como un rugido.) ¡Abre, porque echaré abajo la puerta! (Pausa. Todo queda en silencio) ¡Adela! (Se retira de la puerta.) ¡Trae un martillo! (La Poncia da un empujón y entra. Al entrar da un grito y sale.) ¿Qué?

La Poncia: (Se lleva las manos al cuello.) ¡Nunca tengamos ese fin!

(Las hermanas se echan hacia atrás. La Criada se santigua. Bernarda da un grito y avanza.)

La Poncia: ¡No entres!

Bernarda: No. ¡Yo no! Pepe: irás corriendo vivo por lo oscuro de las alamedas, pero otro día caerás. ¡Descolgarla! ¡Mi hija ha muerto virgen! Llevadla a su cuarto y vestirla como si fuera doncella. ¡Nadie dirá nada! ¡Ella ha muerto virgen! Avisad que al amanecer den dos clamores las campanas.

Martirio: Dichosa ella mil veces que lo pudo tener.

Bernarda: Y no quiero llantos. La muerte hay que mirarla cara a cara. ¡Silencio! (A otra hija.) ¡A callar he dicho! (A otra hija.) Las lágrimas cuando estés sola. ¡Nos hundiremos todas en un mar de luto! Ella, la hija menor de Bernarda Alba, ha muerto virgen. ¿Me habéis oído? ¡Silencio, silencio he dicho! ¡Silencio!

Día viernes 19 de junio, 1936.

Telón rápido.

(Bernarda appears. She is wearing petticoats and a black shawl.)

BERNARDA: Quiet. Quiet. A pity I haven't a lightning bolt in my hand!

MARTIRIO: (Pointing at Adela) She was with him! Look at her petticoat covered with straw!

BERNARDA: A bed of straw is the bed of a whore! (She approaches Adela angrily.)

ADELA: (Confronting her) That's enough of your gaoler's voice! (She takes hold of her mother's walking stick and breaks it in half.) That's how I treat the tyrant's rod. Don't take another step. No one but Pepe can command me!

(Magdalena appears.)

MAGDALENA: Adela!

(La Poncia and Angustias enter.)

ADELA: I'm his woman. (To Angustias) Listen, go into the yard and tell him so. He'll rule this whole household. He's there now, breathing like a lion.

ANGUSTIAS: Dear God!

BERNARDA: The shotgun! Where's the shotgun? (She exits in haste)

(Amelia enters upstage, looking on in terror, her head against the wall. Martirio exits.)

ADELA: No one can stop me! (She starts to exit.)

ANGUSTIAS: (Restraining her) You'll not leave here in triumph, you thief, to dishonour our house!

MAGDALENA: Let her go: so that we'll never have to see her again!

(A gunshot is heard.)

BERNARDA: (Entering) Go on, look for him now if you dare!

MARTIRIO: (Entering) That's the last of Pepe el Romano.

ADELA: Pepe! My God! Pepe! (She rushes out.)

LA PONCIA: Did you finish him off?

MARTIRIO: No! He galloped off on his horse!

BERNARDA: It wasn't for want of trying. But we women are poor shots.

MAGDALENA: Why say such things, then!

MARTIRIO: For her benefit! I'd like to pour a whole river of blood over her head.

LA PONCIA: You witch.

MAGDALENA: You she-devil!

BERNARDA: It's better this way. (A thud is heard.) Adela! Adela!

LA PONCIA: (At the door.) Open up!

BERNARDA: Open up now. Don't think this house can hide your shame.

SERVANT: (Entering) You've woken the neighbours.

BERNARDA: (In a low harsh voice) Open the door, before I break it down! (Pause. Total silence.) Adela! (She moves away from the door.) Bring an axe! (La Poncia pushes open the door and goes inside. She utters a scream and reappears.) What is it?

LA PONCIA: (Clasping her hands to her throat) Pray God none of us may end like that!

(The sisters shrink back. The servant crosses herself. Bernarda gives a cry and steps forward.)

LA PONCIA: Don't go in!

BERNARDA: No. No, I shall not! Pepe: you may have fled for your life now through the dark branches, but one day you'll be brought low. Cut her down! My daughter died a virgin! Carry her to her room and dress her as a maiden. No one will dare say a word! She died a virgin! Tell them to ring the bells twice at dawn.

MARTIRIO: She was a thousand times fortunate: to have had him.

BERNARDA: And no tears. Death must be stared straight in the face. Silence! (To another daughter) Silence, I say! (To another) You can shed tears when you're alone. We'll drown ourselves in a sea of mourning! She, the youngest of Bernarda Alba's daughters died a virgin. Do you hear? Silence, Silence I say! Silence!

Curtain

Federico del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús García Lorca, known as Federico García Lorca (5/6/1898 – 19/8/1936) was a Spanish poet, playwright, and theatre director. García Lorca achieved international recognition as an emblematic member of the Generation of '27. The Generation of '27 was a group consisting of mostly poets who introduced the tenets of European movements (such as symbolism, futurism, and surrealism) into Spanish literature. He was executed by Nationalist forces at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War. His body has never been found. In 2008, a Spanish judge opened an investigation into Lorca's death. The García Lorca family eventually dropped objections to the excavation of a potential gravesite near Alfacar, but no human remains were found. While touring with La Barraca, García Lorca wrote his now best-known plays, the Rural Trilogy of Bodas de Sangre (Blood Wedding), Yerma and La Casa de Bernarda Alba (The House of Bernarda Alba), which all rebelled against the norms of bourgeois Spanish society. He called for a rediscovery of the roots of European theatre and the questioning of comfortable conventions such as the popular drawing room comedies of the time. His work challenged the accepted role of women in society and explored taboo issues of homoeroticism and class. García Lorca wrote little poetry in this last period of his life, declaring in 1936, "theatre is poetry that rises from the book and becomes human enough to talk and shout, weep and despair." Although Lorca's artwork doesn't receive attention he was also a keen artist.

11.4 FROEKEN JULIE/MISS JULIE BY AUGUST STRINDBERG IN SWEDISH & ENGLISH

Strindberg was for me a revelation. I love Ibsen, as he appeals to my brains, he is intellectual, a social fighter, but Strindberg is a master in the language of theater, he grasps you by the guts, something similar to the juxtaposition of Arthur Miller versus Tennessee Williams. In Miss Julie, nothing happens, or rather everything happens in the mind of Miss Julie, a modern masterpiece.

Det ringer två skarpa slag i klockan; Fröken störtar upp; Jean byter om rock.

JEAN

Greven är hemma! -Tänk om Kristin --- Går till talröret; knackar och lyss

FRÖKEN

Nu har han varit i chiffonjén?

JEAN

Det är Jean! herr greve!
Lyss (Obs.: åskådaren hör icke vad greven talar.)
Ja, herr greven!
Lyss.
Ja, herr greven! Straxt!
Lyss.
-Genast, herr greven!
Lyss.
-Jaha! Om en halv timme!

FRÖKEN

ytterligt ängslig.
Vad sa han? Herre Jesus, vad sa han?

JEAN

Han begärde sina stövlar och sitt kaffe om en halvtimme!

FRÖKEN

Alltså om en halv timme! åh, jag är så trött; jag förmår ingenting, förmår inte ångra mig, inte fly, inte stanna, inte leva - inte dö! Hjälp mig nu! Befall mig, och jag ska lyda som en hund! Gör mig den sista tjänsten, rädda min ära, rädda hans namn! Ni vet vad jag skulle vilja, men inte vill, vill det, ni, och befall mig utföra det!

JEAN

Jag vet inte - men nu kan jag inte heller - jag förstår inte - det är alldeles som om den här rocken gjorde att - jag inte kan befalla över er - och nu, sen greven talte till mig - så - jag kan inte redogöra för det riktigt - men - ah det är den djävla drängen som sitter i ryggen på mig! -Jag tror att om greven kom ner nu- och befallde mig skära halsen av mig, så skulle jag göra det på stället.

FRÖKEN

Låtsas då att ni är han, och jag är ni! - ni kunde ju spela nyss så bra, när ni låg på knä - då var ni adelsmannen - eller - har ni aldrig varit på teatern och sett magnetisören -

Jakande gest av Jean.

han säger åt subjektet: tag kvasten; han tar den; han säger: sopa, och den sopar---

JEAN

Då måste ju den andre sova!

FRÖKEN

extatisk.

Jag sover redan - hela rummet står som en rök för mig och ni ser ut som en järnkamin som liknar en svartklädd man i hög hatt - och era ögon lysa som kolen när elden går ut - och ert ansikte är en vit fläck som falaskan -

Solskenet har nu fallit in på golvet och lyser på Jean.

- det är så varmt och gott -

Hon gnuggar händerna som om hon värmdes framför en eld.

- och så ljust - och så lugnt!

JEAN

tar rakkniven och sätter i hennes hand.

Där är kvasten! Gå nu medan det är ljust - ut på logen - och ...

Viskar i hennes öra

FRÖKEN

vaken.

Tack! Nu går jag till vila! Men säg nu bara - att de främsta också kunna få nådens gåva. Säg det, om ni också inte tror det!

JEAN

De främsta? Nej, det kan jag inte! -Men vänta - fröken Julie -nu vet jag! -Ni är ju icke längre bland de främsta - då ni är bland de - yttersta!

FRÖKEN

Det är sant. -Jag är bland de allra yttersta; jag är den yttersta! åh! - Men nu kan jag icke gå - Säg en gång till att jag skall gå!

JEAN

Nej, nu kan inte jag heller! Jag kan inte!

FRÖKEN

Och de främsta skola vara de yttersta!

JEAN

Tänk inte, tänk inte! Ni tar ju all min kraft från mig också, så att jag blir feg - vad, jag tyckte klockan rörde sig! -Nej! Ska vi sätta papper i den! -- Att vara så rädd för en ringklocka! -Ja men det är inte bara en klocka - det sitter någon bakom den - en hand sätter den i rörelse - och något annat sätter handen i rörelse - men håll för örona bara - håll för örona! Ja så ringer han ändå värre! - ringer bara ända tills man svarar - och då är det för sent! och så kommer länsman - och så...

Två starka ringningar i klockan.

Jean far tillsammans; därpå rätar han upp sig.

Det är rysligt! Men det finns intet annat slut! -Gå!

Fröken går bestämt ut genom dörren. Riddå.

[Two sharp rings on bell are heard. Julie starts to her feet. Jean changes his coat.]

JEAN. The Count—has returned. Think if Kristin has— [Goes up to speaking tube and listens.]

JULIE. Now he has seen the desk!

JEAN [Speaking in the tube]. It is Jean, Excellency. [Listens]. Yes, Excellency. [Listens]. Yes, Excellency,—right away—immediately, Excellency. Yes—in half an hour.

JULIE [In great agitation]. What did he say? In Heaven's name, what did he say?

JEAN. He wants his boots and coffee in a half hour.

JULIE. In half an hour then. Oh, I'm so tired—I'm incapable of feeling, not able to be sorry, not able to go, not able to stay, not able to live—not able to die. Help me now. Command me—I will obey like a dog. Do me this last service—save my honor. Save his name. You know what I have the will to do—but cannot do. You will it and command me to execute your will.

JEAN. I don't know why—but now I can't either.—I don't understand myself. It is absolutely as though this coat does it—but I can't command you now. And since the Count spoke to me—I can't account for it—but oh, it is that damned servant in my back—I believe if the Count came in here now and told me to cut my throat I would do it on the spot.

JULIE. Make believe you are he—and I you. You could act so well a little while ago when you knelt at my feet. Then you were a nobleman—or haven't you ever been at the theatre and seen the hypnotist—[Jean nods] He says to his subject "Take the broom," and he takes it; he says, "Sweep," and he sweeps.

JEAN. Then the subject must be asleep!

JULIE [Ecstatically]. I sleep already. The whole room is like smoke before me—and you are like a tall black stove, like a man clad in black clothes with a high hat; and your eyes gleam like the hot coals when the fire is dying; and your face a white spot like fallen ashes. [The sunshine is coming in through the windows and falls on Jean. Julie rubs her hands as though warming them before a fire]. It is so warm and good—and so bright and quiet!

JEAN [Takes razor and puts it in her hand]. There is the broom, go now while it's bright—out to the hay loft—and—[He whispers in her ear.]

JULIE [Rousing herself]. Thanks. And now I go to rest. But tell me this—the foremost may receive the gift of Grace? Say it, even if you don't believe it.

JEAN. The foremost? No, I can't say that. But wait, Miss Julie—you are no longer among the foremost since you are of the lowliest.

JULIE. That's true, I am the lowliest—the lowliest of the lowly. Oh, now I can't go. Tell me once more that I must go.

JEAN. No, now I cannot either—I cannot.

JULIE. And the first shall be last— — —

JEAN. Don't think. You take my strength from me, too, so that I become cowardly.—What—I thought I heard the bell!— — No! To be afraid of the sound of a bell! But it's not the bell—it's someone behind the bell, the hand that sets the bell in motion—and something else that sets the hand in motion. But stop your ears, stop your ears. Then he will only ring louder and keep on ringing until it's answered—and then it is too late! Then come the police and then—[Two loud rings on bell are heard, Jean falls in a heap for a moment, but straightens up immediately.] It is horrible! But there is no other way. Go!

[Countess Julie goes out resolutely.] CURTAIN.

11.5 ТРИ СЕСТРЫ, TRI SESTRY, THREE SISTERS BY ANTON CHEKHOV IN RUSSIAN AND ENGLISH

I have seen so many times plays by Anton Chekhov, as Israel's theater is still very much influenced by the Russian theater and plays. Our national theater Habimah was established in Russia and from there the actors came to Israel and until the end they still spoke Hebrew with a Russian accent. Gesher, one of the best Israeli companies is managed, directed and mostly acted by Russian immigrants. I have seen Three Sisters several times and read it as well, but I want to tell the story of my son Amir who doesn't speak a word of French, still as he spent with me a couple of weeks in Paris, I took him to see plays and musicals in French. One of the nights we went to see the play in a small theater Le Theatre du Nord-Ouest. It is one of the best theaters in Paris, and as it is so small, they can afford to perform all the plays by well-known playwrights, you buy a subscription at a very low price and you can see all the plays by Racine, by Chekhov or by Sartre. I told Amir what was the plot of Three Sisters, warned him that the play is very long, about three hours, nothing melodramatic happens (unlike Cyrano for example), and he could be bored, but he was happy to experience the challenge. And, indeed he was moved to tears by the actresses who were magnificent, and he understood the play perfectly well by his senses rather than by his brains. But this was not the only time that I took him to see plays. When he was 13 I took him to a Bar Mitzvah trip to London, and there he saw every night for ten days plays by Shakespeare, Ibsen (Peer Gynt, no less), modern plays and musicals (Show Boat). In the morning we went to the best museums, and I allowed him once to go by himself to Madame Tussaud. When we came back to Israel, Amir was an intellectual, and since then he reads the best novels, sees the best plays and classic films. That is how I perceive education, you have to be assertive with your children, and direct them to the right path, and not be permissive and let the children decide what they want to do, without letting the parents interfere. Ruthy and me were quite successful in this respect. We try with less success to influence our grandchildren...

Входит Н а т а ш а .

Н а т а ш а (горничной). Что? С Софочкой посидит Протопопов, Михаил Иванович, а Бобика пусть покатает Андрей Сергееч. Столько хлопот с детьми... (Ирине.) Ты завтра уезжаешь, Ирина,— такая жалость. Останься еще хоть недельку. (Увидев Кулыгина, вскрикивает; тот смеется и снимает усы и бороду.) Ну вас совсем, испугали! (Ирине.) Я к тебе привыкла и расстаться с тобой, ты думаешь, мне будет легко? В твою комнату я велю переселить Андрея с его скрипкой — пусть там пилит! — а в его комнату мы поместим Софочку. Дивный, чудный ребенок! Что за девчурочка! Сегодня она посмотрела на меня своими глазками и — «мама»!

К у л ы г и н . Прекрасный ребенок, это верно.

Н а т а ш а . Значит, завтра я уже одна тут. (Вздыхает.) Велю прежде всего срубить эту еловую аллею, потом вот этот клен. По вечерам он такой страшный, некрасивый... (Ирине.) Милая, совсем не к лицу тебе этот пояс... Это безвкусица. Надо что-нибудь светленькое. И тут везде я велю понасажать цветочков, цветочков, и будет запах... (Строго.) Зачем здесь на скамье валяется вилка? (Проходя в дом, горничной.) Зачем здесь на скамье валяется вилка, я спрашиваю? (Кричит.) Молчать!

К у л ы г и н . Разошлась!

За сценой музыка играет марш; все слушают.

О л ь г а . Уходят.

Входит Ч е б у т ы к и н .

М а ш а . Уходят наши. Ну, что ж... Счастливым им путь! (Мужу.) Надо домой... Где моя шляпа и тальма...

К у л ы г и н . Я в дом отнес... Принесу сейчас. (Уходит в дом.)

О л ь г а . Да, теперь можно по домам. Пора.

Ч е б у т ы к и н . Ольга Сергеевна!

О л ь г а . Что?

Пауза.

Что?

Ч е б у т ы к и н . Ничего... Не знаю, как сказать вам... (Шепчет ей на ухо.)

О л ь г а (в испуге). Не может быть!

Ч е б у т ы к и н . Да... такая история... Утомился я, замучился, больше не хочу говорить... (С досадой.) Впрочем, все равно!

М а ш а . Что случилось?

О л ь г а (обнимает Ирину). Ужасный сегодня день... Я не знаю, как тебе сказать, моя дорогая...

И р и н а . Что? Говорите скорей: что? Бога ради! (Плачет.)

Ч е б у т ы к и н . Сейчас на дуэли убит барон.

И р и н а . Я знала, я знала...

Ч е б у т ы к и н (в глубине сцены садится на скамью). Утомился... (Вынимает из кармана газету.) Пусть поплачут... (Тихо напевает.) Та-ра-ра-бумбия... сижу на тумбе я... Не все ли равно!

Три сестры стоят, прижавшись друг к другу.

М а ш а . О, как играет музыка! Они уходят от нас, один ушел совсем, совсем навсегда, мы останемся одни, чтобы начать нашу жизнь снова. Надо жить... Надо жить...

И р и н а (кладет голову на грудь Ольге). Придет время, все узнают, зачем все это, для чего эти страдания, никаких не будет тайн, а пока надо жить... надо работать, только работать! Завтра я поеду одна, буду учить в школе и всю свою жизнь отдам тем, кому она, быть может, нужна. Теперь осень, скоро придет зима, засыплет снегом, а я буду работать, буду работать...

О л ь г а (обнимает обеих сестер). Музыка играет так весело, бодро, и хочется жить! О, боже мой! Пройдет время, и мы уйдем навеки, нас забудут, забудут наши лица, голоса и сколько нас было, но страдания наши перейдут в радость для тех, кто будет жить после нас, счастье и мир настанут на земле, и помянут добрым словом и благословят тех, кто живет теперь. О, милые сестры, жизнь наша еще не кончена. Будем жить! Музыка играет так весело, так радостно, и, кажется, еще немного, и мы узнаем, зачем мы живем, зачем страдаем... Если бы знать, если бы знать!

Музыка играет все тише и тише; К у л ы г и н , веселый, улыбающийся, несет шляпу и тальму. А н д р е й везет другую колясочку, в которой сидит Бобик.

Ч е б у т ы к и н (тихо напевает). Тара... ра... бумбия... сижу на тумбе я... (Читает газету.) Все равно! Все равно!

О л ь г а . Если бы знать, если бы знать!

Занавес

[Enter NATASHA.]

NATASHA. [To the maid] What? Mihail Ivanitch Protopopov will sit with little Sophie, and Andrey Sergeyevitch can take little Bobby out. Children are such a bother.... [To IRINA] Irina, it's such a pity you're going away to-morrow. Do stop just another week. [Sees KULIGIN and screams; he laughs and takes off his beard and whiskers] How you frightened me! [To IRINA] I've grown used to you and do you think it will be easy for me to part from you? I'm going to have Andrey and his violin put into your room—let him fiddle away in there!—and we'll put little Sophie into his room. The beautiful, lovely child! What a little girlie! To-day she looked at me with such pretty eyes and said "Mamma!"

KULIGIN. A beautiful child, it's quite true.

NATASHA. That means I shall have the place to myself to-morrow. [Sighs] In the first place I shall have that avenue of fir-trees cut down, then that maple. It's so ugly at nights.... [To IRINA] That belt doesn't suit you at all, dear.... It's an error of taste. And I'll give orders to have lots and lots of little flowers planted here, and they'll smell.... [Severely] Why is there a fork lying about here on the seat? [Going towards the house, to the maid] Why is there a fork lying about here on the seat, I say? [Shouts] Don't you dare to answer me!

KULIGIN. Temper! temper! [A march is played off; they all listen.]

OLGA. They're going.

[CHEBUTIKIN comes in.]

MASHA. They're going. Well, well.... Bon voyage! [To her husband] We must be going home.... Where's my coat and hat?

KULIGIN. I took them in... I'll bring them, in a moment.

OLGA. Yes, now we can all go home. It's time.

CHEBUTIKIN. Olga Sergeyevna!

OLGA. What is it? [Pause] What is it?

CHEBUTIKIN. Nothing... I don't know how to tell you.... [Whispers to her.]

OLGA. [Frightened] It can't be true!

CHEBUTIKIN. Yes... such a story... I'm tired out, exhausted, I won't say any more.... [Sadly] Still, it's all the same!

MASHA. What's happened?

OLGA. [Embraces IRINA] This is a terrible day... I don't know how to tell you, dear....

IRINA. What is it? Tell me quickly, what is it? For God's sake! [Cries.]

CHEBUTIKIN. The Baron was killed in the duel just now.

IRINA. [Cries softly] I knew it, I knew it....

CHEBUTIKIN. [Sits on a bench at the back of the stage] I'm tired.... [Takes a paper from his pocket] Let 'em cry.... [Sings softly] "Tarara-boom-deay, it is my washing day...." Isn't it all the same!

[The three sisters are standing, pressing against one another.]

MASHA. Oh, how the music plays! They are leaving us, one has quite left us, quite and for ever. We remain alone, to begin our life over again. We must live... we must live....

IRINA. [Puts her head on OLGA's bosom] There will come a time when everybody will know why, for what purpose, there is all this suffering, and there will be no more mysteries. But now we must live... we must work, just work! To-morrow, I'll go away alone, and I'll teach and give my whole life to those who, perhaps, need it. It's autumn now, soon it will be winter, the snow will cover everything, and I shall be working, working....

OLGA. [Embraces both her sisters] The bands are playing so gaily, so bravely, and one does so want to live! Oh, my God! Time will pass on, and we shall depart for ever, we shall be forgotten; they will forget our faces, voices, and even how many there were of us, but our sufferings will turn into joy for those who will live after us, happiness and peace will reign on earth, and people will remember with kindly words, and bless those who are living now. Oh dear sisters, our life is not yet at an end. Let us live. The music is so gay, so joyful, and, it seems that in a little while we shall know why we are living, why we are suffering.... If we could only know, if we could only know!

[The music has been growing softer and softer; KULIGIN, smiling happily, brings out the hat and coat; ANDREY wheels out the perambulator in which BOBBY is sitting.]

CHEBUTIKIN. [Sings softly] "Tara... ra-boom-deay.... It is my washing-day."... [Reads a paper] It's all the same! It's all the same!

OLGA. If only we could know, if only we could know! Curtain.

Anton Pavlovich Chekhov (Russian: Анто́н Па́влович Че́хов, 29 January 186 – 15 July 1904) was a Russian playwright and short story writer who is considered to be among the greatest writers of short fiction in history. His career as a playwright produced four classics and his best short stories are held in high esteem by writers and critics. Along with Henrik Ibsen and August Strindberg, Chekhov is often referred to as one of the three seminal figures in the birth of early modernism in the theater. Chekhov practiced as a medical doctor throughout most of his literary career: "Medicine is my lawful wife", he once said, "and literature is my mistress." Chekhov renounced the theatre after the disastrous reception of The Seagull in 1896, but the play was revived to acclaim in 1898 by Constantin Stanislavski's Moscow Art Theatre, which subsequently also produced Chekhov's Uncle Vanya and premiered his last two plays, Three Sisters and The Cherry Orchard. These four works present a challenge to the acting ensemble as well as to audiences, because in place of conventional action Chekhov offers a "theatre of mood" and a "submerged life in the text". Chekhov had at first written stories only for financial gain, but as his artistic ambition grew, he made formal innovations which have influenced the evolution of the modern short story. He made no apologies for the difficulties this posed to readers, insisting that the role of an artist was to ask questions, not to answer them. Although Chekhov did not fully realize it at the time, Chekhov's plays, such as "The Seagull" (written in 1895), "Uncle Vanya" (written in 1897), "The Three Sisters" (written in 1900), and "The Cherry Orchard" (written in 1903) served as a revolutionary backbone to what is common sense to the medium of acting to this day: an effort to recreate and express the "realism" of how people truly act and speak with each other and translating it to the stage in order to manifest the human condition as accurately as possible in hopes to make the audience reflect upon their own definition of what it means to be human, warts and all. This philosophy of approaching the art of acting has stood not only steadfast, but as the cornerstone of acting for much of the 20th century to this day. Mikhail Chekhov considered Ivanov a key moment in his brother's intellectual development and literary career. From this period comes an observation of Chekhov's that has become known as "Chekhov's gun", a dramatic principle that requires that every element in a narrative be necessary and irreplaceable, and that everything else be removed.

11.6 DRAMA IN LADINO – TRANSLATION INTO ENGLISH, YOSEF AVRAAAM PAPO – TRANSLATION OF ATHALIE BY RACINE– FRENCH & LADINO, THE ORIGINAL PLAY
LA VINYA DE NAVOT/THE VINEYARD OF NAVOT IN LADINO, POEM TO RUTHY

We wrote about the famous play Dybbuk in the Yiddish chapter and brought texts in Yiddish and English. But also in Ladino there was a great effervescence in the US, Israel and other countries. I already wrote how the first book that I read in Ladino was Romeo i Julieta in a translation in Rashi letters made in Greece. In the 1930s, one of the overriding concerns of the Sephardic colony was the escalating violence against the European Jewish people by the Nazis and their collaborators. La Vara, at the time the Nazis rose to power, was the only surviving Ladino newspaper in the United States, and is thus a major source chronicling the involvement of American Sephardic Jews in Holocaust relief efforts. Esther Cohen's community expressed its distress about Nazi persecution of Jews through a performance in June of 1938, sponsored by a number of New Lots Sephardic organizations to benefit the United Palestine Fund. The play, Baron Lenzer of Germany, was based on issues of assimilation within German Jewish society and was directed by Cohen's husband, Victor, and R. Albert Nahoum. Esther Cohen played the role of a servant employed in the house of Baron Lenzer, an assimilated German Jew. In one scene, she recited a dirge bemoaning Nazi brutality and pleading for the repatriation of the Jewish people in the land of Israel. Cohen, who composed the lyrics herself, sang the solo to the tune of "Eli, Eli" and, as La Vara reported, "moved the audience intensely." The verses, transliterated and translated from the Ladino, read as follows:

Diós de los sielos, arekoje tu puevlo,

Aronjados por los Romanos,

Matados por los Jermanos.

Dámos libertad, dámos un lugar para repozar.

Diós de los sielos, estamos mucho sufriendo,

Mándamos un regmidor, mándamos la salvación.

Dámos libertad, damos un lugar para repozar.

Diós de los sielos, perdónamos nuestros yeros.

Mira a tus kreados, arastando i yorando,

Mira a Hitler ke se está vengando,

Dámos libertad, dámos un lugar para repozar.

God of the heavens, restore life unto Your people,

Thrown out by the Romans, Murdered by the Germans.

Grant us liberty, grant us a place of respite.

God of the heavens, we suffer greatly!

Send us a savior, send us salvation!

Grant us liberty, grant us a place of respite.

God of the heavens, pardon our errors,

Look upon Your creatures, wandering and wailing,

Look upon Hitler, who is wreaking his vengeance.

Grant us liberty, grant us a place of respite.

And here we bring an extract of a translation made by Yosef Avraam Papo to Athalie by Racine, which was the basis for his monumental play La Vinya de Navot (the vineyard of Navot). I read the play which I have in my library in Rashi letters. Papo was from Ruschuk, Bulgaria (we visited the town in our trip to the Balkans and spoke there of Elias Canetti, another prominent Sephardi Jew born in this famous town who received the Nobel Prize but who wrote in German – I read one of his books Auto-da-Fe). Papo lived between 1865 to 1923 and besides translating Athalie by Racine (see below), he translated other plays from French as Shaul by Lamartine, and wrote besides La Vinya de Navot – the play Miriam la Hashmonea. La Vinya de Navot by Papo is in verses, but Racine's influence is only in the composition of the protagonists and the construction of the action.

[Shena tersera] [Yeoyada:] enteramente aboreser la verdad. Vos amostraran la virtud en una afroza imaje, Siendo eyos supieron azer trazayerar mizmo el mas savio de los reyes. The monumental book of Elena Romero on the Sephardi theater was published in three parts in Madrid 1979: El Teatro de los Sefardies Orientales. Romero found 201 dramas en Ladino – 91 original plays, 64 – translated plays, 45 – works in Ladino that their origin is not known. She found 44 authors, 28 translators and 5 (including Papo) who were original authors and translators as well. I bring below an extract of La Vinya de Navot in Ladino written in Latin alphabet, although it was written originally in Rashi writing, which today is very difficult to read. The extract is the last scene, which is an ode to the king and queen who reign in justice and vanquished malice and evil. As you can see it is in verse, in the classical style of Racine.

Todos

Biva el rey! Biva la reina! Biva la djustisia!

Abasho la inikuidad! Abasho la malisia!

(forman un kortejo para irsen al palasio, el rey i la reina adelante i todos detrás van rodeando por la esena i kantando en kaminando avagar avagar a la luz del pigal en boz de שאו שערים ראשיכם)

Dio alto i temerozo, djusto i maraviozo,

Te rendemos a millones gracias i alavaciones!

Nuestra tierra destruyida, nase, torna a la vida.

Por gozar kon su rey nuevo, ke es muy bravo mansevo. (gritan)

Biva el rey! Biva la reina! Biva la djustisia!

Abasho la inikuidad! Abasho la malisia! (kantan en boz de "שובב ציון")

Kanta Israel por tu rehmission,

Ya vino goel para tu nasion.

Nuestro Dio fiel, kon su bendision,

Ara korrer miel dientro de Shomron.

Nos alegrara kon el nuevo rey

I nos atara kon su santa ley.

Nos kontentara kon su dulce fey.

Torna nos dira: "Tu mi pueblo sey!"

Kanta Israel por tu rehmission

Ya vino goel para tu nasion! (gritan)

Biva el rey! Biva la reina! Biva la djustisia!

Abasho la inikuidad! Abasho la malisia! (kantan en boz de "צור שוכן עלי שמים")

Efrayim kon grande gozo, kanta este dia ermozo!

Vate para la kampanya, i grita en la montanya

Ke dios te tiro su sanya i te rindio muy orocho.

Efrayim, kon grande gozo, kanta este dia ermozo!

Ye'hu en Dios se arima, i atrae su estima,

Kon una reina sublima, forma un par muy glorioso

Efrayim, kon grande gozo, kanta este dia ermozo! (gritan)

Biva el rey! Biva la reina! Biva la djustisia!

Abasho la inikuidad! Abasho la malisia!

Finally, I would like to bring here my humble contribution to Ladino poetry, the poem "Onde estas mujer kerida" – "Where are you beloved wife", that I wrote to my wife Ruthy on the occasion of her birthday on 18/1/2000, that was published in Aki Yerushalayim in 2005, in Ladinokomunita, and on other occasions, in which I praise all her merits – how she assists her dying father at the hospital, her bereaved mother, her children, her grandson, her pupils, how she visits the tumb of her grandmother, how she cares for everybody in innumerable good deeds...

Ma por ti marido kerido – But for you dear husband

Tengo la mas grande mitsva – I do the greatest "mitsva"/good deed (in Ladino, Yiddish, Hebrew)
 Amarte sin fin – loving you forever
 En siendo siempre fiel. – and being always faithful.

I si no tengo mucho tiempo para ti – And if I don't have much time for you
 Ke sepas que sos todo mi mundo - you should know that you are all my world
 I si ago tantas mitsvot para todos – and if I do so many "mitsvot"/good deeds for everybody
 Es para rengrasiar a Dios ke me regalo a ti !– it is to thank God who gave you as a present to me.

איפה את אשתי היקרה? Onde estas mujer kerida?

איפה את אשתי היקרה? Onde estas mujer kerida?

מלאכי, אהובתי, אייך? Andjel, amor, onde estas?

רגע אחד אני עם אבי Un momento esto kon mi padre

הגוסס בבית החולים, Ke esta hazino en el eshpital,

מסייעת לו, מאכילה אותו, Lo ayudo, le do a komer,

ולנסוך בה אומץ רוח. I darle koraje.

ואני מלמדת אותה מה עליה לעשות I la embezo ke deve azer

אני הולכת גם כן לבני Me vo tambien a mi ijo

מכבסת את בגדיו Lavarle la ropa

מנקה את ביתו. Limpiarle la kaza.

אך עלי גם לעבוד Ma tengo tambien ke lavorar

ולחנך את תלמידי Y ensenyar a los elevos

לאהוב אותם כמו את ילדי Amarles komo mis ijos

לתת להם את נשמת. Darles mi alma.

איני שוכחת לבקר No ulvido vijitar

את קברה של סבתי La tomba de mi nona

מביאה לה פרחים Meterle flores

מדליקה לה נרות נשמה. Insindiendo kandelas de neshama.

עושה מצוות רבות Aziendo muchas mitsvot

בשבוע אחד En una semana

שאחרות עושות Ke otras azen

במשך חיים שלמים En una vida entera...

אבל עבורך בעלי היקר Ma por ti marido kerido

אני עושה את המצווה הגדולה מכולן : Tengo la mas grande mitsva

לאהוב אותך ללא קץ Amarte sin fin

ולהישאר תמיד נאמנה לך. En siendo siempre fiel.

ואם אין לי זמן רב להקדיש לך I si no tengo mucho tiempo para ti

עליך לדעת שאתה כל עולמי Ke sepas que sos todo mi mundo

ואם עושה אני כה הרבה מצוות עבור כולם I si ago tantas mitsvot para todos

זה בשביל להודות לאל על שהעניק לי אותך במתנה ! Es para rengrasiar a Dios ke me regalo a ti

11.7 ON THE LANGUAGE CATALAN, TERRA BAIXA BY ANGEL GUIMERA IN CATALAN AND SPANISH

Àngel Guimera is one of the most renowned playwrights in Catalan. The literary career of Àngel Guimerà (1845 – 1924) is closely linked with the consolidation of the political and cultural movement known as the Renaixença. He was one of its most outstanding figures, both in its creative aspects, especially in theatre, and as an activist championing Catalan language and literature. He was steadfast in his militant support for Catalan nationalism at the time, a man of peace and supporter of – very often idealised – confraternity in years of great social tension. He did not dodge contentious issues, from anarchist attacks through to more genuinely Christian positions than those taken by the official Church at the time. He always showed his concern about the forms of injustice and hypocrisy that condition human life, all of which made him a popular writer, admired by a very broad spectrum of society. We bring here an extract of his play Terra Baixa with a translation into Spanish (there are also translations into Italian and German). I have in my library several books by Guimera and I have read his play Mar i Cel.

Catalan is a Romance language named for its origins in Catalonia, in what is northeastern Spain and adjoining parts of France. It is the national and only official language of Andorra,^[5] and a co-official language of the Spanish autonomous communities of Catalonia, the Balearic Islands, and the Valencian Community (where the language is known as Valencian, and there exist regional standards). It also has semi-official status in the city of Alghero on the Italian island of Sardinia. It is also spoken with no official recognition in parts of the Spanish autonomous communities of Aragon (La Franja) and Murcia (Carche), and in the historic French region of Roussillon/Northern Catalonia, roughly equivalent to the department of Pyrénées-Orientales. According to the Statistical Institute of Catalonia in 2008 the Catalan language is the second most commonly used in Catalonia, after Spanish, as a native or self-defining language. The Generalitat of Catalunya spends part of its annual budget on the promotion of the use of Catalan in Catalonia and in other territories. There are 4.1 million native speakers of Catalan in Catalonia, Valencia provinces, Balearic Islands, Andorra, etc., and 5.1 million speakers as a second language. It is amazing how the Catalonians have succeeded to establish this language as the most spoken language in Catalonia, if we remember that Franco banned the language. It can be compared to the renaissance of the Hebrew language in Israel, and the Irish people have a lot to learn from the Catalonians as their success in instituting Irish as a spoken language is so low.

Catalan evolved from Vulgar Latin around the eastern Pyrenees in the 9th century. During the Low Middle Ages it saw a golden age as the literary and dominant language of the Crown of Aragon, and was widely used all over the Mediterranean. The union of Aragon with the other territories of Spain in 1479 marked the start of the decline of the language. In 1659 Spain ceded Northern Catalonia to France, and Catalan was banned in both states in the early 18th century. 19th-century Spain saw a Catalan literary revival, which culminated in the 1913 orthographic standardization, and the officialization of the language during the Second Spanish Republic (1931–39). However, the Francoist dictatorship (1939–75) banned the language again. Since the Spanish transition to democracy (1975–1982), Catalan has been recognized as an official language, language of education, of mass media, all of which have contributed to its increased prestige. There is no parallel in Europe of such a large, bilingual, non-state speech community.

MANELIC (molt exaltat): Que et perdoni? Ira de Déu!... Què t'havia fet, jo? Enraona! Per què m'havies d'enganyar a mi? Per què?

MARTA: Perquè no era ningú, jo! Que era sense voluntat, obeïa! I ni t'havia mirat mai!

Ni t'estimava! Ni sabia què era tenir voluntat per un altre!

MANELIC: Doncs per què t'has casat amb mi, i no et vas casar amb aquell home!

MARTA: Oh, sí, matar-me, sí; que això és lo que desitjo!

MANELIC: No, no; abans anar-me'n. Anar-me'n d'aquí per a sempre!

MANELIC: Deixa'm anar, que això és un toll de misèries! Eh! Rebolca-t'hi!

(Desprenent-se d'ella i anant cap a la porta. Ella cau apoiant-se en un braç a terra.)MARTA (per aturar-lo, rabiosa i plorant): Sí, Sí; amb el que jo estimo! (Agenollada avança cap a la porta.) Que t'he enganyat a tu! I tu no em castigues!(En Manelic s'atura. A part.) No se'n va, no! (Alt, suplicant.) Manelic! (Ell, que ha dubtat, va a sortir.) I sóc tota de l'altre!... ¡I de tu no ho sóc, no ho sóc!MANELIC (tornant enrera, amenaçant-la amb lo puny): Que callis! Calla! Calla!(La Marta s'ha alçat.)MARTA (satisfeta de que ell no se'n vagi): I t'he enganyat jo, i estic contenta d'haver-te enganyat! I mira: me n'en ric de tu, com tothom, mira! (Riu com boja.) Sí, sí, me n'en ric! I encara espero l'altre! (Ell corre cap a la taula i agafa la ganiveta.)

MANELIC: Pel nom de Déu que aquí mateix...!

MARTA (corrent a agafar-lo pel braç esquerre): Sí, sí, t'enganyo! Encara t'enganyo! Que vindrà l'altre! (Arrenca una rialla feréstega.)

MANELIC (alçant la ganiveta): Que et mataré!

MARTA (rient i plorant): Mata'm! Mata'm! A que no em mates!

MANELIC: Què anava a fer! No puc, no!

MARTA (refermant-s'hi al veure que s'aparta): Ah, covard! Que ja es veu que t'has venut per diners! (Agafant-se a Manelic perquè la fereixi.)

MANELIC: Doncs té! Maleïda! (Ferint-la en un braç.)

MARTA: Ah! (Satisfeta.) A la fi!

MANEUC (llençant lo ganivet amb espant): Oh, Déu meu! Què he fet jo!

MARTA: És sang! Sang meva! I tu has sigut!... (Sostenint-se a la taula.) Oh, quin goig!

Si ric! Mira com ric! I ara ric d'alegria!

MANELIC: Maleït jo! Maleït jo cent cops, que sóc com les bèsties salvatgines!

MARTA ¡Porque yo no era nadie! ¡Que era una mujer sin voluntad y obedecía! ¡Y no te había mirado jamás! ¡Ni te quería! ¡Ni sabía lo que era tener cariño por otro!

MANELIC Entonces, ¿por qué te casaste conmigo y no te casaste con aquel hombre? ¡Dilo! (Cada vez más furioso.) ¡Que no sé por qué, y me consumo y estoy loco por saberlo! (Avanza rápido hacia Marta.)

¿Por qué? ¿Por qué? ¡Contesta!

MARTA ¡Oh, sí, matarme, sí! ¡Eso es lo que quiero!

MANELIC ¡No, no! ¿Prefiero irme, irme de aquí para siempre...!

MARTA (Furiosa para retenerle.) ¡Pero si no te atreves a hablarme! ¡No, no; no te atreves! (Le persigue desesperada.) ¡Y es que me tienes miedo, miedo, me tienes miedo a mí!

¡Cobarde! ¡Miedo! ¡Miedo!

MANELIC Se detiene. ¿Qué? ¿Qué yo tengo miedo? (Cuando Manelic se detiene, Marta rompe a llorar para que se quede.)

MARTA ¡Háblame! ¡Insúltame! ¡Pégame! ¡Pero no te vayas! (Se abraza a las rodillas de Manelic sollozando.)

MANELIC ¡Déjame ir porque todo esto no es más que un charco de miserias! ¡Ah! ¡Revuélcate en él! (Manelic se desprende de Marta y se dirige hacia la puerta. Marta cae apoyando un brazo en el suelo.)

MARTA (Para retenerle, furiosa, mientras ríe y llora.) ¡Sí, sí, como el que yo quiero! (Arrodillada se dirige hacia la puerta.) ¡Sí, te he engañado! ¡Y tú no me castigas! (Manelic se detiene y Marta dice aparte:) ¡No se va! Suplicando.) ¡Manelic! (Manelic que estaba dudando parece que va a cruzar la puerta.)

¡Y soy para el otro! ¡Y no soy para ti! ¡No lo soy!

MANELIC (Retrocede y la amenaza con el puño.) ¡Calla! ¡Calla! ¡Calla! (Marta se ha levantado.)

MARTA (Satisfecha porque logra que Manelic no se vaya.) ¡Y te he engañado yo! ¡Y estoy contenta de haberte engañado!

¡Y mira, me río de ti, como todo el mundo, mira! (Ríe como una loca.) ¡Sí, sí, me río! ¡Y todavía espero al otro! (Manelic corre hacia la mesa y agarra el cuchillo.)

MANELIC ¡En nombre de Dios que aquí mismo...!

MARTA (Corre a sujetarle el brazo izquierdo.) ¡Sí, sí, te engaño! ¡Sigo engañándote! ¡Y ahora vendrá el otro! (Estalla en una carcajada feroz.)

MANELIC (Levanta el cuchillo.) ¡Te mataré!

MARTA (Ríe y llora.) ¡Mátame! ¡Mátame! Por qué no me matas?

MANELIC ¡Iba a hacerlo! ¡Pero no puedo!

MARTA (Afirmándose al ver que Manelic se aparta.)

¡Ah, cobarde! ¡Bien se ve que te has vendido por dinero! (Se agarra a Manelic para que la hiera.)

MANELIC ¡Pues torna, maldita! (La hiere en un brazo.)

MARTA ¡Ah! (Satisfecha.) ¡Por fin!

MANELIC (Arrojando el cuchillo con espanto.) ¡Dios mío! ¡Qué he hecho!

MARTA ¡Es sangre! ¡Sangre mía! ¡Y has sido tú...! (Agarrándose a la mesa.) ¡Oh, qué alegría! ¡Pero si estoy riendo!

¡Mira como río! ¡Y ahora río de alegría!

MANELIC ¡Maldito de mí! ¡Maldito de mí que soy como las fieras salvajes! (Cae sentado en una silla, apretujándose la cabeza entre las manos.)

11.8 FREI LUIS DE SOUSA BY ALMEIDA GARRETT IN PORTUGUESE

João Baptista da Silva Leitão de Almeida Garrett, Viscount of Almeida Garrett (February 4, 1799 – December 9, 1854) was a Portuguese poet, playwright, novelist and politician. He is considered to be the introducer of the Romantic movement in Portugal. He is regarded as one of history's greatest Romanticists and a true revolutionary and humanist. In 1843, Garrett published Romanceiro e Cancioneiro Geral, a collection of folklore; two years later, he wrote the first volume of his historical novel O Arco de Santana (fully published in 1850, it took inspiration from Victor Hugo's The Hunchback of Notre Dame). O Arco de Santana signified a change in Garrett's style, leading to a more complex and subjective prose with which he experimented at length in Viagens na Minha Terra (Travels in My Homeland, 1846), which I read. His innovative manner was also felt in his poem collections Flores sem Fruto (Flowers without Fruit, 1844) and Folhas Caídas (Fallen Leaves) 1853). Almeida Garrett ended his relationship with Luísa Midosi and divorced in 1835 (who later remarried Alexandre Desiré Létrillard) to join 17-year-old Adelaide Deville Pastor in 1836 – she was to remain his partner until her early death in 1839, causing him to break, and leaving a daughter named Maria Adelaide (who later married and had issue), whose early life tragedy and illegitimacy inspired her father in order to write the play Frei Luís de Sousa. I read the play, an excellent play, a real masterpiece, we bring here the last scene. In this scene Maria, an adolescent of 12 years but adult in her behavior enters into the church, recognizes and goes to her parents who embrace her. Maria questions the sanctity of the ceremonies in church, she asks "what kind of God is he who takes away a daughter from her parents". She says "kill me if you wish so but don't separate me from my parents". She complains that she is told that "this child is the outcome of crime and sin". She begs her parents to deny that as she was born out of love. Finally, Maria dies of shame...

SCENA XI

O PRIOR DE BEMFICA, _o_ ARCEBISPO, MANUEL DE SOUSA, MAGDALENA, etc.

MARIA, _que entra precipitadamente pela igreja em estado de completa alienação; traz umas roupas brancas, desalinhadas e caídas, os cabelos soltos, o rosto macerado, mas inflamado com as rosetas ethicas, os olhos desvairados; pára um momento, reconhece os pais e vai direita a elles.--Espanto geral: a cerimonia interrompe-se_.

Maria. Meu pae, meu pae, minha mãe! levanta-vos, vinde. (_Toma-os pelas mãos; elles obedecem machinalmente, veem ao meio da scena: confusão geral_.)

Magdalena. Maria! minha filha!

Manuel. Filha, filha!... Oh, minha filha!... (_Abraçam-se ambos n'ella_.)

Maria, _separando-se com elles da outra gente, e trazendo-os para a bôcca da scena_. Esperae: aqui não morre ninguém sem mim. Que quereis fazer? Que cerimoniaes são éstas? Que Deus é esse que está n'esse altar, e quer roubar o pae e a mãe a sua filha?--(_Para os circumstantes_) Vós quem sois, espectros fataes?... quereis-m'os tirar dos meus braços?... Esta é a minha mãe, este é o meu pae... Que me importa a mim com o outro? Que morrêsse ou não, que esteja com os mortos ou com os vivos--que se fique na cova ou que resuscite agora para me matar?... Matte-me, matte-me, se quer, mas deixe-me este pae, ésta mãe, que são meus.--Não ha mais do que vir ao meio de uma familia e dizer: «Vós não sois marido e mulher?... e ésta filha do vosso amor, ésta filha criada ao collo de tantas meiguices, de tanta ternura, ésta filha é...»--Mãe, mãe, eu bem o sabia... nunca t'o disse, mas sabia-o: tinha-m'o ditto aquelle anjo terrivel que me apparecia todas as noites para me não deixar dormir... aquelle anjo que descia com uma espada de chammas na mão, e a atravessava entre mim e ti, que me arrancava dos teus braços quando eu adormecia n'elles... que me fazia chorar quando meu pae ia beijar-me no teu collo.--Mãe, mãe, tu não hasde morrer sem mim... Pae, dá ca um panno da tua mortalha... dá ca, eu quero morrer antes que elle venha: (_incolhendo-se no hábito do pae_) quero-me esconder aqui, antes que venha esse homem do outro mundo dizer-me na minha cara e na tua--aqui deante de toda ésta gente: «Essa filha é a filha do crime e do peccado!...» Não sou; dize, meu pae, não sou... dize a essa gente toda, dize que não sou. (_Vai para Magdalena_) Pobre mãe! tu não podes... coitada!... não tens ánimo...--nunca mentiste?... Pois mente agora para salvar a honra de tua filha, para que lhe não tirem o nome de seu pae.

 Magdalena. Misericordia, meu Deus!
 Maria. Não queres? Tu tambem não, pae?--Não querem. E eu heide morrer assim... e elle vem ahi...

MARIA, MAGDALENA, MANUEL; o ROMEIRO e TELMO _que apparecem no fundo da scena sahindo detrás do altar-mór_.

Romeiro, _para Telmo_. Vai, vai; ve se ainda é tempo: salva-os, salva-os, que ainda podes... (_Telmo dá alguns passos para deante_.)
 Maria, _apontando para o romeiro_. É aquella voz, é elle, é elle.--Já não é tempo... Minha mãe, meu pae, cobri-me bem éstas faces, que morro de vergonha... (_Esconde o rosto no seio da mãe_) morro, morro... de vergonha... (_Cá e fica morta no chão. Manuel de Sousa e Magdalena prostram-se ao pé do cadaver da filha_.)
 Manuel, _depois de algum espaço, levânta-se de joelhos_. Minha irman, rezemos por alma... incommendemos a nossa alma a este anjo que Deus levou para si.--Padre prior, podeis-me lançar aqui o escapulario?
 Prior, _indo buscar os escapularios ao altar-mór e tornando_. Meus irmãos, Deus afflige n'este mundo áquelles que ama. A coroa de glória não se dá senão no céu.

João Baptista da Silva Leitão de Almeida Garrett, Viscount of Almeida Garrett (4 February 1799 – 9 December 1854) was a Portuguese poet, playwright, novelist and politician. He is considered to be the introducer of the Romantic movement in Portugal. He is regarded as one of history's greatest Romanticists and a true revolutionary and humanist. Garrett divorced in 1835 to join 17-year-old Adelaide Deville Pastor in 1836 – she was to remain his partner until her early death in 1839, causing him to break, and leaving a daughter named Maria Adelaide (who later married and had issue), whose early life tragedy and illegitimacy inspired her father in order to write the play Frei Luís de Sousa.

11.9 MEDEA BY SENECA IN LATIN AND ENGLISH

One of my favorite plays (though not my favorite heroine) is Medea by Seneca. I have seen it several times in Israel and read it in the Latin original with a translation. We bring here the English translation and the Latin original of the last scene, the most horrifying scene of drama.

Medea Congere extremum tuis natis, Iason, funus ac tumulum strue: coniunx socerque iusta iam functis habent a me sepulti; gnatus hic fatum tulit, hic te uidente dabitur exitio pari.	1000
Iason Per numen omne perque communes fugas torosque, quos non nostra uiolauit fides, iam parce nato. si quod est crimen, meum est: me dedo morti; noxium macta caput.	1005
Medea Hac qua recusas, qua doles, ferrum exigam. i nunc, superbe, uirginum thalamos pete, relinque matres.
Iason Vnus est poenae satis.
Medea Si posset una caede satiari manus, nullam petisset. ut duos perimam, tamen nimium est dolori numerus angustus meo. in matre si quod pignus etiamnunc latet, scrutabor ense uiscera et ferro extraham.	1010
Iason Iam perage coeptum facinus, haut ultra precor, moramque saltem supplicis dona meis.	1015
Medea Perfruere lento scelere, ne propera, dolor: meus dies est; tempore accepto utimur.
Iason Infesta, memet perime.
Medea Misereri iubes. bene est, peractum est. plura non habui, dolor, quae tibi litarem. lumina huc tumida alleua, ingrate Iason. coniugem agnoscis tuam? sic fugere soleo. patuit in caelum uia: squamosa gemini colla serpentes iugo summissa praebent. recipe iam gnatos, parens; ego inter auras aliti curru uehar.	1020 1025
Iason Per alta uade spatia sublime aetheris, testare nullos esse, qua ueheris, deos.

Medea. Pile high the funeral pyre of thy sons, And rear their tomb. To Creon and thy wife I have already paid the honors due. This son is dead, and this shall soon be so, And thou shalt see him perish.

Jason. By the gods, By our sad flight together, and the bond I have not willingly forsaken, spare Our son! If there is any crime, 'tis mine; Put me to death, strike down the guilty one.

Medea. There where thou askest mercy, and canst feel The sting, I thrust the sword. Go, Jason, seek Thy virgin bride, desert a mother's bed.

Jason. Let one suffice for vengeance.

Medea. Had it been That one could satisfy my hands with blood, I had slain none. But two is not enough.

Jason. Then go, fill up the measure of thy crime, I ask for nothing but that thou should'st make A speedy end.

Medea. Now, grief, take slow revenge; It is my day; haste not, let me enjoy.

[Kills the other child.]

Jason. Slay me, mine enemy!

Medea. Dost thou implore My pity? It is well! I am avenged. Grief, there is nothing more that thou canst slay! Look up, ungrateful Jason, recognize Thy wife; so I am wont to flee. The way Lies open through the skies; two dragons bend Their necks, submissive to the yoke. I go In my bright car through heaven. Take thy sons!

[She casts down to him the bodies of her children, and is borne away in a chariot drawn by dragons.]

Jason. Go through the skies sublime, and going prove That the gods dwell not in the heavens you seek.

In Greek mythology, Medea (Greek: Μήδεια, Mēdeia, Georgian: მედეა, Medea) is a sorceress who was the daughter of King Aeëtes of Colchis, niece of Circe, granddaughter of the sun god Helios, and later wife to the hero Jason, with whom she had two children, Mermeros and Pheres. In Euripides's play Medea, Jason leaves Medea when Creon, king of Corinth, offers him his daughter, Glauce. The play tells of Medea avenging her husband's betrayal by killing their children. The myths involving Jason have been interpreted as part of a class of myths that tell how the Hellenes of the distant heroic age, before the Trojan War, faced the challenges of the pre-Greek "Pelasgian" cultures of mainland Greece, the Aegean and Anatolia. Jason, Perseus, Theseus, and above all Heracles, are all "liminal" figures, poised on the threshold between the old world of shamans, chthonic earth deities, and the new Bronze Age Greek ways. Medea figures in the myth of Jason and the Argonauts, a myth known best from a late literary version worked up by Apollonius of Rhodes in the 3rd century BC and called the Argonautica. However, for all its self-consciousness and researched archaic vocabulary, the late epic was based on very old, scattered materials. Medea is known in most stories as an enchantress and is often depicted as being a priestess of the goddess Hecate or a witch. The myth of Jason and Medea is very old, originally written around the time Hesiod wrote the Theogony. It was known to the composer of the Little Iliad, part of the Epic Cycle. Senecan tragedy refers to a set of ancient Roman tragedies. Ten of these plays exist, of which most likely eight were written by the Stoic philosopher and politician Lucius Annaeus Seneca. The group includes Hercules Furens, Medea, Troades, Phaedra, Agamemnon, Oedipus, Phoenissae, Thyestes, Hercules Oetaeus, and Octavia. Hercules Oetaeus is generally considered not to have been written by Seneca, and Octavia is certainly not. In the mid-16th century, Italian humanists rediscovered these works, making them models for the revival of tragedy on the Renaissance stage. The two great, but very different, dramatic traditions of the age — French neoclassical tragedy and Elizabethan tragedy — both drew inspiration from Seneca. Usually, the Senecan tragedy focuses heavily on supernatural elements. Although many of the Senecan tragedies adapt the same Greek myths as tragedies by Sophocles, Aeschylus, and Euripides, scholars tend not to view Seneca's works as direct adaptations of the Attic works, as Seneca's approach to the myths differs significantly from the Greek poets and often contains themes familiar from his philosophical writings. It is possible that Seneca's tragic style was more directly influenced by Augustan literature.

11.10 MOUCHE DEFAS – A TRANSLATION/ADAPTATION OF TARTUFFE BY MOLIERE IN HAITIAN AND ENGLISH

I enjoy much reading translations and adaptations of plays in languages as Ladino, Haitian or Romanian. I've read the Haitian translation and adaptation of Moliere's Tartuffe – Mouche Defas by J. Lyonel Desmarattes, that has become quite a classic in Haiti and pupils are being examined on the text in Haitian and not in French, on which it is based and is of course the original language of the play by Moliere. I have read several times and seen many times Tartuffe on the stage at the Comedie Francaise, in Israel, and here I give the first scene in Haitian and English. It goes without saying that Desmarattes has decided to adapt not only the play but its names as well. While the English text is rhymed as the French original, Haitian's text... is also rhymed...

ACT I

SCENE I

Madame Pernelle and her servant Flipote, Elmiere, Mariane, Dorine, Damis, Cleante

Mme. Pernelle. Let's go, Flipote, let's go. I hate this place.

Elmiere. I can't keep up, you rush at such a pace.

Mme. Pernelle. Peace, my dear, peace; come no farther.

I don't wish to cause you any bother.

Elmire. What duty demands, I insist on giving.

But, mother, what has caused your hasty leaving?

Mme. Pernelle. I just can't stand the way your household runs . . .

And no one cares what I wish to have done.

Oh, yes, I leave your household quite dissatisfied

For all my wise advice has been defied . . .

And nobody respects me, and everybody shouts,

And truly this is a home for the king of louts!

Dorine. If . . .

Mme. Pernelle. You, my dearie, are a bold lassy,

A little brazen and very sassy,

You butt into everything to speak your mind.

Damis. But . . .

Mme. Pernelle. You, grandson, are a fool of the worst kind.

It is I, your grandmother, that pronounce this edict

And to my son, your father, I have oft predicted

That you'll turn out to be a worthless wastrel,

And give him in life a foretaste of Hell.

Mariane. I think . . .

Mme. Pernelle. My lord, his sister! You seem so discreet

And so untainted, so very sweet,

But the stillest waters are filled with scum,

And your sly ways earn my revulsion.

Tartuffe, or The Impostor, or The Hypocrite (French: Tartuffe, ou l'Imposteur, first performed in 1664, is one of the most famous theatrical comedies by Molière. The characters of Tartuffe, Elmire, and Orgon are considered among the greatest classical theatre roles. Molière wrote Tartuffe in 1664. Almost immediately following its first performance that same year at the Versailles fêtes, it was censored by King Louis XIV, probably due to the influence of the archbishop of Paris, Paul Philippe Hardouin de Beaumont de Péréfixe, who was the King's confessor and had been his tutor. While the king had little personal interest in suppressing the play, he did so because, as stated in the official account of the fête: "...although it was found to be extremely diverting, the king recognized so much conformity between those that a true devotion leads on the path to heaven and those that a vain ostentation of some good works does not prevent from committing some bad ones, that his extreme delicacy to religious matters can not suffer this resemblance of vice to virtue, which could be mistaken for each other; although one does not doubt the good intentions of the author, even so he forbids it in public, and deprived himself of this pleasure, in order not to allow it to be abused by others, less capable of making a just discernment of it." As a result of Molière's play, contemporary French and English both use the word "tartuffe" to designate a hypocrite who ostensibly and exaggeratedly feigns virtue, especially religious virtue. The play is written entirely in 1,962 twelve-syllable lines (alexandrines) of rhyming couplets. Though Tartuffe was received well by the public and even by Louis XIV, it immediately sparked conflict amongst many different groups who were offended by the play. The factions opposed to Molière's work included part of the hierarchy of the French Roman Catholic Church, members of upper-class French society, and the illegal underground organization called the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement. Tartuffe's popularity was cut short when the Archbishop of Paris issued an edict threatening excommunication for anyone who watched, performed in, or read the play

11.11 TARTUFFE BY MOLIERE IN ROMANIAN AND FRENCH

And to continue the fun, we bring here from my library another text of Tartuffe, this time in Romanian, who has also affinities with French literature as Haitian one. It goes without saying that the Romanian text is rhymed as the French text, thanks to the translation of A. Toma. The English translation of the same text was given in the previous chapter, we chose to bring here the original version in French, which is rhymed and perfect, in short – impossible to translate. We could continue the fun by giving the Ladino translation of Le malade imaginaire by Moliere: El hacino imaginado, but as I've given above many texts of plays and translations in Ladino, I'll skip it this time. Moliere and Shakespeare are undoubtedly the playwrights who were most translated in dozens of languages and were staged all over the world in the last centuries.

Actul I

Scena 1

Doamna Pernelle, Elmira, Mariana, Cleant, Damis, Dorina, Flipota

Doamna Pernelle: Plecam, Flipota, haidem; sa scap de ei o data.

Elmira: Dar mergi asa de iute: abia potis fi urmata.

Doamna Pernelle: Las', nora draga, lasa; prea multe osteneli, Ramii. Fasoane de-astea nu-mi tin de cald, te-nseli.

Elmira: Cinstirea cuvenita ti-am dat-o toti, imi pare;

En nu-nteleg sau, mama, ce-i graba de plecare?

Doamna Pernelle: Nu pot privi rostul gospodaresc de-aici,

Nici unuia nu-i pasa, tu, om batrin, ce zici.

Da, da, va plec din casa eu mare-amaraciune:

Vi-i greu de-un sfat al mamei, din datini vechi si bune;

La voi sfiala nu e: toti mari, toti dau din miini,

Aici – curat povestea! E satul fara ciini.

Dorina: Pai, vezi...

Doamna Pernelle: Sa fii la locu-ti, ma rog, esti fata-n casa.

Dar cam neobrazata; din scaun sari pe masa;

Ti-e nelipsit cuvintul, ca martie din post.

Damis: Dar...

Doamna Pernelle: Tu, In doua vorbe sa-ti spun ce esti: un prost;

Da, fatul meu, da-mi dreptul s-o spune, caci ti-s bunica;

Lui taica-tau intr-una ti prevesteam: "Sa stii ca

Micutul pierde-vara, dragut si rasfatat,

Ti-o face zile-amare, si-o creste-un zvinturat".

Mariana: Eu cred...

Doamna Pernelle: O Doamna..., sor'sa! – te stiu – mironosita,

Mielusa fara vina, abia deschizi gurita!

Dar mai viclene ape sint cele care tac

Si tu, pe-ascuns, calci drumuri ce nu-mi prea sint pe plac.

ACTE I.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE - Madame Pernelle et Flipote sa servante, Elmire, Mariane, Dorine, Damis, Cléante.

MADAME PERNELLE.

Allons, Flipote, allons, que d'eux je me délivre.

ELMIRE.

Vous marchez d'un tel pas qu'on a peine à vous suivre.

MADAME PERNELLE.

Laissez, ma bru, laissez, ne venez pas plus loin :

Ce sont toutes façons dont je n'ai pas besoin.

ELMIRE.

De ce que l'on vous doit envers vous on s'acquitte,

Mais ma mère, d'où vient que vous sortez si vite ?

MADAME PERNELLE.

C'est que je ne puis voir tout ce ménage-ci,

Et que de me complaire on ne prend nul souci.

Oui, je sors de chez vous fort mal édifiée :

Dans toutes mes leçons j'y suis contrariée,

On n'y respecte rien, chacun y parle haut,

Et c'est tout justement la cour du roi Pétaut.

DORINE.

Si....

MADAME PERNELLE.

Vous êtes, mamie, une fille suivante

Un peu trop forte en gueule, et fort impertinente :

Vous vous mêlez sur tout de dire votre avis.

DAMIS.

Mais....

MADAME PERNELLE.

Vous êtes un sot en trois lettres, mon fils.

C'est moi qui vous le dis, qui suis votre grand'mère ;

Et j'ai prédit cent fois à mon fils, votre père,

Que vous preniez tout l'air d'un méchant garnement,

Et ne lui donneriez jamais que du tourment.

MARIANE.

Je crois....

MADAME PERNELLE.

Mon Dieu, sa soeur, vous faites la discrète,

Et vous n'y touchez pas, tant vous semblez doucette ;

Mais il n'est, comme on dit, pire eau que l'eau qui dort,

Et vous menez sous chape un train que je hais fort.

Molière responded to criticism of Tartuffe in 1667 with his Lettre sur la comédie de l'Imposteur. He sought to justify his play and his approach to comedy in general by underlining the comedic value of the juxtaposition of good and bad, right and wrong, and wisdom and folly. These humorous elements in turn were intended to highlight what is actually rational. In his Lettre he wrote: "The comic is the outward and visible form that nature's bounty has attached to everything unreasonable, so that we should see, and avoid, it. To know the comic we must know the rational, of which it denotes the absence and we must see wherein the rational consists . . . incongruity is the heart of the comic . . . it follows that all lying, disguise, cheating, dissimulation, all outward show different from the reality, all contradiction in fact between actions that proceed from a single source, all this is in essence comic."

11.12 ON THE LANGUAGE ESPERANTO, THE TEMPEST BY WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE IN ESPERANTO AND ENGLISH

Shakespeare is the playwright who was translated into most languages and one of his favorite plays is The Tempest, I have read the play and seen it on stage and in films. As I always am looking on curiosities, I bring here an extract of one of the books in my library, a rare translation into Esperanto by Kalman Kalocsay, the final scene of the play, with the English original also. Until now twenty works by Shakespeare have been translated into Esperanto, this is one of the earliest. I haven't read it yet in Esperanto, as I read now other texts by Balzac in this language.

Esperanto is a constructed international auxiliary language, the most widely spoken constructed language in the world. Its name derives from Doktoro Esperanto ("Esperanto" translates as "one who hopes"), the pseudonym under which physician and linguist L. L. Zamenhof published the first book detailing Esperanto, the Unua Libro, on 26 July 1887. Zamenhof's goal was to create an easy-to-learn, politically neutral language that would transcend nationality and foster peace and international understanding between people with different languages. Up to 2,000,000 people worldwide fluently or actively speak Esperanto, including perhaps 2,000 native speakers who learned Esperanto from birth. Esperanto has a notable presence in 120 countries. Its usage is highest in Europe, East Asia, and South America. lernu!, the most popular online learning platform for Esperanto, reported 150,000 registered users in 2013, and sees between 150,000 and 200,000 visitors each month. With about 218,000 articles, Esperanto Wikipedia is the 32nd-largest Wikipedia as measured by the number of articles, and the largest Wikipedia in a constructed language. On 22 February 2012, Google Translate added Esperanto as its 64th language.¹ On 28 May 2015, the language learning platform Duolingo launched an Esperanto course for English speakers. As of 21 August 2015, over 100,000 users had signed up.

The first World Congress of Esperanto was organized in France in 1905. Since then, congresses have been held in various countries every year, with the exceptions of years during the world wars. Although no country has adopted Esperanto officially, Esperanto was recommended by the French Academy of Sciences in 1921 and recognized by UNESCO in 1954, which recommended in 1985 that international non-governmental organizations use Esperanto. Esperanto was the 32nd language accepted as adhering to the "Common European Framework of Reference for Languages" in 2007. Esperanto is currently the language of instruction of the International Academy of Sciences in San Marino (no comments...). Esperanto is seen by many of its speakers as an alternative or addition to the growing use of English throughout the world, offering a language that is easier to learn than English. Personally, I don't think so, and with all due respect to Esperanto which is very difficult to learn, much more than English and Spanish, and of course than Interlingua, it is much more beneficial to adopt English as an international language than Esperanto, as English is already spoken by more than a billion people, it has one of the best literatures in the world from Shakespeare to Scott Fitzgerald, the language of business, law...

Kalibano: Ve, oni min mortpincos.

Alonso: Cu ne Stefan', mia drinkul-servisto?

Sebastiano: Li ankau nun ebrias. Sed se kie li havas do la vinon?

Alonso: Kaj Trinkolo, sternig-matura! Ej, de kie do la sankta fluido, kiu ilin oras?

Kiel vi venis en la pekilon?

Trinkolo: Mi estis en tia peklo, de kiam mi vin vidis laste, ke tio, mi timas, neniam eliros el miaj ostoj. Mi ne devas timi, ke musovoj en mi larvigos.

Sebastiano: Nu, kiel nun, Stefano?

Stefano: Oj, ne tusu min: mi estas ne Stefano, sed kramfo.

Prospero: Vi volis esti la reĝo de la insulo, marodulo!

Stefano: Nu, tiam mi estus reĝo en ruboj.

Alonso (montrante al Kalibano)

Strangajon tian mi neniam vidis.

Prospero: Misfortuna kaj figure kaj anime.

Tuj, marodulo, en kabanon mian

kun la kompanoj, kaj volante, ke mi pardonu vin, balau tie orde!

Kalibano: Mi faros tion, kaj de nun mi sagos, ciel klopodos gajni vian placon.

Azen' triopa ja mi estis, preni por dio ci drinkulon, kaj adori lin, folan stupidulon.

Prospero: For, for, iru!

Alonso: For de ci ties, kaj remetitu tiun pakajon tien, kie vi ĝin trovis.

Sebastiano: Pli guste, stelis.

Exeunt Kalibano, Stefano kaj Trinkolo

Prospero: Sir', mi invitas vian altan moston

kaj sekvantaron al ci mia povra kabano por ci nokto. Mi konsumos ci tempon – parte – per rakonto tia, kiu, sendube, helpos ĝin rapide forpasi. Mian vivo-historion mi diros, kaj po unu la eventojn, de kiam mi alvenis ci insulon.

Kaj vin matene mi sur vian siron kondukos, poste portos al Napolo, kie ankoraŭ mi esperas vidi la nuptofeston de ci nia paro tiom amata. Kaj de tie mi jam min retiros al mia Milano, kaj tie ĉiu tria penso estos al mi la tombo.

Alonso: Mi sopiras audi

vivihistorion vian, nepre tre orel-allogan.

Prospero: Mi rakontos cion, promesas mildan maron, bonan venton, rapidekspedajn velojn por atingi vian regfloton – Ariel, kokido, ĵen task ankoraŭ, poste pasu inter la elementojn. Estu do libera kaj vivu gaje. – Tien ci, mi petas. Exeunt

CALIBAN. I shall be pinch'd to death.

ALONSO. Is not this Stephano, my drunken butler?

SEBASTIAN. He is drunk now; where had he wine?

ALONSO. And Trinculo is reeling ripe; where should they Find this grand liquor that hath gilded 'em?

How cam'st thou in this pickle?

TRINCULO. I have been in such a pickle since I saw you last that, I fear me, will never out of my bones. I shall not fear fly-blowing.

SEBASTIAN. Why, how now, Stephano!

STEPHANO. O, touch me not; I am not Stephano, but a cramp.

PROSPERO. You'd be king o' the isle, sirrah?

STEPHANO. I should have been a sore one, then.

ALONSO. [Pointing to CALIBAN] This is as strange a thing as e'er I look'd on.

PROSPERO. He is as disproportioned in his manners

As in his shape. Go, sirrah, to my cell;

Take with you your companions; as you look

To have my pardon, trim it handsomely.

CALIBAN. Ay, that I will; and I'll be wise hereafter,

And seek for grace. What a thrice-double ass

Was I to take this drunkard for a god,

And worship this dull fool!

PROSPERO. Go to; away!

ALONSO. Hence, and bestow your luggage where you found it.

SEBASTIAN. Or stole it, rather.

Exeunt CALIBAN, STEPHANO, and TRINCULO

PROSPERO. Sir, I invite your Highness and your train

To my poor cell, where you shall take your rest

For this one night; which, part of it, I'll waste

With such discourse as, I not doubt, shall make it

Go quick away-the story of my life,

And the particular accidents gone by

Since I came to this isle. And in the morn

I'll bring you to your ship, and so to Naples,

Where I have hope to see the nuptial

Of these our dear-belov'd solemnized,

And thence retire me to my Milan, where Every third thought shall be my grave.

ALONSO. I long

To hear the story of your life, which must Take the ear strangely.

PROSPERO. I'll deliver all;

And promise you calm seas, auspicious gales,

And sail so expeditious that shall catch

Your royal fleet far off. [Aside to ARIEL] My Ariel, chick,

That is thy charge. Then to the elements

Be free, and fare thou well!-Please you, draw near.

11.13 ROMEO AND JULIET BY WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE IN ICELANDIC & ENGLISH

And another translation of Shakespeare – this time Romeo and Juliet translated into Icelandic. I had the privilege and joy to see the play at the Shakespeare's Globe in London. This was truly a unique experience, as seeing Moliere's Georges Dandin or Tartuffe at the Comedie Francaise in Paris, Death of a Salesman or Annie Get Your Gun on Broadway, Die Dreigroschen Oper by Brecht and Weill at the Berliner Ensemble in Berlin, or Ghetto by Sobol at the Haifa Theater in Israel. In all those theaters the play that I saw was performed at the same theater or replica where the original play was performed. I did not have the opportunity to read plays in Icelandic and I had to count on the Projekt Runeberg to find the play, but I read sagas and other works in Icelandic and even stories by Andersen. I could have brought here other plays as Un ludo de sonios or a Dream Play, a translation of one of the best plays that I have read, by Strindberg, into Interlingua, which I purchased and read. I could have brought original plays in Gascon as L'amic de Pinsaguel by Maria-Jo Hustaix-Etcheverry, Andromaka by Racine in Albanian which my wife thought that it was senseless to buy as I don't intend to learn Albanian but I was very pleased to see that I could understand at least a few words. Plays by Goldoni in Veneto, plays by Pol Greisch in Luxembourgish, Suiker by Hugo Claus in Flemish/Dutch that I am reading together with his book The sorrows of Belgium – Het verdriet van Belgie (I am in page 90...). Plays in Greek by Sophocles – Oedipus the King, Electra by Euripides and Lysistrata by Aristophanes, that I am reading with a translation slowly slowly. Translations into Dutch of Ibsen's The pillars of community, A doll's house, Ghosts and An enemy of the people, that I am reading with a translation into French or English, plays in Asturianu that I read with pleasure, plays in Provencal, Rumantsch, Ukrainian, etc., and of course many of the hundreds of plays in all the languages that I brought as examples here in this book. As I don't want that the book would be too bulky, I prefer to stop here, and strongly recommend the reader to learn all those languages, read plays in all the languages or their translations, and go to the theater or see the films of the plays in cinema, on TV or on DVD, as I have done, with an outstanding collection of DVDs of the best performances of the plays in English, French and Hebrew, but also in other languages as well, and that I bring here in this book for those who want to purchase the DVDs or watch the plays or the films on the Internet, as it maybe difficult to watch Hello Dolly with Barbra Streisand on the Internet, but it is very easy to watch all the Comedie Francaise's performances of the comedies by Moliere on the Internet free of charge, which is a treat for the intellectuals.

Ldr.\ Eg tala stuttort, þar eð styttra andrúms eg spái mér en sæmi mærd og mælg.

Hinn myrti Rómeó var maður Júlfa, hin myrta Júlfa trúföst kona Rómeós;

eg gipti þau, og þeirra brúðkaupsdagur varð dauðadagur Tíbalts; þetta fall hans það flæmdi burtu brúðgumann úr staðnum, og því grét Júlía, ekki afdrif Tíbalts.

(Til Kapúletts.)

Nú komuð þér og vilduð hugga hana, og festuð hana' og vilduð fá með valdi hún giptist Parls; ærð og utan við sig

fór hún til mín og bað mig ráð að brugga að frelsa sig frá seinni giptingunni, og kvaðst sig ella myrða í klefa mínum ;

þá tók eg til míns fróðleiks, fann upp svefn- lyf og færði henni, sem þá óðar dugði, sem ætlað var; hún hneig sem liðið lík.

 1 millibili reit eg bréf til Rómeós og bað hann koma þessa þrauta-nótt að taka hana' úr hennar lánsgröf með mér, því áhrif drykksins áttu þá að hætta.
 En bróðir Jón, sero bréfið skyldi flytja, fékk hindrun, svo að hann kom með það aptur
 f gærðag seint; eg gekk þá einn á stað í sama mund og sett' eg henni að vakna, að frelsa hana' úr frænda sinna grafreit, og hugði' að leyna henni' f klefa mínum unz fengist stund að finna bónda hennar; en þá eg kom og örstutt dvöl var eptir af svefni hennar, sé eg báða dauða, hinn tryggva Rómeó og hinn prúða Parfs; þá sezt hún upp; eg sárbið hana' að koma og bera Drottins kross með kjarki' og þreki, en þá kom hark, sem hræddi mig 1 burtu; en hún svo óð og hamslaus vildi' ei fylgja, og hefur meitt sig sjálfa, að það sýnist.
 Eg veit ei meira. Hennar hjónaband veit fósttran. Nú, nú, finnist eg þá sekur f nokkru þessu, býð eg fram f bætur hið gamla llf mitt, litlu fyrir tímann, að dæmast eptir dómi strangra laga.

FursLi I>ú hefur jafnan verið haldinn helgur.
 Nú, Rómeós þjónn, hvað veit hann satt að segja?

Ballh.: Eg flutti Rómeó fregn um andiát Júlíu; frá Mantúu hann hleypti þá með hraða unz hingað kom og innað þessum grafreit;
 hann bað mig færa föður sfnun bréf, og bjó sig til að brjóta þessa hvelving, og kvaðst mig drepa, ef eg ekki flýði.

Furst: Fá þú mér bijefið, eg vil sjá þess efni. —
 En hvar er greifans sveinn, er sótti vörðinn?

Sveinn: Hann kom með blóm að breiða' á leiði Júlíu og bauð mér standa fjarri, sem eg gjörði;
 þá kemur einn með ljós að brjóta' upp leiðið og rétt á eptir ræðst minn herra' á manninn, og hljóp eg þá að hrópa' á varðmennina.

Furst: Og bréfið sannar sögu mannsins alla, það segir enn hann hafi keypt sér eitur af lyfjasala' og ætli' að halda hingað og fylgja Hfs og liðinn sinni Júlíu. — Nú, miklu Qandmenn, Montag! Kapúlett!

 sjá, hversu Drottinn hegnir ykkar hatri, hann hefur ykkar gleði steyppt með elsku!
 og* eg\ sem þoldi ykkar vonða fjandskap, hef misst tvofrændur: öllum hlaut að hefnast.

Kap.: Ó, bróðir, Montag, bjóð mér þína hönd, eg bið um dóttur minnar forlagseyri og heimta' ei meir.

Mont.\ En meira vil eg gjalda;
 úr skíru gulli skal hún hljóta varða, og meðan nokkur nefnir Verónsborg skal hvergi finnast mynd á vengi víðu eins vegsamleg og Júlíu hinnar fríðu!

Kap.\ f>íns sonar mynd skal hennar standa hjá, svo heiptarfórnir beggja megi sjá!

Fursh'- Oss færir þessi dagur dapran frið og drottning ljóssins felur hryggva brá.
 Vér skulum enn þá eigast meira við og einn skal laun, en hinn skal refsing fá.
 því engum raunir auðnan þyngri bjó en ungri Júlíu og Rómeó.

Friar.
 I will be brief, for my short date of breath
 Is not so long as is a tedious tale.
 Romeo, there dead, was husband to that Juliet;
 And she, there dead, that Romeo's faithful wife:
 I married them; and their stol'n marriage day
 Was Tybalt's doomsday, whose untimely death
 Banish'd the new-made bridegroom from this city;
 For whom, and not for Tybalt, Juliet pin'd.
 You, to remove that siege of grief from her,
 Betroth'd, and would have married her perforce,
 To County Paris:—then comes she to me,
 And with wild looks, bid me devise some means
 To rid her from this second marriage,
 Or in my cell there would she kill herself.
 Then gave I her, so tutored by my art,
 A sleeping potion; which so took effect
 As I intended, for it wrought on her
 The form of death: meantime I writ to Romeo
 That he should hither come as this dire night,
 To help to take her from her borrow'd grave,
 Being the time the potion's force should cease.

But he which bore my letter, Friar John,
 Was stay'd by accident; and yesternight
 Return'd my letter back. Then all alone
 At the prefixed hour of her waking
 Came I to take her from her kindred's vault;
 Meaning to keep her closely at my cell
 Till I conveniently could send to Romeo:
 But when I came,—some minute ere the time
 Of her awaking,—here untimely lay
 The noble Paris and true Romeo dead.
 She wakes; and I entreated her come forth
 And bear this work of heaven with patience:
 But then a noise did scare me from the tomb;
 And she, too desperate, would not go with me,
 But, as it seems, did violence on herself.
 All this I know; and to the marriage
 Her nurse is privy: and if ought in this Miscarried by my fault, let my old life
 Be sacrific'd, some hour before his time,
 Unto the rigour of severest law.

Prince.

We still have known thee for a holy man.—
 Where's Romeo's man? what can he say in this?

Balthasar.

I brought my master news of Juliet's death;
 And then in post he came from Mantua
 To this same place, to this same monument.
 This letter he early bid me give his father;
 And threaten'd me with death, going in the vault,
 If I departed not, and left him there.

Prince.

Give me the letter,—I will look on it.—
 Where is the county's page that rais'd the watch?—
 Sirrah, what made your master in this place?

Boy.

He came with flowers to strew his lady's grave;
 And bid me stand aloof, and so I did:
 Anon comes one with light to ope the tomb;
 And by-and-by my master drew on him;
 And then I ran away to call the watch.

Prince.

This letter doth make good the friar's words,
 Their course of love, the tidings of her death:
 And here he writes that he did buy a poison
 Of a poor 'pothecary, and therewithal

Came to this vault to die, and lie with Juliet.—
 Where be these enemies?—Capulet,—Montague,—
 See what a scourge is laid upon your hate,
 That heaven finds means to kill your joys with love!
 And I, for winking at your discords too,
 Have lost a brace of kinsmen:—all are punish'd.

Capulet.
 O brother Montague, give me thy hand:
 This is my daughter's jointure, for no more
 Can I demand.

Montague.
 But I can give thee more:
 For I will raise her statue in pure gold;
 That while Verona by that name is known,
 There shall no figure at such rate be set
 As that of true and faithful Juliet.

Capulet.
 As rich shall Romeo's by his lady's lie;
 Poor sacrifices of our enmity!

Prince.
 A glooming peace this morning with it brings;
 The sun for sorrow will not show his head.
 Go hence, to have more talk of these sad things;
 Some shall be pardon'd, and some punished;
 For never was a story of more woe
 Than this of Juliet and her Romeo.

[Exeunt.]

Romeo and Juliet is a tragedy written by William Shakespeare early in his career about two young star-crossed lovers whose deaths ultimately reconcile their feuding families. It was among Shakespeare's most popular plays during his lifetime and, along with Hamlet, is one of his most frequently performed plays. Today, the title characters are regarded as archetypal young lovers. Romeo and Juliet belongs to a tradition of tragic romances stretching back to antiquity. The plot is based on an Italian tale translated into verse as The Tragical History of Romeus and Juliet by Arthur Brooke in 1562, and retold in prose in Palace of Pleasure by William Painter in 1567. Shakespeare borrowed heavily from both, but expanded the plot by developing a number of supporting characters, particularly Mercutio and Paris. Believed to have been written between 1591 and 1595, the play was first published in a quarto version in 1597. The text of the first quarto version was of poor quality, however, and later editions corrected the text to conform more closely with Shakespeare's original. Shakespeare's use of his poetic dramatic structure (especially effects such as switching between comedy and tragedy to heighten tension, his expansion of minor characters, and his use of sub-plots to embellish the story) has been praised as an early sign of his dramatic skill. The play ascribes different poetic forms to different characters, sometimes changing the form as the character develops. Romeo, for example, grows more adept at the sonnet over the course of the play.

11.14 ON THE LANGUAGE ASTURIAN, XUACU BUSCA CRIAU... I Y NA MAS! XUACU LOOKS FOR A SERVANT... & NOTHING MORE! BY PACHIN DE MELAS IN ASTURIAN

I like very much to read plays in local languages, in Catalan, Asturiano, Gascon or Rumantsch. You get the flavor of the life and custom of the people in their original enjoyable juicy language. Pachin de Melas (Emilio Robles Muniz) – 1877-1938 is the best writer in Asturiano who wrote novels, poetry and plays. I enjoyed very much to read much of his works in the Obra Completa which I have in my library. One of them is the monologue Xuan busca criau.. i y na mas!, 1928. Xuacu tells the story of his attempt to find a servant which is very difficult nowadays (in 1928, in Spain...). He interviewed a servant and told him that his job is to do that and that, and that's all. And to do this and this, and that's all, and so on. Until the servant went away and Xuacu decided not to hire a servant and to do all the work by himself, as really it is not much work to do...

Asturian, asturianu, or bable, is a Romance language of the West Iberian group, Astur-Leonese subgroup, spoken in Asturias (Spain). Asturian is part of a wider linguistic group known as Astur-Leonese languages. The current number of speakers of Asturian is estimated at about 100,000 first-language speakers and 450,000 second-language speakers. There are three predominant variants in the Astur-Leonese linguistic domain (Western, Central and Eastern), although in the case of Asturias, for historical and demographic reasons, the standard is based on Central Asturian. Asturian has a grammar, a dictionary of the Asturian language, and an orthography. It is regulated by the Academy of the Asturian Language, and even though it is not an official language of Spain, it is protected under the autonomous statute legislation and is an optional language at schools. There is an important literature in this regional language.

ESCENA UNICA - Decoración : Selva o lo que se tenga

XUACU.- (Vestido a gusto del actor, teniendo en cuenta que es un hombre de edad. Entra preocupado como si llegara de la villa.) Non, non; de la que va, el mundo vóltiase como un calcetín. Esto non ye vida. De too lo que van enventando los hombres, non dexe que más que ruidu y fumo. Lo mesmo van gufando como diablos per eses carreteres de Dios que, pensando que non caben ena tierra, echense a volar per ahí p'arriba faciendo compañía a los glayos. Lo pior non ye eso. Desque les muyeres dioyos por cortar la coleta, andar con les pates al aire y arremangaes tou el día, que paez que van al río, too anda de caeza. Si, señores, si. Aquí me tenéis a min que ando alloriáu fai una semana buscando criáu pa la casería i non lu topo nin con candil. Hoy los mozos tán fechos unos señoritos. Tal quixieren que les fesories fueren de fueya y que la yerba se segará así, soplandola. Y too por non agachase, nin doblar el espinazu. munchu reló na muñeca, chaqueta amarrá con centurión, corbata, sombleru... pero en cuanto ven la gadaña, temblen de mieu, así Dios me salve.

Yo toy que español, que gufo, que reviento. ¡Ca vez que pienso que non me para un criáu en casa más que tres dis...! Paez que yos ponen un cuete nos calzones. Cudiau que la mio casería ye... como toes. Ye lliviana y de pocu trabayu. Tou el día tán mano sobre mano... Home, claro, despues de facer les llabores... Esto ye una disgracia. Cháronme, nón sé por qué, una fama... que en cinco llegües a la redonda, non topo mozu que quiera tar en casa. Digovos que quieren ganalo de magullón; pos tanto, tanto que facer ena hacienda non hay. El últimu criáu que fue a pretender dexóme abobáu del too. Voy cuntávoslo, a ver si tengo o non razón.

Taba yo el otro día arrimáu a un pegollu del hórreu pensando nestes y otre coses, que el que quier pensar nunca i falta en qué, cuando per el camín alante y enfiláu a la portiella vego venir un rapazón fornidu, trabáu, anchu de espaldes y con dos deos lo menos de altura sobre min. Como ser güen mozu, yéralo.

--- ¿Fai falta un criáu? -preguntome resueltu.

Mírolu, arreparolu bien de arriba a baxo y digoi :

--- Tú non yes de aquí, ¿verdá?

--- Non, señor, soy de bastantina lejos.

Esto sin que me lo dixera él, ya lo presumía yo.

--- De moo que entoncies, ¿nunca serviste per estes aldees?

--- Ye la primera vez, -dizme el mozu- que vengo per aquí. Marché de onde taba porque non me convenía.

--- ¿Riñisti col amu, chacho?

--- ¡Ca! Mon me non -fala el rapaz suspirando- aquello non yera vida. Arreventábenme a trabayar. Nin de día nin de noche taba quietu. Si non marchó, doy del pechu sin remediú.

--- ¡Provín! -dixe yo- , nin tanto nin d'ello.

Güelvo arreparalu y paeciáame más mozu, más güapu y más trabáu. Lláncioi un regüeyu y penso... forasteru, rapaz y reciu; esti si que non se me escapa de casa y tengo criáu pa toa la vida. El cuentu yera dicí lo que tenia que facer na casería pa que el día de mañana non se llamara a engañu... pero diciéndolo de una manera... quier decise, sin contailo mucho, como aquel que ha facer los llabores bailando... pero tien que facelos.

--- Atiendi, mozu -ascomienzo yo-, casualmente llegues a tiempu, pos marchóme pal serviciu el criáu que tenía y antes de meter a otru de aquí y tú non andes tiráu per ahí... De moo que si te convién podemos arreglalo. Tú fiel seráslo, ¿eh, chacho?.

--- Home, qué coses diz. Tocante a fiel... como un perru -diz altivu.

--- Pos con esa cualida güena de les presones, tán abiertes toes les puertes. Tocante a soldada doite veinte duros al añu, manteníu claro está, y según te portes tú, ansí faré yo. Si acasu un traje per les fiestes, y si cumples a mi gusto, unes botes per añu nuevu y de Xineru a Xineru, lo que pingue. ¿falo bien?

--- Por agora -diz el zagalón- non ta mal.

--- Tocante al trabayu, non mata. La mio caseria, ye como toes. Verás lo poco que hay que facer. Tú como forasteru non conoces a naide nesti llugar y en esi casu non dirás a correyar los sábados, ya que pasar la noche per eses caleyes fraya el cuerpu y al otru día non ta ún pa prestar. Pol verano llevántaste al amanecer... Y NA MAS... pos mozu dormilón, rónelu el sergón. Y de invienu, a la mesma hora del verano, ya que aunque el sol non salga les coses hay que trabayales... Y NA MAS... Ye natural que al levantase hay que catar, arreglar el ganao pa sacalo al agua, mandalo a la llende... Y NA MAS... Home, bastiar algo de fruta pa mandar a la villa por la collaza, dar una esclava a los gochos, char unos granos a les pites... Y NA MAS... deseguí a tomar la parva, que una sardina arenga y una escudiella de lleche a Dios, non falta. Después a trabayucar per allí un poco. Ver que non falte la leña, segar dalgo pal ganao, arreglar los prescos, paliar el cuchu... Y NA MAS... A les doce a comer un güen platu de fabes, y si hay tropiezos, ya los toparás.

El mozacu al oyeme baxaba la caeza, dábai güeltes a la gorra entre les manes y paecía que i gustaba el asuntu.

--- Pos güeno -sigoi falando-, acabes de comer y ya que per la noche dormiste abondo, ¿pa qué vas char la siesta? Non te lo digo per lo que pierdas de trabayar, sino mirando per la salú tuya. Non falta un cierrucu onde sembrar o sacar patates, que sayar o arrendar, dir al monte por rozu...Y NA MAS... Ansi va pasando la tardi y habrá que chayos otra esclava a los gochos, que non ta mal, unos graninos a les pites tamién.. Y NA MAS...

--- Claro, home, ye del casu que como el ganao ya ye gora de chalo pa casa, llimpies la corral pa estrala como ye debío, la yerba ya ta allí; cates otra vez... Y NA MAS... ¿Que a too esto cierra la noche? Pos pa casa a cenar, que dalgo que sobró de les doce non va tirase a los gochos y agora sí ...NA MAS... Home, por non dir pa la camacon el bocáu na boca podíes char un güeyu a los animales, ver cómo ta la forna pa arrojar, ayudar dalgo ena mazada... Y NA MAS... A dormir como un lirón... AL otro dia...

El mozu ponse tiesu, mírame en tientes y dizme gallasperu...

--- Al otro dia lo mesmo, ¿que non? Ansí Dios me salve que la so casa ye bien descansá. Pos mire, de esi palu vengo yo de sopllar otra gaita. Conque busque otro que lu sirva, porque yo por mi NA MAS, ¡NA MAS!... ¡Y NA MAS!...

Y dando la güelta corrió caleya abaxo. ¿Ta bien eso? ¿Non vos lo dixen yo? Pos güeno, acabóse. Desde hoy en mi casa non entra nin mozu, nin moza, nin vieyu, nin vieya pa servir. Tá dicho. Pa lo que hay que facer bástome y sóbrome yo solu... Non me miréis. Non quiero a delgún.

Aunque falándolo suave naide en mi casa quier tar si me aplaudis... entós quiérovos.
conque ná más... Y NA MAS...

Y NA MAS

Although some 10th-century documents have the linguistic features of Asturian, numerous examples (such as writings by notaries, contracts and wills begin in the 13th century. Early examples are the 1085 Fuero de Avilés (the oldest parchment preserved in Asturias) and the 13th-century Fuero de Oviedo and the Leonese version of the Fuero Xulgu. The 13th-century documents were the laws for towns, cities and the general population.^[19] By the second half of the 16th century, documents were written in Castilian, backed by the Trastámara dynasty and making the civil and ecclesiastical arms of the principality Castilian. Although the Asturian language disappeared from written texts during the siegllos oscuros (dark centuries), it survived orally. The only written mention during this time is from a 1555 work by Hernán Núñez about proverbs and adages: " ... in a large copy of rare languages, as Portuguese, Galician, Asturian, Catalan, Valencian, French, Tuscan ... ". Modern Asturian literature began in 1605 with the clergyman Antón González Reguera and continued until the 18th century (when it produced, according to Ruiz de la Peña in 1981, a literature comparable to that in Asturias in Castilian). In 1744, Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos wrote about the historic and cultural value of Asturian, urging the compilation of a dictionary and a grammar and the creation of a language academy. Notable writers included Francisco Bernaldo de Quirós Benavides (1675), Xosefa Xovellanos (1745), Xuan González Villar y Fuertes (1746), Xosé Caveda y Nava (1796), Xuan María Acebal (1815), Teodoro Cuesta (1829), Xosé Benigno García González, Marcos del Torniello (1853), Bernardo Acevedo y Huelves (1849), Pin de Pría (1864), Galo Fernández and Fernán Coronas (1884). In 1974, a movement for the language's acceptance and use began in Asturias. Based on ideas of the Asturian association Conceyu Bable about Asturian language and culture, a plan was developed for the acceptance and modernization of the language that led to the 1980 creation of the Academy of the Asturian Language with the approval of the Asturias regional council. El Surdimientu (the Awakening) authors such as Manuel Asur (Cancios y poemas pa un riscar), Xuan Bello (El llibru vieyu), Adolfo Camilo Díaz (Añada pa un güeyu muertu), Pablo Antón Marín Estrada (Les hores), Xandru Fernández (Les ruines), Lourdes Álvarez, Martín López-Vega, Miguel Rojo and Lluis Antón González broke from the Asturian-Leonese tradition of rural themes, moral messages and dialogue-style writing. Currently, the Asturian language has about 150 annual publications.

11.15 ON THE LANGUAGE ROMANSH, FRANCESCA DA RIMINI BY SILVIO PELLICO IN ITALIAN AND ROMANSH

Simone de Beauvoir said: Les gens heureux n'ont pas d'histoire – Happy people don't have stories. But as we have seen Tolstoy said before her that happy people have the same story. That is why the story of a heroine like Francesca da Rimini has been told by Dante, in dozens of plays and operas, in art, in music – plays by Gabriele d'Annunzio, Silvio Pellico, operas by Saverio Mercadante, Sergei Rachmaninoff, a Symphonic poem by Tchaikovsky, paintings by Ingres, Dore, a sculpture by Rodin (The Kiss)... Daughter of Guido I da Polenta of Ravenna, Francesca was wedded in or around 1275 to the brave, yet crippled Giovanni Malatesta, son of Malatesta da Verucchio, lord of Rimini. The marriage was a political one; Guido had been at war with the Malatesta family, and the marriage of his daughter to Giovanni was a way to solidify the peace that had been negotiated between the Malatesta and the Polenta families. While in Rimini, she fell in love with Giovanni's younger (and still hale) brother, Paolo. Though Paolo too was married, they managed to carry on an affair for some ten years, until Giovanni ultimately surprised them in Francesca's bedroom sometime between 1283 and 1286, killing them both. We bring here the last scene by Silvio Pellico and from my library the translation into Rumantsch.

Romansh (also spelled Romansch, Rumantsch, or Romanche; Romansh: is a Romance language spoken predominantly in the southeastern Swiss canton of Grisons (Graubünden), where it has official status alongside German and Italian and is used as the medium of instruction of schools in Romansh-speaking areas. Romansh has also been recognized as a national language of Switzerland since 1938 and as an official language along with German, French and Italian since 1996. It is sometimes grouped with Ladin and Friulian as a Rhaeto-Romance language, though this is disputed. Romansh is a descendant of the spoken Latin language of the Roman Empire, which replaced the Celtic and Raetic languages previously spoken in the area by the 5th century AD, though Romansh retains a small number of words from these languages. Romansh has also been heavily influenced by German in vocabulary and morphosyntax. The language gradually retreated to its current area over the centuries, being replaced by Alemannic and Bavarian dialects. The earliest writing in Romansh dates from the 10th or 11th century, though major works do not appear until the 16th century, when several regional written varieties began to develop. The 19th century saw a further shrinkage of the language area, but also a literary revival and the start of a language movement dedicated to halting the decline of the language.

In the 2000 Swiss census, 35,095 people (of whom 27,038 live in the canton of Grisons) indicated Romansh as the language of "best command", and 61,815 as a "regularly spoken" language. In 2010, Switzerland switched to a yearly system which uses a combination of municipal citizen records and a limited number of surveys. Based on this yearly system, the number of people aged 15 and above reporting Romansh as their main language was 36,622 in 2012.^[1] Spoken by around 0.9% of Switzerland's 7.7 million inhabitants, Romansh is Switzerland's least-used national language in terms of number of speakers and the eleventh most spoken language in Switzerland overall. The language area and number of speakers of Romansh has been continually shrinking over the past, though language use remains vigorous in certain regions. Romansh is divided into five different regional dialects (Sursilvan, Sutsilvan, Surmiran, Putèr, and Vallader), each with its own standardized written language. In addition, a pan-regional variety called Rumantsch Grischun was introduced in 1982, which is controversial among Romansh speakers. It goes without saying that I have books with texts in Ladin (by Luisa Famos and others), Surmiran, Sutsilvan, Sursilvan, etc. and I am still trying to find the difference between all those languages that are spoken by a few thousands people each but you can find literature in all the regional dialects of this language. A question which I am trying to answer is why me and many people all over the world give so much attention to the literature in a language spoken by so few people, even if the level of this literature is sometimes shallow, and if the same authors would have written in Russian or French no one would ever pay attention to them. Furthermore, me and many people all over the world give a lot of attention to micro countries with a population of a few thousands in a remote island in the Pacific which have no importance from any point of view except that they are independent countries with an equal vote in the UN, like India with a population of more than a billion that contributed so much to the world in religion, philosophy, literature, economy, art, music, films... There is no justice in this world!

Scena ultima - Lanciotto, Guido e detti.

Lanciotto: Oh vista.
Paolo?... Tradito da mie guardie sono...
Oh rabbia! E ad esser testimon di tanta
Infamia, o Guido, mi chiamasti? Ad arte
Ella a me ti mando. Fuggire o farsi
Ribelli a me volean; muoiano entrambi.
(Snuda il ferro e combatte contro Paolo).

Francesca: Oh rio sospetto!

Guido: Scellerata figlia, a malederti mi costringi.

Paolo: Tutti,
O Francesca, t'abborrono; me solo
Difensore hai.

Francesca: Placatevi, o fratelli; fra i vostri ferri io mi porro. La rea son io...

Lanciotto: Muori! (la trafigge).

Guido: Me misero!

Lanciotto: E tu, vile.
Difenditi.

Paolo: (Getta a terra la spada, si lascia ferire).
Trafiggimi!

Guido: Che festi?

Lanciotto: Oh ciel! Qual sangue!

11.16 ON THE LANGUAGE GASCON, LA PASTORALA DEU PAISAN, CALVINISME DE BEARN DIVISAT EN SEIS EGLOGAS IN GASCON & FRENCH, BY J. H. FONDEVILLE

Gascon is a dialect of Occitan. It is mostly spoken in Gascony and Béarn in southwestern France (in parts of the following French départements: Pyrénées-Atlantiques, Hautes-Pyrénées, Landes, Gers, Gironde, Lot-et-Garonne, Haute-Garonne, and Ariège) and in the Aran Valley of Catalonia. It has about 250,000 speakers worldwide. Gascony is the land of d'Artagnan, who inspired Alexandre Dumas's character d'Artagnan in The Three Musketeers. It is also home to the hero of the play Cyrano de Bergerac (though this character has little in common with the real Cyrano de Bergerac, who was a Parisian) and to Henry III of Navarre who later became king of France as Henry IV. I visited Gascony and Pau, the city of Henry IV, and enjoyed very much my visit and reading texts – books and plays in Gascon. I have chosen to bring here a page of a play La pastorala deu paisan by J. H. Fondeville (1633-1705). This is a popular play written in the language of the people, and what is peculiar – the common people speak in this play Gascon, as in the text below the prologue of the peasant, but the erudite persons as the Doctor speak French. The play has a very low opinion of the doctors, lawyers, pharamacists, in a style that reminds us of Moliere's plays. After rejecting all the "sophisticated" professions, the son of the peasant prefers to remain a peasant. Fondeville wrote another play: Calvinisme de Bearn divisat en seis eglogas – on calvinism in Bearn, we bring here verses 122-133 in Gascon and French.

Transaltion - French

Tous les dimanches ils faisaient deux fois leurs mauvais sermons
 En français, en béarnais, sans un seul mot de latin,
 Et ils leur faisaient chanter, tant l'après-midi que le matin,
 Les psaumes de David traduits en français
 Par Marot et par Bèze, et aussi en béarnais

Par un docteur natif de la ville de Pau
 Qui fut un ministre des plus importants chez les huguenots.
 Ces chants étaient chantés par les messieurs et les dames,
 Les laboureurs, les artisans, tant hommes que femmes,
 Tous ensembles mêlés, les grands avec les petits ;
 Dans le temple, en chantant, ils poussaient des hurlements,
 Et ces chants-là, ils les appelaient des prières.

12. EXTRACTS AND ANALYSIS OF THE OPERA RIGOLETTO, PLAYS BY IONESCO, MAMET, ARTHUR MILLER, CORY'S PLAY/NOVEL BEWARE OF GREEKS' PRESENTS/NELLY DORON/NELLY'S CHOICE, SYNOPSIS, TABLE OF CONTENTS, ON COINCIDENCE IN MY LIFE, THE WORLD IS A STAGE, WE ARE MERELY PLAYERS

12.1 THE ODYSSEY OF THE PLAY/NOVEL BEWARE OF GREEKS' PRESENTS/NELLY DORON/NELLY'S CHOICE

In this final chapter on plays I present extracts and an analysis of other plays and opera, as well as extracts of my play/novel Beware of Greeks' Presents/Nelly Doron/Nelly's Choice, a synopsis and a table of contents. My play was "born" in a day of extreme frustration by my impossibility to punish the wrongdoers who have conned me and thousands of minority shareholders. As nobody was willing to join me in a legal suit, I read Homer's Odyssey in order to overcome my negative feelings, when all at once I had an illumination to write a play, a modern Odyssey, with Israelis protagonists – Uly/Ulysses/Odysseus, Nelly/Penelope, Arie/Poseidon, Eli/Dionysus..., about an honest businessman who cannot fight the corruption prevailing in the business world in a long Odyssey. I wrote a synopsis of 60 pages on the sixth of July 1997, while every protagonist dictated to me what he wanted to be, I had the exhilarating experience of a muse assisting me to write the play, the birth of the play was very easy, during the following 18 days I wrote the play on my computer, and I achieved to write a very long play of five acts, a classical play – Nelly Doron. I gave it to read to my wife and children, and my wife vetoed the publication of the play as people would think that it is a personal play with Ruthy and me as Nelly and Uly, although the starting point was perhaps autobiographical – the surprise party of Nelly/Ruthy who took place a few years ago, but the plot was completely different, Nelly's Choice how to solve the impasse, and of course the end of the play. In the meantime others read and liked the play.

A few years later a friend of mine who had a small publishing house was very moved by the play and advised me to adapt it to a novel – Beware of Greeks' Presents. That I did and he published my novel in 2001, that was sold only in a few hundreds copies. Since 2004, when I started to teach my courses in business ethics at Israeli's universities, I introduced my novel and play which I donated in several copies to the libraries in my curriculum, as it was the unique Israeli novel which dealt on business ethics issues, especially towards minority shareholders. Thousands of students read it, presented the ethical issues of the main protagonists, and the most famous Israeli playwright Joshua Sobol gave an excellent review on the play. The play was not staged in Israel and in France, in spite of it being translated by a French playwright and published in France. It was not published in Israel, but I donated copies to my universities of the adaptation of the play Nelly's Choice into a much shorter play which I wrote with Amalia Eyal, and I published on my website the original version of the play Nelly Doron, as well as extracts of my novel and Nelly's Choice. It was almost staged twice in Israel, once at the Haifa Theater where everything was settled, there was a draft agreement and I even hired an agent, but the theater got bankrupt on the day that we were supposed to sign the contract... The play was almost staged in another famous Israeli theater but did not get the final approval. However, the play was read to the public on July 30, 2008 by the students of the Theater Department of the University of Jerusalem, where I got my BA, is one of the leading universities in the world, and its publisher Magnes published my business ethics book in the same month. I even was asked to prepare a disc of the music accompanying the play, which I did and I present it here in text and in a link.

12.2 SYNOPSIS OF THE NOVEL "BEWARE OF GREEKS' PRESENTS" BY J. CORY

The novel "Beware of Greeks' Presents" describes in a trenchant way the corruption in the business world, as only a businessman who knows the reality from personal knowledge can describe. The author, Jacques Cory, is a businessman who decided to write this book during a period in which the moral and ethical norms in the western world are deteriorating. The topic of corruption in business, as described by authentic novels written by businessmen, has not yet received adequate exposure in literature. Cory, with his large experience as a top level high tech executive and M&A specialist, has written a very original and convincing book which conveys a message about the future of society in the new millennium – a message of despair mixed with hope. "Beware of Greeks' Presents" depicts current issues affecting the business world: corruption, racism and women's liberation. But it is also a universal book about love and betrayal, and how love can surmount all hardships.

The protagonists of the book are Ully and Nelly Doron, an Israeli couple who are not ready to succumb to the new norms and, as a consequence, pay the full price, followed by the betrayal of their best friends. Their ordeal is related as a modern Odyssey, as the heroes are of Greek origin and are compared to those of Homer. The plot commences at a surprise party that Ully throws in his Tel Aviv home for his wife, in which all their friends participate. During the party a scheme is conceived by two of their friends, Arie and Eli, to take over at a manipulated price a company that Ully assisted its founder, Hadas, to make public and invested heavily in, thus making him lose all his money as well as the investment of the minority shareholders. The idyll of the party stands in sharp contrast to the Kafkaesque nightmare that will ensue unveiling the masks of hypocrisy.

Ully, a modern Ulysses, is a shrewd and tough businessman who tries to fight the corruption while maintaining elementary ethical norms. However, he is not able to cope with the ruthless businessmen who act without any inhibitions and are backed by almost all of society. On the other hand, Nelly, a modern Penelope, develops out of the crisis from an innocent teacher to a fearless warrior. She ceases to be a submissive woman who weaves all day and is completely faithful to her husband, and transforms herself into a modern woman who takes fate into her own hands in order to save her husband, herself and their marriage. Sima Calpha, a modern Calypso, is a beautiful young ambitious and feminist woman. She works as a lawyer at Eli's company. After having succeeded to tempt Ully, she tries unsuccessfully to break his marriage, but hopes that by disclosing to him her bosses' schemes she will win back his heart. However, Ully remains this time faithful to his wife who stands by him remarkably, even after learning from Eli of Ully's affair with Sima.

Hadas, the honest and innocent scientist, is soon corrupted by Arie and Eli and merges his company with them behind Ully's back to the detriment of his minority shareholders. He accuses Ully of double-crossing, being under the influence of Arie's calumnies on Ully. But after discovering that he was conned too and suffering from heavy remorse of his betrayal he commits suicide with the tacit assistance of Arie and Eli. Arie, the ruthless entrepreneur and Chairman of the Board, has no scruples and believes that everything is permitted in order to grow and maximize profitability, including conning his stakeholders - his partners, shareholders, employees, and the government. Everybody is intimidated by him, cooperates or at least doesn't blow the whistle, as the law of Omerta prevails in this mafia-like business environment. Only Ully dares to oppose Arie's schemes, but all his friends who rally Arie soon ostracize him.

Eli, the shrewd Machiavellian general manager, complements Arie's skills by being his executioner. He does all the dirty work, which is often criminal, without fearing to be caught as he has the backing of the company with its large resources. Although very ugly, he is charming and very successful with women who are attracted by his satanic spell. But this feature is also his Achilles' heel, as proved by Nelly's successful plot. Finally, the solution is found by introducing a Trojan horse, a Greeks' present, into the fortress of the enemy. But is the victory complete? Are the methods employed by the protagonists adequate, or are they not corruptive also? What is the line that one should not cross when fighting corruption? Is such a victory worthwhile? These questions form the main dilemma of the book – a dilemma in which every reader can find a parallel from his or her own personal experiences.

Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes is a Latin phrase from Aeneid (II, 49), written by Virgil between 29 and 19 BC. It has been paraphrased in English as the proverb "Beware of Greeks bearing gifts". Its literal meaning is "I fear the Danaans [Greeks], even those bearing gifts" or "even when they bear gifts". Most printed versions of the text have the variant ferentis instead of ferentes. As related in the Aeneid, after a nine-year war on the beaches of Troy between the Danaans (Greeks from the mainland) and the Trojans, the Greek seer Calchas induces the leaders of the Greek army to win the war by means of subterfuge: build a huge wooden horse and sail away from Troy as if in defeat - leaving the horse behind as a votive offering for a safe journey home. The Trojan Horse actually contains a hand-picked team of crack Greek warriors hidden in its wooden belly. The Trojan priest Laocoön suspects that some menace is hidden in the horse, and he warns the Trojans not to accept the gift, crying, Equō nē crēdite, Teucrī! Quidquid id est, timeō Danaōs et dōna ferentes. ("Do not trust the horse, Trojans! Whatever it is, I fear the Danaans, even when bringing gifts.") Immediately after Laocoön proclaims his warning, he throws a spear at the horse, which pierces its side; Virgil writes that the groan from the Greek warriors hidden within would surely have alerted the Trojans to the trick if the gods had not already ordained Troy's destruction.

Soon after he casts his spear, enormous twin serpents slither out of the sea and attack Laocoön's sons. When Laocoön tries to help them, he too is viciously slain. The Trojans assume the horse has been offered at Minerva's (Athena's) prompting and interpret Laocoön's death as a sign of her displeasure. The Trojans agree unanimously to place the horse atop wheels and roll it through their impenetrable walls as a trophy of their victory. Festivities follow, celebrating the end of the war. That night, the Greeks hidden inside the horse creep out and open the city gates to the entire Greek army, which has sailed back to Troy under cover of darkness. The Greek sack the city and Troy is destroyed. In the modern era, the phrase was translated to Katharevousa Greek as Φοβοῦ τοὺς Δαναοὺς καὶ δῶρα φέροντας ("fear the Danaans, even if bearing gifts!") and has become a common Greek proverb.

The Trojan Horse is a tale from the Trojan War about the subterfuge that the Greeks used to enter the city of Troy and win the war. In the canonical version, after a fruitless 10-year siege, the Greeks constructed a huge wooden horse, and hid a select force of men inside. The Greeks pretended to sail away, and the Trojans pulled the horse into their city as a victory trophy. That night the Greek force crept out of the horse and opened the gates for the rest of the Greek army, which had sailed back under cover of night. The Greeks entered and destroyed the city of Troy, decisively ending the war. Metaphorically a "Trojan Horse" has come to mean any trick or stratagem that causes a target to invite a foe into a securely protected bastion or place. A malicious computer program which tricks users into willingly running it is also called a "Trojan horse". The main ancient source for the story is the Aeneid of Virgil, a Latin epic poem from the time of Augustus. The event is referred to in Homer's Odyssey. In the Greek tradition, the horse is called the "Wooden Horse" (Δούρειος ἵππος, Doúreios Híppos, in the Homeric Ionic dialect).

12.5 REVIEW OF THE GREAT ISRAELI PLAYWRIGHT JOSHUA SOBOL ON THE PLAY "NELLY'S CHOICE", SENT TO JACQUES CORY ON 10/06

I have read with pleasure your play "Nelly's Choice", and I found it very interesting. The protagonists, the relationships and the subjects that arise in your play are of extremely importance for the understanding of the values prevailing in the business world in the first decade of the 21st century. The moral nihilism of the characters explains, on the one hand, the human nature of the savage capitalism's heroes of modern time, and on the other hand, precisely this nihilism turns the heroes of the play into captivating and dramatically effective protagonists. On top of that, I was surprised and glad to discover that we have indeed a common interest in ethics or in the lack of ethics that characterizes the wild beasts of the brave new-old world in which we live today.

There is a renaissance spirit in your attitude and a blessed initiative to take out the theater from the bubble of entertainment into which it is inclined to deteriorate, and force it to renew its vital links with the most significant reality of our time, which is the reality of the business world, the capital market and the stock exchange manipulations. I loved in your play the tremendous sexual appetite of Elie which stems from the same libidinal energy that motivates also his predatory and ruthless nature in the business world. Finally, in the same way that he actually rapes Nelly in machismo savagery, and doesn't make exactly love with her, he f... in the same way everybody who has confidence in him in the business world. Elie is a creature who can only grab more and more without giving anything in return, except void promises, which he himself doesn't intend and cannot fulfill. And yet in human relationships between mature people there are always transactions which are based on give and take, if those are honest transactions that are made in good faith and integrity.

An honest transaction in relationships is a transaction in which every partner declares sincerely what he wants to get and informs honestly what he can give in return, and from now on the other party has to decide if there is or there is not a transaction. A dishonest transaction is of course a transaction in which the rogue declares that he wants one thing while he really covets something else (declares for example that he is looking for love while he actually wants casual sex and nothing more), and in parallel he declares what he is willing and able to give in return, while he cannot give anything of what he has promised, and naturally he doesn't intend to give anything. Those insights are ancient as humanity itself in the domain of feelings, but nowadays they have received increased validity and weight in the domain from which originates all the simile of give and take, which is – the business world. The drama deals from the earliest times in breaking promises or in giving promises that it will be impossible to fulfill or that there was no intention initially to fulfill from the moment they were given.

12.6 EXTRACTS - BEWARE OF GREEKS' PRESENTS BY JACQUES CORY

1. EXTRACT FROM CHAPTER 3 (ULLY AND SIMA)

Sima and Ully met at a small Italian restaurant in Tel Aviv. In the background arias of famous operas played softly while waiters served the daily special.

Sima looked stunning in a low-cut black dress and many men at the restaurant stared at her.

But Ully didn't notice her looks; he was stunned only by her revelations.

"Eli and Arie suspected me and tried to conceal from me their moves as long as they could," Sima said in hushed tones. "But now they don't have a choice, as it was necessary to make the closing with the lawyers. Eli tried to check if I would agree to cooperate against you, Ully, and I told him that I would think about it. He made me swear that I wouldn't tell you anything, and babbled that I have signed confidentiality agreements and that it would be against my professional ethics. Look who's talking about ethics! They rob during the daylight and have the audacity to teach me morals. If they will find out that I've met you, I will tell them that I tried to renew our romance."

Ully was reeling from Sima's disclosure and even more from the fact that he himself didn't suspect anything. He had noticed that Hadas wasn't answering his phone calls but thought that he was mad at him because he failed to prevent the collapse of the shares' prices and the depletion of the cash reserves of the company. He couldn't believe that Hadas has made an alliance with the devil. Hadas, the honest professor who paid from his personal money when he invited business colleagues to dinner, who traveled economy class, whose only interests were in science and who entrusted Ully to deal with all financial aspects.

Ully looked at Sima and asked:

"But why do you want to help me? You are really endangering your position, your future. Because of such a thing they can disbar you!"

"Ully, I love you and am ready to make any sacrifice for you. I haven't ceased for a moment loving you. When I sleep with my husband I think about you and only you. I've got you under my skin. At Nelly's party, I was stunned by how much you obviously love one another, and I decided to try to forget you, to keep away. But when I heard what the bastards at Larisa were planning to do to you, I got so angry, as if I was being burned alive. I am crazy about you. I can't resist it. I don't have any illusions that because of me you'll leave Nelly. I don't even ask you to stop loving her or even to start loving me. Only... be with me, a little. We fit so well together from all angles - intellectually and sexually... I don't share anything with my husband. I married him because I was broken, and I wanted a child. But he is nothing to me. I didn't even change my family name after the wedding. Not that I could fool anybody if all of a sudden I would be called 'Mrs. Weiss'. I need a man like you, not a blond spineless juvenile like him. You and me, we are from the same origin, we share the same energy, roots, background, temperament, the same endless ambition. You were and still are my whole world! Is it my fault that when you married Nelly I was only ten years old? Perhaps some oracle told you that you were going to fall in love with a Simone, and when you found Nelly Simon, you were sure that she was your destiny, but you didn't know that in a remote slum a small Simone was growing up who would eventually become Sima. Who knows to which of us the prophecy was addressed? What does Nelly have that I don't? I am younger, prettier, smarter..."

Ully was preoccupied.

The last thing he needed at the moment was the burden of an affair with a lover.

He looked at Sima and told her that it was impossible. He could barely live with himself after the enchanting fortnight in Paris five years ago. It was not by accident that he cut off the liaison with her immediately upon returning to Israel, and resigned subsequently from Larisa.

"I really like you, Simale! You are a fantastic woman, and you deserve to be happy. If you're not happy with your husband, divorce him, find yourself somebody else who would suit you. It is unbelievable that in the whole world there is only me!"

Sima persisted. "You really don't understand. Imagine that you would be asked to stop loving Nelly and find another woman. Could you do it? I am willing to do anything for you; steal documents from the company, bring you all the incriminating evidence. Endanger not only my license, but also my life. You remember the eccentric inventor of Larisa who had a quarrel with the company and was found dead in his garden from a snake's bite? The newspapers made some noise for a day or two and after that the affair was forgotten. Those bastards are really dangerous; for greed they are willing to resort to anything. But they are afraid only of you. You belong to a species that is becoming extinct. The knight of the Round Table who fights with his white horse against the rascals of the Star Wars! Did you even see their new building? Everything is made of dark glass and black marble, like in a science fiction movie. You left when they were busy with sex orgies conducted by 'Dionysus' Fuchs. They are corrupted and corruptors and nobody can stop them. Arie and Eli, a fine pair, they really suit each other. One acts as the good guy and the other as the bad guy. But I still prefer Eli; with him you know at least where you stand. Arie is the most dangerous, because behind the grandmotherly facade lurks the body of a dangerous wolf. Did you ever notice what wicked eyes he has? No wonder he hides behind dark glasses."

Uly looked at her for a long moment. Perhaps under other circumstances, in another life, she could have been the ideal woman for him, as they shared the same ardor. But only with Nelly he could find peace and serenity.

He came back to himself and told Sima: "How can an outstanding woman like you - conscientious, brilliant, wise - can stay for so many years in all this filth? At the end they will infect you with their wickedness. You know that they never sign anything and always let subordinates like you sign. Before you know what happens, you'll become a rhinoceros and be like them - a bloodsucking vampire."

"I stay with them because I am weak," stammered Sima, "I don't have your power. I also don't possess the support that you have from your wife and kids. I have a husband who is five years younger than me, a bum, a parasite, who is always fired from his jobs, making me the breadwinner... And yes, for the sake of my small child, I am ready to become even a vampire."

2. EXTRACT FROM CHAPTER 7 (ULLY AND NELLY)

When he returned home, Uly did not enter his bedroom.

It was 2 a.m. and he didn't want to wake up Nelly.

He took a shower and sat in his living room to relax.

Uly popped a CD in the stereo with the song 'Nobody knows the trouble I've seen'.

He felt the music and the profound, husky voice of Louis Armstrong seep into his body, and felt a tremendous identification with the words of the song.

He couldn't descend to a deeper low, he thought, as he wept silently and slowly fell asleep.

Suddenly, he felt a warm embrace.

Nelly leaned over him and stroked his hair:

"Dorile darling, why are you sitting all by yourself in the dark? Come to me and I'll indulge you."

Ully slowly stopped weeping, and she whispered to him:

"There, this is how I love you. Now you are once again the Ully who I know, my mythological hero, who after his long Odyssey has come home to his beloved wife."

But Ully could not be consoled. "I am like another Ully, Julius Caesar, who everybody stabbed in the back. This is probably how Job felt, when he was told of all the catastrophes that happened to him."

Nelly burst out in exasperation:

"Shame on you! How can you compare yourself to Job? Job lost his wife, his children, all his possessions. What have you lost? Only some money and some friends who revealed their true character in time of need. Don't be so dramatic; you have me, the children. Thank God that we're all healthy, we have a home, a livelihood, some savings. This is not the end of the world. There are people who lose all their family in a car accident or in a terrorist attack. There are bereaved families, widows, widowers. Put things in the right perspective!"

"I know, but I can't," said Ully. "It is stronger than me. I believed in friends, in justice, that we live in a law-abiding country, where everybody pays for their crimes. I believed that my friends would stand by me in times of need, exactly like we stood by them. I believed that my clients appreciate what I do and that my colleagues are men and women of conscience. I even believed that Eli and your uncle Arie, although I knew that they are despicable, wouldn't behave so low."

Nelly was so beautiful in the soft lighting of the living room. She continued to caress his head and tried to calm him.

"I also suffered a lot from the betrayal of our friends. People who you helped so much are not even willing to listen to you. Every such blow is like a stab in the heart. But it should only toughen us, make us become more united and loyal, because nobody can take from us our warm family nucleus. Everything else is only money and is worth less than nothing."

Ully loved her more than ever. He felt the need to share with her what he was experiencing:

"The problem is that when it rains it pours. First of all money; you know that we were left with almost no savings. Also, the betrayal, but most of all - work. I am completely dried out. I feel like a fish whose pond has become a small puddle, and he has to remain with the small fry. While the water continues to drain from the pond, it becomes harder and harder for him to breathe. It is like if an architect who built the ultramodern La Defense area in Paris has to build now low-income dwellings in the suburbs. I have the power to lift the world and all I am doing is make-work. And what eats me is that I myself have brought upon us all this trouble. I decided to invest all our money in Molecula against your advice. I myself invited Arie and Hadas to your surprise party. But my worst frustration is that it was me who started this crusade against those bastards and I can't even scratch them. It is as if a magic force attracts me to the abyss and I can't resist, as if I went blind and I have an eclipse and I can't get out of it. Maybe the gang really participates in black magic rituals, as you used to joke, stabbing a doll with pins while whispering in eery voices: Ully, Ully..."

"I don't mind the fact that you talk nonsense. But I'm afraid it will affect your health! We can overcome everything, but if all of a sudden you'll have a stroke or something, I will never forgive myself that I let you start this campaign. I am ready to assist you in anything, but if I'll notice that you're starting to hallucinate, fall into a depression or anything that will affect your health, I'll oppose your struggle like a tigress and not let you proceed with it, because you are more important to me than anything else in life, and I will never agree to let you take it so hard!"

3. EXTRACT FROM CHAPTER 8 (ULLY, ARIEH AND ELI)

A few days later, Ully was surprised to receive an invitation for lunch at Eli Fuch's office.

In spite of Nelly's urging him not to go, Ully decided to accept the invitation. If they invited him, he must have hit a sensitive nerve, causing them to be afraid.

In Eli's spacious office, Arieih, Eli and Ully sat at the table, while Joya, Eli's secretary, served them lunch, course after course.

"Ully, I notice that you are not eating," said Eli in an exulting voice. "What happened? Are you afraid that we'll poison you?"

Ully answered with humor:

"I like you too much and wouldn't want you to get in trouble if I'll also die here, like your VP of Sales. I heard that there is a lethal virus of a new species that attacks only those who endanger you. It will be too embarrassing if there would be enquiry commissions on Nelly's dear uncle. I am much too concerned with the good reputation of the family."

"It is swell that Arieih is not afraid to eat from the kitchen of my factory; he at least trusts us."

After a few more awkward pleasantries, Arieih and Eli explained to him that they heard of the enquiry that the mutual fund is conducting and that they know that Ully is behind it.

Ully did not deny it.

"You'll have to choose between a class action of 100 million dollars of all the shareholders of Molecula and a fair compensation to the mutual fund and myself. Make a cold economic analysis - you are after all intelligent businessmen - and let me know your decision. I told you that I will not abide by the merger and will not agree to the schemes that you throw around everybody. And don't try to liquidate me or something, as you did to the inventor who wanted to cross the lines to the competition and has stolen the secret formula of the drug that you developed."

"What are you talking about?" said Arieih, turning to Eli: "Do you know of what is he referring?"

But Ully didn't wait for Eli to respond. He continued ironically:

"This guy couldn't die of a lethal virus, as you have already used this excuse, so he died of a snake's bite in his garden. What I don't understand is how the snake had hands to take back the secret formula that was not found to this day. But I've got news for you; I've taken into consideration this eventuality as well, and I had long talks with Nelly over it. And you know what she said? That she prefers the risk that something will happen to me instead of me staying at home like a scared rat. But if I'll die, I'll drag you into Hades. I have a poison pill, and it doesn't matter how I got hold of it. The problem is that I cannot use it while I am alive. But from the moment I'll die, or vanish, or even fall into a coma, it will be published and destroy you. Even if you'll not be responsible for my death and I'll die by accident, everything will blow up in your face. So start praying that nothing will happen to me. Besides, Arie, I know that you wouldn't want your Nellyka to become a widow. You love her so much, as we noticed the night of her surprise party, when you promised that if she needed you, you'd always be at her side.

Arie burst out in anger:

"How dare you speak like this, you ungrateful bastard! After all I've done in your favor, you forget that I'm the godfather of your son!"

But Uly would not back down. "Perhaps you'll stop once and for all making those silly statements that you've built me. You know that it is exactly the opposite, I built you and because of me you are today a multimillionaire and you've left me with the crumbs. You've adopted the slogan of Goebbels - lie once and again, until everybody will believe you. You are now 'High Society', looking at me from your altitude, Mr. Arie in Hebrew or Mr. Leon as you are called in the family in our Judeo-Spanish dialect. Or should I call you Don Leon, or even Cor-Leone? This is why you wanted so much to be the godfather of our son; you are anyhow the Godfather of all of us. Everybody is afraid of you, and fears that you'll put a dead cat in front of their door and make them an offer they can't refuse. A Mafia Godfather, speaking in an Anglo-Saxon accent that you have adopted. My mate, for us you're still Leonico Shimon and not Leo Simon, and you know exactly where you can smell us... You are pretending to be an honorable lord, but your acquaintances know that you are honorable exactly like Mack the Knife, who has no stains on his white gloves from all the many crimes that he has committed! I prefer to deal with Eli the shark who everybody sees his jaws full of blood. But with you, Macky, 'Das Messer sieht man nicht' - nobody sees the knife that you are hiding. You are the most dangerous kind, the honorable "knives"..."

Boiling with fury, Arie put down his fork, and addressed Uly:

"You've become all of a sudden German, quoting Brecht's German Operas! You dare mock me because I have changed my name to Arie, you Mr. Buskela, who wanted to hide the Egyptian-Moroccan-Black origins of your father! 'Doron', you have suddenly become. Just when you turned 18, out goes Buskela, and you enlisted in the army as Doron. Your father has not forgiven you until this day your betrayal! But whom did you not betray - your origins, your father, your uncle, your company and clients... I wouldn't be surprised if you are also betraying Nelly!"

12.7 RIGOLETTO, VERDI'S OPERA WITH PIAVE'S LIBRETTO BASED ON VICTOR HUGO'S PLAY LE ROI S'AMUSE

One of the most difficult problems in the struggle against unethical persons is the problem of the victim's syndrome. The victim identifies many times with his oppressor, for various reasons: admiration, love, fear, masochism. The opera Rigoletto by Piave and Verdi, based on the famous play by Victor Hugo "Le roi s'amuse", gives an excellent example of the victim's syndrome. The Duke of Mantua is an unscrupulous tyrant with an absolute power over his citizens. He is a womanizer and sends his noblemen to prison if they dare complain. But he perceives himself as the victim of women who are fickle (la donna e mobile). This is a typical attitude of wrongdoers who attribute their defaults to the wronged people, thus the minority shareholders are called despicable speculators while it is the controlling shareholders who speculate, and here - the rapist of women complain that he is the victim of women.

Monterone, a respectable nobleman, complains to the Duke that he abducted his daughter. He threatens to become a whistleblower (my voice will be heard everywhere). Rigoletto, the court jester ridicules Monterone and asks him how dare he accuse the Duke of such crimes. But Monterone pursues his accusations. He tells the Duke that he'll interrupt his orgies. He wants to punish the Duke for his crimes and even if he'll be sentenced to death he'll return as a ghost to avenge the honor of his daughter. When the Duke tells his servants to take Monterone to prison he curses the Duke, as he has sent a dog to tear the body of a dying lion, and Rigoletto, as he is a mocking snake who ridicules the pain of a father. All the court mocks Monterone, but Rigoletto this time is silent. After Monterone is taken to his death he pardons the Duke, saying that as he couldn't hurt him he wishes him to be happy. This is a typical victim's syndrome. Some of the victims commit suicide when they cannot succeed to punish their wrongdoers, some of them get sick or die of sorrow, but others identify with their oppressors and become worse than them.

Rigoletto, apparently has not such a syndrome. He has a daughter Gilda who is abducted by the Duke (because of Monterone's curse, he believes). He decides to murder the Duke and pays a killer Sparafucile to do the job. But Gilda who is in love of the Duke, although she knows that he abducted her on false pretense and is courting Sparafucile's sister, disobeys her father and sacrifices herself to Sparafucile's knife in order to save the Duke. Verdi and Hugo, who were both freedom fighters, couldn't imagine that a Duke might be killed by a common and they are saved by the same commons that they offended. Rigoletto who dares planning the murder of the Duke loses his daughter and Monterone who dared be a whistleblower loses his life. This is one of the best examples of the victim's syndrome which is very common in the business world. Very few people who dare to oppose unethical tycoons succeed and almost all of them don't remain in the business world as they are perceived as whistleblowers. In some cases they are even killed like Silkwood. Unethical Tycoons (the modern robber barons and Dukes) are therefore immune from reprisal in most of the cases, only their lieutenants, the CFOs or the Majors are punished if at all, but the CEOs, Tycoons or Generals remain untouched. Those who dared confront them are severely punished as happened to Monterone or Rigoletto.

We can kill for $11, for 30 denarius or for $10,000. According to that logic, the hired killer has the highest respect for human life, as he asks for the higher price. Even Sparafucile in Rigoletto is ready to spare the life of the Duke, as Madalena his sister thinks that he is handsome. The hired killer is impressed by the personification of the Duke and is ready to kill in his place an unknown man. Sparafucile, like some of the companies' executives, is willing to commit a crime if it is toward an unpersonified victim. The personification of the shareholders and stakeholders becomes therefore a major cause to safeguard their interests, as it is much more difficult to wrong them if we know them and appreciate or like them. But, in many cases in modern business the victim is ultimately the abused party who tries to fight the mighty ones. This reminds us of Rigoletto, who has ordered Sparafucile to murder the Duke in order to avenge the abuse of his daughter. The one who dies ultimately is his daughter Gilda, who sacrifices herself in order to save the Duke whom she loved. She presents herself as an unknown person to Sparafucile, who kills her instantly.

“Rigoletto: Dio tremendo! Ella stessa fu colta dallo stral di mia giusta vendetta!
(A Gilda) Angiol caro, mi guarda, m’ascolta, parla, parlami, figlia diletta!
Gilda: Ah, ch’io taccia!
A me, a lui perdonate!
Benedite alla figlia, o mio padre!
Lassu in cielo, vicina alla madre,
in eterno per voi preghero.
Rigoletto: Non morir, mio tesoro, pietade.
Mia colomba, lasciami non dei,
no, lasciami non dei.”
(Piave, Rigoletto, end of the opera)

"Rigoletto (to himself): Oh, horror, she herself has been struck by my vengeance.
(to Gilda) Dear angel, look, listen to me, speak to me beloved.
Gilda: Ah, that I must be silent forever!
Forgive me, forgive him!
Bless your daughter, O father.
In heaven, beside my mother,
I soon shall be,
And there we'll pray for you.
Rigoletto: Do not die, my treasure.
My dove,
Don't leave me."

Rigoletto is an opera in three acts by Giuseppe Verdi. The Italian libretto was written by Francesco Maria Piave based on the play Le roi s'amuse by Victor Hugo. Despite serious initial problems with the Austrian censors who had control over northern Italian theatres at the time, the opera had a triumphant premiere at La Fenice in Venice on 11 March 1851. It is considered by many to be the first of the operatic masterpieces of Verdi's middle-to-late career. Its tragic story revolves around the licentious Duke of Mantua, his hunch-backed court jester Rigoletto and Rigoletto's beautiful daughter Gilda. The opera's original title, La maledizione (The Curse), refers to the curse placed on both the Duke and Rigoletto by a courtier whose daughter had been seduced by the Duke with Rigoletto's encouragement. The curse comes to fruition when Gilda likewise falls in love with the Duke and eventually sacrifices her life to save him from the assassins hired by her father. In modern times, it has become a staple of the standard operatic repertoire. It appears as number 9 (with 395 performances) on the Operabase list of the most-performed operas worldwide between 2008/2009 and 2012/13 seasons, and was also the 9th most frequently performed opera in Italy during that period.

12.8 ARTHUR MILLER – THE CRUCIBLE – JOHN PROCTOR

The final form of the narcissism of Freud is in the positive attitude toward oneself, the respect of oneself, self-esteem, Selbstgefühl. It is this attitude that motivated Joan of Arc to mount the scaffold and motivated John Proctor in ‘The Crucible’ to die in order not to give up his self-esteem. According to Proctor, his name, his reputation is worth more than his life.

“PROCTOR, with a cry of his whole soul: Because it is my name! Because I cannot have another in my life! Because I lie and sign myself to lies! Because I am not worth the dust on the feet of them that hang! How may I live without my name? I have given you my soul; leave me my name!

DANFORTH, pointing at the confession in Proctor’s hand: Is that document a lie? If it is a lie I will not accept it! What say you? I will not deal in lies, Mister! Proctor is motionless. You will give me your honest confession in my hand, or I cannot keep you from the rope. Proctor does not reply. Which way do you go, Mister?

His breast heaving, his eyes staring, Proctor tears the paper and crumples it, and he is weeping in fury, but erect.

DANFORTH: Marshall!

PARRIS, hysterically, as though the tearing paper were his life: Proctor, Proctor!

HALE: Man, you will hang! You cannot!

PROCTOR, his eyes full of tears: I can. And there’s your first marvel, that I can. You have made your magic now, for now I do think I see some shred of goodness in John Proctor. Not enough to weave a banner with, but white enough to keep it from such dogs. Elizabeth, in a burst of terror, rushes to him and weeps against his hand. Give them no tear! Tears pleasure them! Show honor now, show a stony heart and sink them with it! He has lifted her, and kisses her now with great passion.

REBECCA: Let you fear nothing! Another judgment waits us all!”

(Miller, The Crucible, p. 251)

One has to have the character of John Proctor in order not to be intimidated by inquiring committees of McCarthy, the NKVD, or the Inquisition. Those examples are very pertinent in the business world of today, where ethical managers suffer sometimes martyrdom from their companies and colleagues in cases where they have to act according to their conscience and against the immediate interests of the company. They are almost always motivated by a sense of self-esteem, which is much stronger than the pursuit of pleasures and happiness, at the risk even of their lives. If the happiness (eudaimonia) or the pleasure (Lust) that they obtain comes to the detriment of their well-being it is because the value that they attach to their principles is predominant. It is the executives of this caliber who should manage the companies of the 21st century, and not the unscrupulous or the spineless executives who often manage the business world of today.

12.9 ARTHUR MILLER - DEATH OF A SALESMAN

Willy Loman, an aging traveling salesman can no longer make the long trips to his customers. His boss fires him brutally and Willy loses his self respect and mental sanity wondering what went wrong. Willy is perceived as an insignificant player in the "new economy" of those days, which appreciated only youth and not experience. He remembers the heroic times of his youth and his outstanding achievements but he is the only one who remembers it and nobody else cares. We are not even sure that what he remembers is correct as he imagines things and has flashbacks that are not realistic. Yet, Willy has the full support of his wife Linda who loves him, respects him and protects him from his suicidal attempts. Willy can continue living only with his hallucinations as the reality is too cruel to be lived. Or is it? After all, many people have a much worse fate than Willy, but he is too proud to admit that he is a loser. His son Biff is unwilling to forgive him that he smashed all his youth's ideals when he found his father with a lover in a hotel. Or is it an excuse for his failures? Everybody in this play blames somebody else for his fate instead of taking responsibility of their destiny. Howard, the son of the former boss of Willy, is not willing to carry on a "dead wood" as Willy, he has no empathy for his past performance, he wants to maximize his profits and for him Willy is a burden. He fires him and Willy who has no more a reason for living commits suicide.

Miller took a simple American family struggling to make life work, and made each character extraordinary. A masterpiece on labor relations. Although the play takes place in the late forties it is still actual, as today more than ever before elder people are being fired only because they are no more young. Only that today an "old" man or woman who has to retire is aged 50 or even 45, while he behaves in a much younger way than in the forties, he is healthier, has a life expectancy of twice his age, so what should he do after being fired? Should he commit suicide like Willy or start a new career? The worst discrimination in modern business is not racial, sexual or religious, it is discrimination of age. If we bear in mind that people start working at 30, after getting an MBA or equivalent, spending a few years in India, and a military service, the work expectancy is today 15 or maximum 20 years. Furthermore, there is no more life employment in one company, not even in Japan, so a normal executive perceives his job as temporary for a few years, with 3-5 similar jobs, and that's it. Before that - he studies or travels or serve his country or community, after that - he retires and most of the times he is compelled to do so.

The conclusion is that a young manager has to earn in Wall Street, Monsanto or Nike very high salaries in order to repay the loans he made to finance his expensive studies, and to save the money he needs for his early retirement. Can he get such high salaries? The most brilliant ones can, but what about all the others? Does it compel them to be unethical and to obey without hesitation to any unethical order of his bosses, brutal or not? Does he have at all an alternative, unless he wants to go on welfare? The most tragic part of the story is that nowadays managers aged 50 are in their prime. They are experienced, not reckless, they can work long hours because their children have left home, they have a lot of ambition and stamina, they have at least a work expectancy of 25 years, much more than their present experience. Those who want to retire could do so, but probably they are a small minority. Furthermore, if people will retire only at 70 or 75 it will solve all the actuarial problems of the pension funds. Brutal bosses are the worst curse of modern business. Because of the high standard of living needed, the high payments for mortgage, expensive cars and vacations, the fear that managers will be fired being "obsolete", those bosses can behave in a dictatorial way, offend their subordinates, take advantage of them in many ways, and nobody would dare to react, fearing to be fired and to receive an image of a troublemaker or even worse - a whistleblower.

12.10 GLENN GARRY GLEN ROSS BY DAVID MAMET

The survival of the fittest, those who cannot be the best should perish as there is no place in the modern world for weaker persons and employees. Times are tough in a real estate sales office; the salesmen are given a strong incentive to succeed in a sales contest. There is no room for losers in this dramatically masculine world; only "closers" will get the good sales leads. Can a society, a company or a country exist with no place for the weakest? The main dilemma of the film and the play is - can businessmen who are not the best survive in the modern business world? Managers who are older than 45; salesmen who sell less than they used to; people who have family problems - they are sick, their wives or husbands left them, they lost a child; businessmen who don't belong to the elites - Afro-Americans, Muslims, Indians; women in a machoistic environment; people with physical disabilities and so on. As a matter of fact, the survival of the fittest was always the slogan of the darkest fascistic regimes, which killed millions of Jews, crippled, sick, Gypsies or homosexuals. Every one is often in his work career not at his best: so, should he be fired on the spot, are we human beings or cows who are slaughtered when their milk production deteriorates? On the other hand, there are many who argue that a business is not a welfare agency and a company cannot afford to support people who are not at their best.

The purpose of a corporation according to Milton Friedman and most of businessmen is to maximize profits and it is impossible to keep people like Shelley Levene or his colleagues in the organization. So, they should be fired even if they worked very hard and still are, but their results are not as good as before, because of age, family problems or sickness. Those who favor these beliefs should bear in mind that in due time they will also have problems and not be at their best, so it will repercuss on them as well. "Don't do to others what you wouldn't want others to do to you" is not a utopist maxim, it is the bread and butter of civilization and ethics, as we are not animals who slaughter the weakest (even they don't do it most of the time) but human beings who, after millenniums of evolution, are giving a chance to women, people from different religions or races, people with disabilities, businessmen not coming from the elites, and older people. In a primitive society only the strongest monkey would survive but in a democratic society people can excel in many ways even if they are not the fittest. They could get lower salaries if their contribution is lower but they should not be fired in such a brutal way as in this film nor be scared of being fired and forcing the salesmen to commit crimes that otherwise they wouldn't even think of committing.

The salesmen complain that they don't receive good leads. Dave Moss (Ed Harris) says that it is impossible to treat people in such a way, but he is told that Roma will receive the leads of Glengarry Glen Ross as he is a closer. In the harsh world of real estate and in business in general you should be ready to do anything in order to survive. The pressure put on the salesmen oblige them to cheat the potential clients, to lie, to tell them half truths, as no one wants to be fired. Competition is very hard and if you don't cheat somebody else will and you will lose everything. The business world is not for weak people, if you don't devour the others they'll eat you. The two worst losers are Aaronov (Alan Arkin) and Levene, they are not tough enough, but they are driven to extreme actions. Aaronov agrees to steal the leads in order to give them to Moss, but ultimately it is Levene who steals them. Levene tries to bribe Williamson but he refuses as he doesn't want to be mixed up with such a loser, finally he agrees but Levene cannot pay him the advance payment. Moss says that they should stop thinking as slaves, they are men, they should be independent and not salaried. Roma doesn't want to abide to the middle class moral norms, it is OK to steal, as bad men don't go to hell anyhow. The pressure on Levene increases as he has to pay for his sick daughter, the stolen leads could give him thousands of dollars that he could receive for them. In this play and film everyone cheats everyone else. It is OK to threaten, there are no friendships, no values, no feelings, except the family sentiments of Levene. The unfair treatment is towards the subordinates, the bosses, the colleagues, the clients, the stakeholders. After Levene is caught for stealing the leads he says that it is a world of bureaucrats, not of human beings, we live in a world that is disappearing and that's why we should stick together. This is the message to the meeks, it is the only way to oppose the strong people, the wrongdoers, the unethical businessmen who oppress the stakeholders, and if the meek will unite they could win their battle and achieve a juster distribution of resources.

12.11 RHINOCEROS BY EUGENE IONESCO

The play shows the futile discussions between Jean, Beranger, the logician and others if there were rhinoceroses or no and if they have one horn or two. This futility reminds the authorities dealing with minor ecological and ethical issues instead of tackling the main problems. At first the people do not want to interfere and intend only to complain to the authorities on the rhinoceroses. Jean thinks that he is powerful because he has moral power, he does not drink alcohol like Beranger, he is conservative and a good citizen. But he is one of the first to become a rhinoceros while Beranger the libertine remains the last man and refuses to adapt. Are the rhinoceroses dangerous or not? They run to all directions but Ionesco tells us that they only trampled a cat. The reason is probably that everyone becomes a rhinoceros and there is no need to trample their own kind, but they will probably trample Beranger as he is not a conformist and chooses to remain a human being. Botar is suspicious of everyone, he says that journalists are liars, that his colleagues have not seen clearly the rhinoceroses. He believes only what he sees and he believes in conspiracy. Mrs. Shore is ready to become a rhinoceros only in order to remain with her husband who has become one. Love as an additional cause of becoming a rhinoceros.

The transformation to rhinoceroses expands in a geometric progression. And what about the progression of corruption and bribery? Jean becomes a rhinoceros in front of the bewildered Beranger, but when the later wants to call a doctor, Jean loses his temper. This is similar to businessmen who do not like to hear anything about ethics and lose their temper when somebody talks about it or gives a lecture. Jean believes that he will not become a rhinoceros, as nobody in his family suffered from this "disease", but unfortunately this is not a genetic disease. The rhinoceroses are strong, ugly, breath heavily and snore, they have a coarse skin and a green color. In comparison, human beings are weak, breath regularly, but are they beautiful? Jean, who has become a rhinoceros, does not believe anymore in friendship and ceases to be the best friend of Beranger. Jean does not hate people, he is indifferent to them, they make him sick but if they will stand in his way he will trample them. We can find analogies to the different opinions on business ethics and the mission of companies as perceived by Milton Friedman and the ethicists. If Jean has an aim he tramples towards it. He is a street fighter and nothing can obstruct his way in order to obtain his goal. Jean has now a coarse skin that is not affected by changing weather. What about unethical businessmen who have also coarse skins and are not affected by ethical considerations?

Jean believes that people enjoy becoming rhinoceroses and this is the normal procedure. He is convinced that those animals are like us and they also have a right to live. Beranger thinks on the contrary that there is a gap in mentality, we have morals and they don't, but Jean despises morals, he is sick of morals and thinks that we should go beyond it. Jean proposes instead of morals returning to nature, to the laws of the jungle, the survival of the fittest, as morals contradicts nature and rhinoceroses can live only in the jungle. This is a very similar attitude to the business theories stating that business is like a jungle without any morals, where only the fittest survive, but this is not an evolution from the ape to the man but a reverse evolution from the man to the ape or the rhinoceros. Beranger states that we have a philosophy that the rhinoceroses don't have, value systems, thousands of years of civilization and culture. But Jean answers that they will destroy everything and this would be better for all of us. He does not want to hear even the words humanity, spirit, man, as those are clichés of a sentimental person, old and ridiculous. This is a way of thinking of many unethical businessmen who despise ethics and helping the weak. Jean is willing to become a rhinoceros as he doesn't have prejudices. He says that we should experience everything without prejudices. What about drugs? It is good to experience new things but in which direction? All this shakes the self-confidence of Beranger who sees that all his friends become rhinoceroses. He does not understand why and he is afraid that it is a contagious disease.

Dodar, Beranger's friend, is also in the process of becoming a rhinoceros. But he doesn't pay any particular attention to this process, as he sees it very natural. Everyone that doesn't see in the bestialization, the decline in moral standards, a dangerous development is likely to become a rhinoceros himself very soon. Only a strong opposition can save us from this fate. Dodar suggests to Beranger to overlook the rhinoceroses, to humiliate in front of them, as they do not want to harm anybody. This happens with every totalitarian regime or corrupted economy in the beginning of their "reign" but later on they attack everybody standing on their way and all those who refuse to become rhinoceroses, communists, collaborators or corrupted. Beranger decides to fight only with ethical means, as it is forbidden to lose your temper, not knowing where anger could lead you to. Beranger is militant and activist, is solidarian to every event, as he cannot remain indifferent. Dodar brings the standard arguments: don't judge others if you do not want to be judged, do not take to heart what happens around you, do not interfere even when the situation deteriorates, remain aside of the events if you don't want to get hurt. But Jean has to interfere as this deterioration doesn't happen in another country but in his country. He cannot adapt to the situation as Dodar, he maybe stubborn like Don Quixote, but he cannot get asleep, he has nightmares. Dodar admonishes Beranger that he likes being tortured, that he is a masochist. If this situation happens, that's the way it should be and we cannot change it.

Beranger does not know what to do, he will write to the newspapers, write pamphlets, go to the mayor, in contrast to the advice of Dodar who tells him to let the authorities handle the situation. Should we let also the SEC, the legal system, the boards of directors, the analysts, the audit firms and others to handle a situation like in Enron even if they are incompetent? Dodar accuses Beranger that he sees flaws in everything and this is a characteristic of an inquisitor. Is it true? Dodar does not perceive the boundaries between right and wrong, normal and not normal, but what is normal or right anyway? Beranger thinks that tolerance is a sign of weakness, and if everyone would be conformists as Dodar is, where would we be? Dodar now thinks that becoming rhinoceros is a sign of progress. One should be modern and adapt to the new era. In Rome do as the Romans do. If you can't beat them join them. Is it true? Beranger believes that Dodar will become a decent rhinoceros just as he was a decent man. Is it possible? Beranger still believing that rhinoceroses are in minority thinks that something should be done. Maybe put them in huge internment camps and keep them in quarantine. Is it justified? Will it bring to McCarthyism, inquisition, gulags? But on the other hand tolerance would destroy morals, democracy, humanity. Weak regimes have enabled Bolshevism, Humeinism, Nazism to prevail and tolerance to corruption could destroy the economy. What is the solution?

Dodar becomes a rhinoceros out of conformism, vocation and mission, as he believes that he should follow his superiors, give an example for better and for worse. You should stick to the majority, you could always criticize from within instead of doing so from without. Is it better to stay in a corrupted society, in a fascistic regime, or should you leave those societies? All the rhinoceroses are alike, they lose their identity, like yes-men in a totalitarian company trying to please their bosses. What if you have original ideas, how do they affect society? Daisy believes in happiness, regardless of what happens. She wants to understand the rhinoceroses and their languages, she believes that everything is relative, nothing is absolute. She thinks that the snoring of rhinoceros sounds like poetry, they are beautiful, they are gods. Beranger decides that he will not succumb. He will retain his humanity, he will not follow the majority because he believes that they are wrong and he is right. He believes in human values, he is lonely, but optimistic that ultimately his ideals will prevail.

I've taught with my classes dozens of times the play Rhinoceros, written in French by the Romanian Eugene Ionesco in 1959, seeing the film Rhinoceros, 1974, 104 minutes, Director Tom O'Horgan, with Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder. This is one of the best plays ever written and one of the best films ever filmed. When I wrote the curriculum of my first course on Business Ethics in 2004 (that became my most popular course, that my students rated as 5 out of 5, the best grade ever received for a course at the University of Haifa in Israel) it was obvious that it will comprise my cases and some of the films and plays that dealt obviously on business ethics as Wall Street, Erin Brockovitch, It's a Wonderful Life, All My Sons, An Enemy of the People, The Visit of the Old Lady. But all of a sudden I had an illumination, I remembered that Ionesco in his play Rhinoceros dealt also on ethical issues, on humanism, bestiality, conformism.

I read once again the play, watched the unforgettable movie, and introduced it with a lot of apprehension, as I was not sure that my students, who read and watched for the first time in my courses plays, would understand the meaning of this theater of the absurd. The play is often read as a response and criticism to the sudden upsurge of Communism, Fascism, and Nazism during the events preceding World War II, and explores the themes of conformity, culture, mass movements, mob mentality, philosophy and morality. But the play deals also on topics that were not existing on Ionesco's time, but as it always occur with immortal plays Ionesco has foreseen the events marvelously. The neoliberal precepts of the worst economic leaders – Milton Freedman, Margaret Thatcher, Ronald Reagan, Benjamin Nethanyahu, made most of the business world rhinoceroses, ostracised all the economists and businessmen who thought differently, in a pseudo democratic process that conquered all the bastions of free thought and humane capitalism in economy, politics, society, business, universities, companies... They obliged us to think that the best status of economics is the Neandertalic phase where the free market is allowed to reign with no regulation (as a reaction to the communist regimes who have failed and where everything was regulated but disregarding the winning model of Scandinavia..).

When I encountered wrongdoings to minority shareholders personally and in my research I felt that I am participating in a theater of the absurd and I wanted to share this feeling with my students. And indeed, the chemistry worked and quite all the students felt the magic of the play and understood the profound meaning of the play, the metaphors, as they had to present the ethical dilemmas of the main protagonists – Beranger, Jean, Daisy, Dodar...

Furthermore, 17 classes of the naval academy, young men and women aged 20, and about to become captains in the Navy understood the play perfectly and participated enthusiastically in the group dynamics. I told them that the unethical businessmen perceive me in my writings and lectures in the same manner that Jean perceives Beranger who wants to bring him a doctor who will cure him of wanting to become a rhinoceros. I watched the metamorphosis of my best friends and colleagues becoming rhinoceroses in front of me, one day they were ethical businessman and the other they became rhinoceros, in order to conform to the unethical behavior of the business environment. People want to conform, to become conformists, they are afraid to differ from their peers, to be perceived as an outsider, to be outsiders, only people with a very strong character who want to continue fighting even alone as Dr. Stockmann, Beranger, Erin Brockovitch or Silkwood, can remain human and keep their humanistic values in society, business and economy. I'll bring here 2 extracts of the play that moved most my students – the scene when Jean turns into a rhinoceros in front of Beranger, and the final scene when Beranger decides to continue fighting alone, when all his friends have turned into rhinoceroses.

IONESCO

JEAN: [in a very hoarse voice] Ah, ah, ah! Fat old Mrs. Boeuf. She's just a fool!

BERENGER: Well fool or no fool . . .

JEAN: [he enters swiftly, takes off his jacket, and throws it on the bed.

BERENGER discreetly averts his gaze. JEAN, whose back and chest are now green, goes back into the bathroom. As he walks in and out:

Boeuf never let his wife know what he was up to . . .

BERENGER: You're wrong there, Jean—it was a very united family.

JEAN: Very united, was it? Are you sure? Hum, hum, Brr . . .

BERENGER: [moving to the bathroom, where JEAN slams the door in his face] Very united. And the proof is that . . .

JEAN: [from within] Boeuf led his own private life. He had a secret side to him deep down which he kept to himself.

BERENGER: I shouldn't make you talk, it seems to upset you.

JEAN: On the contrary, it relaxes me.

BERENGER: Even so, let me call the doctor, I beg you.

JEAN: I absolutely forbid it. I can't stand obstinate people.

[JEAN comes back into the bedroom. BERENGER backs away a little scared, for JEAN is greener than ever and speaks only with difficulty. His voice is unrecognizable.]

Well, whether he changes into a rhinoceros on purpose or against his will, he's probably all the better for it.

BERENGER: How can you say a thing like that? Surely you don't think . . .

JEAN: You always see the black side of everything. It obviously gave him great pleasure to turn into a rhinoceros. There's nothing extraordinary in that.

BERENGER: There's nothing extraordinary in it, but I doubt if it gave him much pleasure.

JEAN: And why not, pray?

BERENGER: It's hard to say exactly why; it's just something you feel.

JEAN: I tell you it's not as bad as all that. After all, rhinoceroses are living creatures the same as us; they've got as much right to life as we have!

RHINOCEROS

BERENGER: As long as they don't destroy ours in the process.
You must admit the difference in mentality.

JEAN: [pacing up and down the room, and in and out of the bathroom] Are you under the impression that our way of life is superior?

BERENGER: Well at any rate, we have our own moral standards which I consider incompatible with the standards of these animals.

JEAN: Moral standards! I'm sick of moral standards! We need to go beyond moral standards!

BERENGER: What would you put in their place?

JEAN: [still pacing] Nature!

BERENGER: Nature?

JEAN: Nature has its own laws. Morality's against Nature.

BERENGER: Are you suggesting we replace our moral laws by the law of the jungle?

JEAN: It would suit me, suit me fine.

BERENGER: You say that. But deep down, no one . . .

JEAN: [interrupting him, pacing up and down] We've got to build our life on new foundations. We must get back to primeval integrity.

BERENGER: I don't agree with you at all.

JEAN: [breathing noisily] I can't breathe.

BERENGER: Just think a moment. You must admit that we have a philosophy that animals don't share, and an irreplaceable set of values, which it's taken centuries of human civilization to build up . . .

JEAN: [in the bathroom] When we've demolished all that, we'll be better off!

BERENGER: I know you don't mean that seriously. You're joking!
It's just a poetic fancy.

JEAN: Brrr. [He almost trumpets.]

BERENGER: I'd never realized you were a poet.

JEAN: [comes out of the bathroom] Brrr. [He trumpets again.]

BERENGER: That's not what you believe fundamentally—I know you too well. You know as well as I do that mankind . . .

IONESCO

JEAN: [interrupting him] Don't talk to me about mankind!

BERENGER: I mean the human individual, humanism . . .

JEAN: Humanism is all washed up! You're a ridiculous old sentimentalist. [He goes into the bathroom.]

BERENGER: But you must admit that the mind . . .

JEAN: [from the bathroom] Just clichés! You're talking rubbish!

BERENGER: Rubbish!

JEAN: [from the bathroom in a very hoarse voice, difficult to understand] Utter rubbish!

BERENGER: I'm amazed to hear you say that, Jean, really! You must be out of your mind. You wouldn't like to be a rhinoceros yourself, now would you?

JEAN: Why not? I'm not a victim of prejudice like you.

BERENGER: Can you speak more clearly? I didn't catch what you said. You swallowed the words.

JEAN: [still in the bathroom] Then keep your ears open.

BERENGER: What?

JEAN: Keep your ears open. I said what's wrong with being a rhinoceros? I'm all for change.

BERENGER: It's not like you to say a thing like that . . .

[BERENGER stops short, for JEAN's appearance is truly alarming.

JEAN has become, in fact, completely green. The bump on his forehead is practically a rhinoceros horn.]

Oh! You really must be out of your mind!

[JEAN dashes to his bed, throws the covers on the floor, talking in a fast and furious gabble, and making very weird sounds.]

You mustn't get into such a state—calm down! I hardly recognize you any more.

JEAN: [hardly distinguishable] Hot . . . far too hot! Demolish the lot, clothes itch, they itch! [He drops his pyjama trousers.]

BERENGER: What are you doing? You're not yourself! You're generally so modest!

JEAN: The swamps! The swamps!

BERENGER: Look at me! Can't you see me any longer? Can't you hear me?

JEAN: I can hear you perfectly well! I can see you perfectly well!

RHINOCEROS

[He lunges towards BERENGER, head down. BERENGER gets out of the way.]

BERENGER: Watch out!

JEAN: [puffing noisily] Sorry! [He darts at great speed into the bathroom.]

BERENGER: [makes as if to escape by the door left, then comes back and goes into the bathroom after JEAN, saying] I really can't leave him like that—after all he is a friend. [From the bathroom:] I'm going to get the doctor! It's absolutely necessary, believe me!

JEAN: [from the bathroom] No!

BERENGER: [from the bathroom] Calm down, Jean, you're being ridiculous! Oh, your horn's getting longer and longer—you're a rhinoceros!

JEAN: [from the bathroom] I'll trample you, I'll trample you down!
[A lot of noise comes from the bathroom, trumpetings, objects falling, the sound of a shattered mirror; then BERENGER reappears, very frightened; he closes the bathroom door with difficulty against the resistance that is being made from inside.]

BERENGER: [pushing against the door] He's a rhinoceros, he's a rhinoceros!

[BERENGER manages to close the door. As he does so, his coat is pierced by a rhinoceros horn. The door shakes under the animal's constant pressure and the din continues in the bathroom; trumpetings are heard, interspersed with indistinct phrases such as: 'I'm furious! The swine!' etc. BERENGER rushes to the door right.]

I never would have thought it of him—never!

[He opens the staircase door and goes and knocks at the landing door; he bangs repeatedly on it with his fist.]

There's a rhinoceros in the building! Get the police!

OLD MAN: [poking his head out] What's the matter?

BERENGER: Get the police! There's a rhinoceros in the house!

VOICE OF OLD MAN'S WIFE: What are you up to, Jean? Why are you making all that noise?

OLD MAN: [to his wife] I don't know what he's talking about. He's seen a rhinoceros.

BERENGER: Yes, here in the house. Get the police!

RHINOCEROS

105

DAISY: You mustn't be jealous, my dear.

[She goes to BERENGER again and tries to embrace him. This time it is BERENGER who frees himself.]

BERENGER: I can see our opinions are directly opposed. It's better not to discuss the matter.

DAISY: Now you mustn't be nasty.

BERENGER: Then don't you be stupid!

DAISY: [to BERENGER, who turns his back on her. He looks at himself closely in the mirror] It's no longer possible for us to live together.

[As BERENGER continues to examine himself in the mirror she goes quietly to the door, saying:]

He isn't very nice, really, he isn't very nice. [She goes out, and is seen slowly descending the stairs.]

BERENGER: [still looking at himself in the mirror] Men aren't so bad-looking, you know. And I'm not a particularly handsome specimen! Believe me, Daisy! [He turns round.] Daisy! Daisy! Where are you, Daisy? You can't do that to me! [He darts to the door.] Daisy! [He gets to the landing and leans over the banister.] Daisy! Come back! Come back, my dear! You haven't even had your lunch. Daisy, don't leave me alone! Remember your promise! Daisy! Daisy! [He stops calling, makes a despairing gesture, and comes back into the room.] Well, it was obvious we weren't getting along together. The home was broken up. It just wasn't working out. But she shouldn't have left like that with no explanation. [He looks all around.] She didn't even leave a message. That's no way to behave. Now I'm all on my own. [He locks the door carefully, but angrily.] But they won't get me. [He carefully closes the windows.] You won't get me! [He addresses all the rhinoceros heads.] I'm not joining you; I don't understand you! I'm staying as I am. I'm a human being. A human being. [He sits in the armchair.] It's an impossible situation. It's my fault she's gone. I meant everything to her. What'll become of her? That's one more person on my conscience. I can easily picture the worst, because the worst can easily happen. Poor little thing left all alone in this world of monsters! Nobody can help me find her, nobody, because there's nobody left.

[Fresh trumpeting, hectic racings, clouds of dust.]

I can't bear the sound of them any longer, I'm going to put cotton wool in my ears. [He does so, and talks to himself in the mirror.] The only solution is to convince them—but convince them of what? Are the changes reversible, that's the point? Are they reversible? It would be a labour of Hercules, far beyond me. In any case, to convince them you'd have to talk to them. And to talk to them I'd have to learn their language. Or they'd have to learn mine. But what language do I speak? What is my language? Am I talking French? Yes, it must be French. But what is French? I can call it French if I want, and nobody can say it isn't—I'm the only one who speaks it. What am I saying? Do I understand what I'm saying? Do I? [He crosses to the middle of the room.] And what if it's true what Daisy said, and they're the ones in the right? [He turns back to the mirror.] A man's not ugly to look at, not ugly at all! [He examines himself, passing his hand over his face.] What a funny-looking thing! What do I look like? What? [He darts to a cupboard, takes out some photographs which he examines.] Photographs! Who are all these people? Is it Mr. Papillon—or is it Daisy? And is that Botard or Dudard or Jean? Or is it me? [He rushes to the cupboard again and takes out two or three pictures.] Now I recognize me: that's me, that's me! [He hangs the pictures on the back wall, beside the rhinoceros heads.] That's me, that's me!

[When he hangs the pictures one sees that they are of an old man, a huge woman, and another man. The ugliness of these pictures is in contrast to the rhinoceros heads which have become very beautiful. BERENGER steps back to contemplate the pictures.]

I'm not good-looking, I'm not good-looking. [He takes down the pictures, throws them furiously to the ground, and goes over to the mirror.] They're the good-looking ones. I was wrong! Oh, how I wish I was like them! I haven't got any horns, more's the pity! A smooth brow looks so ugly. I need one or two horns to give my sagging face a lift. Perhaps one will grow and I needn't be ashamed any more—then I could go and join them. But it will never grow! [He looks at the palms of his hands.] My hands are so limp—oh, why won't they get rough! [He takes his coat off, undoes his shirt to look at his chest in the mirror.] My skin is so slack. I can't stand this white, hairy body. Oh I'd love to have a hard skin in that wonderful dull green colour—a skin that looks decent naked without any hair on it, like theirs! [He listens to the trumpeting.] Their song is charming—a bit raucous perhaps, but it does have charm! I wish I could do it! [He tries to imitate them.] Ahh, Ahh, Brr! No, that's not it! Try again, louder! Ahh, Ahh, Brr! No, that's not it, it's too feeble, it's got no drive behind it. I'm not trumpeting at all; I'm just howling. Ahh, Ahh, Brr. There's a big difference between howling and trumpeting. I've only myself to blame; I should have gone with them while there was still time. Now it's too late! Now I'm a monster, just a monster. Now I'll never become a rhinoceros, never, never! I've gone past changing. I want to, I really do, but I can't, I just can't. I can't stand the sight of me. I'm too ashamed! [He turns his back on the mirror.] I'm so ugly! People who try to hang on to their individuality always come to a bad end! [He suddenly snaps out of it.] Oh well, too bad! I'll take on the whole of them! I'll put up a fight against the lot of them, the whole lot of them! I'm the last man left, and I'm staying that way until the end. I'm not capitulating!

As You Like It, Act II, Scene VII [All the world's a stage] - William Shakespeare, 1564 - 1616

Jaques to Duke Senior

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. At first, the infant,
Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.
Then the whining schoolboy, with his satchel
And shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school. And then the lover,
Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
Made to his mistress' eyebrow. Then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honor, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth. And then the justice,
In fair round belly with good capon lined,
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances;
And so he plays his part. The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slippered pantaloone,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side;
His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank, and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.

When I am contemplating my life I arrive to the conclusion that a substantial part of it was not a result of a planned program but rather a series of coincidences, lucky and unlucky, a play/reality, written by a masterful playwright. I couldn't have written a better one on my life as the coincidences were really extraordinary, and luckily most of them were positive. So, if I am a player in my life's play I presume that in due time I'll return to the manager of the world's stage, bow 6 times to the public, and after a standing ovation bow for a 7th and last time, one bow for each of my ages, receive a Tchapha/Kafa/High Five as we say in Hebrew/Arabic from my fellow players and from the manager and if there is a reincarnation I'll be assigned to my next job. If there is nothing after the play – this book and my website will be my memorial/pyramid, as I'll remain sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, feelingless, speechless, motionless, sans hearing (it has already occurred), sans writing, sans reading and watching, sans loving, sans caring for all my beloved, sans everything! But who is this Jaques, that by a strange coincidence shares my name and many similar traits.

Jaques is one of the main characters in Shakespeare's As You Like It. The 'Melancholy Jaques' as he's always being called is one of Duke Senior's noblemen who lives with him in the Forest of Arden. The role has long been a favorite for famous Shakespearean actors. Jaques' distinguishing characteristic is his unmitigated cynicism. He is the only purely contemplative character in Shakespeare. He thinks, and does nothing. His whole occupation is to amuse his mind, and he is totally regardless of his body and his fortunes. Hazlitt describes him as "the prince of philosophical idler; his only passion is thought; he sets no value upon anything but as it serves as food for reflection". Jaques' role in the play is more of an observer than an actor. Early in the play, Jaques remains a mystery to the audience, being discussed extensively by fellow characters. Once he appears, Jaques' thematic importance and memorable presence in As You Like It is quite impressive. Though much about Jaques' past is obscure, his conversations with Rosalind show that he lost his optimism while traveling the world. Whatever the root of his bitterness, Jaques always places himself outside the group of happy characters who populate Arden. His function seems to be to provide a sharp foil for the wit of other characters, but also to create a shadow within the sunny forest. Jaques is a constant reminder that in the real world time is not suspended, and grief, sorrow and death provide a counterpoint to all human joys, a kind of embodied presentiment of Poussin's 'et in arcadia ego'. Duke Senior is particularly interested in Jaques as he finds Jaques as a moral philosopher when he's in a melancholic mood. Jaques on the other hand constantly criticizes the Duke. He humorously curses the Duke because he and the other noblemen had to lose their wealth and comfort to please the stubborn Duke and live an uncomfortable life in the Forest of Arden. Jaques leaves the Duke, as soon as he is restored to his sovereignty, to seek his brother, Duke Frederick, who has stepped down and turned hermit.

Before my marriage and before finding Ruthy my love, I was known for my unmitigated cynicism, melancholy, I contemplated life from outside, contributing very little to society and to the economy, to other people and to my friends. I was a philosophical idler, with thought as my only passion, in a word – an observer rather than an actor. I lost my optimism not by traveling the world but by traveling society, always outside the group of happy characters, creating a shadow within the sunny forest, reminding that grief, sorrow and death provide a counterpoint to all human joys. I cannot forget that, as it is all written in my Diary, where I spoke vehemently on sorrow and death at the age of 17. When my friends were dating girls, reading detective stories, and watching westerns, I read the classics, learned languages, and studied at the university. I was a moral philosopher when I was in a melancholy mood then and after the crisis, when I lost all my savings by a scheme devised by my best friends, being in a melancholy mood on society, ethics, tycoons, turning again to acute pessimism towards the future of economy and society.

So, what are the seven stages/ages/coincidences of my life? Are they set by Divine Providence, coincidence, fate, destiny, luck, willpower? I never went to an astrologer, I am an atheist, and I prefer to believe that most of what happened to me was due to my willpower and if not – to coincidence. Yet, I reckon that many events cannot be explained rationally, but even if you are unlucky you can still fight against your "fate" and not compromise. If you are unlucky in love ten or twenty times you can continue your attempts until you find the "chosen" one. If you fail in an examination 4 times you can still try for the fifth time (and in order to assist fate a little bit – study this time with a genius who masters the subject). If you fail in your driving tests six times you can still try for the seventh time and (Thanks God) not be involved in an accident for forty years, although friends tell you that when they see you driving they don't know if you drive forwards, in reverse or you are just parking. The French say "Aide toi el le Ciel t'aidera" – Help yourself and God will help you. This is probably my motto in life, as I am aware that fate can override your will (L'homme propose et Dieu dispose – Man plans and God decides), but if you try once and again – God, fate, destiny or coincidence will come your way. But what if in spite of all your attempts you fail – you were conned and after a couple of years of attempts you reach the conclusion that it is hopeless as you are fighting much stronger opponents. Even then - you can go to another direction win much more in other ventures and start a brilliant career in business ethics that otherwise you would never attempt to try. And, luckily enough, find that you have the motivation to read hundreds of academic books, write ten books, teach thirty courses to thousands of students, and be reckoned as one of the leading figures in Business Ethics. Everything in my life was planned consciously or subconsciously as can be seen from my Diary, except of course all the things that were not planned that were substantial and very important, nevertheless, and I prefer to call them coincidences rather than fate, destiny, or God Will.

The first coincidence was in 1952, when I felt an outsider in my childhood studying and speaking in French in an Arabic country, in a Zionist family loving Israel that was the worst enemy of Egypt, and on top of that experiencing at the age of 7 the burning of the European Cairo by the Shabab/mob who almost killed us as well, reading on our balcony chapter 8 of Alice in the Wonderland, feeling that I live in a nightmare where the Queen of Cards wants to behead everybody ("Off with his head!" which she utters at the slightest dissatisfaction with a subject), and experiencing bibliotherapy, seeing Cairo burning like Nero saw Rome, but without playing the harp. The coincidence was due to the fact that on the street floor was a shop owned by a Greek grocer who convinced the rioters that his shop and the building should be spared as the Greeks are friends of the Arabs, maybe he even gave them a bakshish to enforce his arguments, and there are no English, French or Jewish families in his building. If he was not Greek but Jewish I could have become a casualty statistics. We emigrated to Israel and there also I felt most of the time as an outsider but for different reasons, mainly cultural, without true friends, true love, true meaning for life.

As a matter of fact, if I believed in astrology, I'll start the list of coincidences upon my birth date – June 5, 1944. This was of course D Day, or almost – 6.6.1944. You can draw a lot of conclusions from this occurrence – you can say that all your life you almost attained your goals but not quite, as you were born almost on D Day, you almost became a CEO, almost earned millions, almost got your play on stage, almost achieved a big success as an academic, etc. But this is of course nonsense, as I perceive that I have achieved in my life much more than I expected, much more than any of my family and friends, at least in my view, and if you examine the whole spectrum of achievement: career, culture, love, family, wealth, self fulfillment. I never intended to be a CEO, I never tried hard to become very rich, it is almost unheard of that an "anonymous" person manage to publish ten books, without being a well-known academic, novelist or playwright. On the other hand, you can draw the conclusion that being born one day before D Day is an omen that you'll be a precursor, a pioneer – and this turned to be quite true, as I was a precursor in attending Insead when it was a small business school, that very few heard about, least of all in Israel, the university of the European Union, an EU that turned to be from 1967, when I studied at Insead, until 2000 one of the best economic successes in world history.

I was a precursor in starting to work for Elbit in 1973, one of the very few high tech companies, and a quite small company, that turned to be one of the ten leading companies in Israel selling billions of dollars, while high tech was the biggest economic success of the state of Israel. I was also a precursor at Elbit in introducing profitability criteria to an engineering company, in focusing on humane management, as a CFO, initiating and leading one of the first Israeli companies' IPO on Wall Street, leading mergers as one of the first Israeli companies to acquire a company in the US. I was a precursor in working from home as a self employed and succeeding very much in the projects and financially. I was the first in the world to write a dissertation and academic books on ethics to minority shareholders, that turned to be the "hot" item in business and investment of the last 15 years. And of course I am one of the few who has such a wide scope of activities – intellectual and professional. Last but not least, I discovered (fate, coincidence?) the synagogue of Coria in Spain, and I initiated, participated, and edited the translation into Ladino of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Well, anyhow, June 5 is also the day when the Six Day War started, on the same day the well known economists Adam Smith (1723) and John Maynard Keynes (1883) were born and this is why perhaps I chose to study economics, while I didn't know this coincidence until recently, and June 5 was chosen as the World Environment Date – a subject that I taught and wrote about extensively (unfortunately there is no Ethics Date yet). And to finish this topic with a little humor – D Day was planned to be on June 5 but due to unfavorable weather conditions it was postponed by a day, so my parents were right in their planning or the "stars" were right, but the stars are always right as all know...

The second coincidence occurred in June 1967, when I felt an Israeli who loved his country, when the same Shabab from Egypt, Syria, Jordan, with Nasser as their leader, threatened to invade Israel, and on the date of my birthday June 5, I saw the last ship leaving Israel from my balcony, where I could have been as I had a ticket for the trip and the possibility to start a new life with a work in Switzerland, which I declined and chose to remain in Israel my country that was experiencing an extermination war that miraculously changed into the best victory ever. Another coincidence that occurred in the same month was that I was received at Insead in Fontainebleau, France, after a friend who worked on the same floor brought to my attention that I could receive a scholarship for Insead, as I was by coincidence one of the few Israelis of my age who knew the three languages of study at Insead – English, French, and German.

The third coincidence occurred in 1969, when I met Ruthy at a party and we decided to marry 3 weeks later, marrying 3 months later. I almost did not meet her as I was supposed to relocate to Belgium on behalf of Israel Aircraft Industries in a merger that was cancelled a couple of days before my departure, in the same week of the meeting with Ruthy. I could have been living in Switzerland, Belgium, France or the US, as many of my Insead friends chose to do, but because of a series of coincidences – the Six Day War, the cancellation of the merger with Sabca and Cobelda because of the Boycott (at last a boycott that benefited me...) – I chose to remain in Israel, I met Ruthy and all my future changed accordingly. The fourth coincidence occurred in 1973 when I decided to work at Elbit in Haifa leaving Tel Aviv and a rewarding job, because I sensed that I wanted to live in Haifa and educate there my children, in a way of life that suited us much more, as it was not hedonistic like in Tel Aviv. The coincidence was due to the fact that one of my interviewers at Elbit knew me from childhood as I used to return the balls that were thrown out of the basketball court, and this was good enough for a recommendation much more than my MBA as I was told by the interviewer... Elbit was a turning point in my life, when at last I worked in a company where I fitted very well and enabled me to spread out my wings, become a Vice President of a leading high tech company, contributing much to its success, and obtaining financial rewards that enabled me to buy a house at the best neighborhood in Haifa. I took a very high risk when I chose this move, which proved very successful to my future.

The fourth coincidence (or act in a play, stage or age in life) occurred when I decided to start my own career as a consultant and a project manager, in which I succeeded even more than at Elbit, as my success was measured net to me, and I did not have to share it with many others, who deserved it rightfully or wrongfully. I worked from home from 1987 until 2000 in our new house at Denya on Mount Carmel with an inspiring scenery, reinforcing my ties with my wife and children whom I could see very often. Here the coincidence was that my wife helped much a friend after her husband died, the widow who was grateful recommended me when her brother who had a high tech US company looked for a project manager who would manage their mergers in Israel, there was a good chemistry, and I earned in salaries and options (this time I did not buy shares but only received options at no cost) from that mutual connection enough money to live well enough for my pension years, provided that I don't live as my uncle until 104. My uncle retired from a large Bank at the age of 60 and continued to receive his pension until the age of 104, during 44 years much more than the number of years in which he worked for the bank.

To this chapter in my life we can add another coincidence that was detrimental and that I couldn't influence. I devised with Israeli friends, Jews and Arabs, a startup called The Christian Heritage, a museum on the history of Christianity with miniatures of the most famous churches and cathedrals, in Nazareth, the holy city. I wrote the business plan, started to find investors and get the approvals, we had the blessing of the Arab Mayor of Nazareth (a communist) on the holy project and we met the relevant people in the Vatican, without receiving a formal blessing. The idea was that the majority of the million Christian pilgrims who visit Israel every year and in the future possibly millions would visit our museum. The startup would be very profitable, especially for the founders and investors, but also for the town of Nazareth, Christian charitable organizations, the Arab employees and workers who would work on the project, Israel, and all the stakeholders. There was only a minor circumstance/coincidence that we did not foresee (although it was part of the Risks and Prospects) that there will be an Intifada, riots, many casualties, and no investments, especially in touristic startups. Nevertheless, I taught the business case and the business plan in my courses on Business Management at the University of Haifa, and was courageous enough to tell my students that we failed in this project, and it doesn't matter who was to blame, I assumed absolute responsibility as always, but we are in good company with 99% of the failed startups, but none of the entrepreneurs dares to teach students why, most of the curriculum have only successes as Apple and Microsoft, but no failures as of our startup.

The fifth coincidence occurred when I lost most of my savings conned in a scheme executed by my best friends that conned as well thousands of minority shareholders (and not just me, like I was told that nothing is personal...). This negative event, after three positive events, could be compared to the first coincidence when the European Cairo was burned, but in retrospect both negative coincidences proved to be positive – we left Cairo a year after the burning of Cairo and the revolution that ensued, we could bring with us all our belongings, and riskily receive our money in France and in Israel, and started a new life, not so easy at the beginning (and at the end also - for my parents) but very fruitful in the future, while those who left Cairo in 1956 could not take with them anything. The crisis of ethics changed my life totally, made me a better man, before that - I had stage fright, I never gave a lecture, never wrote books, and after the crisis I changed completely, devoted my time to society, earning less than 10% than before, but with a sense of self fulfillment, contributing to society, teaching thousands of students in Israel and abroad, lecturing before audiences of hundreds in English, French and Hebrew, writing ten books in those languages, articles as well in Spanish and Ladino. It also strengthened my family ties with my wife and children, I met excellent ethical people, as Henri-Claude de Bettignies, Joshua Sobol, Arie Avneri, Henk Van Luijk, Harry Recanati..., far better than the unethical people with whom I severed my relations after I found that they conned me.

The coincidence in this instance was that I worked for a few years as a projects manager in a promising American/Israeli company and I was told that because of my good services I was entitled to purchase shares of the company, although it was forbidden to other Israelis unless they worked for the company. As I saw the huge potential for the company I seized this opportunity/luck/unluck and purchased with almost all my savings shares, dreaming to become a millionaire as some of my friends who seized a similar opportunity. I could not know that at the same time another company of the group that owned a substantial amount of the shares decided to takeover the promising company and allegedly caused the prices to drop by 90% forcing the other shareholders to sell their shares at this ridiculous price and lose all their investment. The Chinese say that every crisis is also an opportunity, I lost my money but gained my vocation and ultimately also won much more money in another project, as was explained before. This loss and the betrayal of my friends opened me to new worlds and vocations, made me much stronger, afraid of almost nothing, and all this happened by coincidence, unplanned, seizing the day.

The sixth coincidence enabled me to start a meaningful academic career. I prefer to refer to all those stages not as luck but as coincidence, as they could have been luck for some people and extreme unluck to others. It goes without saying that the first two coincidences - the burning of Cairo that caused hundreds of European casualties and wounded people, and the Six Day War that caused thousands of casualties, mainly to the Arab side, were very unlucky to the victims. The other three coincidences caused mainly financial losses – the boycott against Israel that brought to the cancellation of the purchasing of Sabca and Cobelda, when I gained from the shares others who sold the shares lost and when I lost from the shares those who purchased the shares won. But the trigger for the sixth coincidence was the sudden death of a colleague who taught projects management at the International MBA of the University of Haifa, Israel. I received my PhD in 2004 at CNAM, Paris, France, in the "esoteric" subject of Business Ethics. When I applied, at the age of 60, to teach this subject at the main universities of Israel none was willing to give me the opportunity to teach – for some of them I was too old: how can you start a new career at the age of 60 without any experience in teaching?, for some of them I was anathema – I was the first academic in the world who wrote a PhD dissertation on the subject of wrongdoing to minority shareholders, and who won from that – the tycoons who financed the Chairs of the professors and gave them excellent salaries as directors much higher than what they received in parallel at the university, some professors were neoliberals totally opposed to my ideas of humane capitalism and were not eager to let their students to attend any course from a dissident lecturer, some of them were not willing to experiment my new methodology of teaching based on group dynamics and role playing with films and plays on business ethics dilemmas, and some professors as Ilan Meshulam at the University of Haifa wanted to hire me but didn't have the hours available for my courses that varried from 32-60 hours per course, as I thought that 10-15 hours was not enough for teaching such an important course as business ethics and could not change any attitude, although most of the universities, including in the Ivy League, taught if at all Business Ethics in a few hours, as they had to leave enough time for the more "important" subjects, such as marketing, finance, production, mathematics, economics, etc.

All the process of my PhD is woven with a series of coincidences to which I referred in this book – I couldn't attend the most important meeting in which I had to present the draft of my dissertation to my first directeur de these because of a strike of the public transportation in Paris, which was probably one of the main reasons of the antagonism with the professor who decided to disqualify my dissertation. And by sheer coincidence (!) I almost couldn't attend the first meeting with my new directeur de these a few years later because of the same problems with the metro, and when they occur you can't get a taxi either. This time I was lucky enough to find a taxi an hour later and my professor decided to wait for me. Well, this may prove a few things – that the metro is more on strike than on tracks. That if I believed in fate "mektoub" as we say in Egypt – all is written in heaven, I would have lost hope and see my first failure as an omen and don't try to apply for more than a hundred publishers to publish my academic books, and more than a hundred universities to present them my dissertation on ethics to minority shareholders. Finally, when I was waiting for a decision on the date in which I had to defend my dissertation, a very difficult problem as the five members of the Jury were very busy travelling all over the world, I had a premonition that they would choose March 23, the date of the birthday of my mother Pauline who died a few years before and was "watching" me from above, and indeed this was the chosen date, and on this date I felt that she was there assisting me to answer rightly.

A few days before the start of the summer semester of the Business Management School at the University of Haifa, I received an urgent call from my friend Professor Ilan Meshulam, to whom I proposed my course, telling me the sad story of the premature and sudden death of a colleague (all three of us worked in the past at Elbit) who was about to teach his course on projects management at the International MBA in English. The International MBA was an international venture, experimenting a model of cooperation between Palestinians and Israelis based on joint ventures that would ensue from this course between the students who would study together for all the MBA program in English. This project was funded by international organizations provided that it would comprise 50% Palestinians from Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem, 25% Israeli Arabs, 25% Israeli Jews. The rationale was that Israeli Jews can attend MBA programs on their own, but Arabs cannot afford to pay the high tuition fees for an MBA. Everything was fine at the beginning, as long as the talks were only on business issues, but when the discussions started to focus on Nakba/Naksa there were arguments, shouting, passions, that luckily did not harm the friendship of all the participants of the program. Meshulam asked me at first to teach projects management, but I refused as I was not an expert on the matter.

I proposed to teach my course on Business Ethics and promised to adapt it to the 32 hours available for the course. My courses existed in Hebrew and English anyhow, my films were all in English, so also most of my cases and it was no problem for me to be ready for the tight deadline of the course. The course was a success, I got very good reviews, I taught the course to the other classes of Palestinians/Israelis until the program ceased. To those who accuse us of Apartheid we can show the success of the course, that could have continued if they would restrict discussions only on business issues and joint ventures and not on the insolvable questions of the Palestinian conflict. I never talked in the classes or outside of them on political issues, and the Palestinians were very cooperative in the group dynamics, in role personification on All My Sons, Wall Street, Erin Brockovitch, but however I didn't include The Merchant of Venice in my course (not also when I taught at Insead), as I didn't want to reinforce prejudices in case there were some. The Jews and Arabs spoke openly on the problems of corruption in Israel and Palestine, which were much more acute in the Arab territories.

From this course and the opportunity that arose from the coincidence of the death of my colleague, I started to give courses also in other programs of the MBA school and other courses at the International MBA, courses to the Political Sciences MA, BA courses, 17 classes of the Naval Academy, BA courses designed for the management of large organizations as the Electric Company, Government and Municipal organizations, Police Officers, but I gave also courses on sustainability, business administration, globalization, leadership, business plans, social responsibility, social and economic justice, and others. All that at the University of Haifa, but after the crisis of 2008 and the publication of my book, the first of its kind, on Business Ethics by the University of Jerusalem, I gave also courses at the MBA programs of the Technion, the International MBA programs of the Tel Aviv University, Israeli colleges, and in 2006 also at Insead in Singapore. The courses were received well by the students, I received the highest grades at the University of Haifa and very good grades at other universities as well. I taught successfully for 10 years at the universities and colleges until 2014. If I didn't have this opportunity I could have failed in my attempts to teach, or maybe it would have taken longer.

And this brings us to the seventh coincidence, which could compare to the seventh and last age of Shakespeare, but in my case could be also a new beginning. In 2014 I lost almost all my hearing, this was an unfortunate coincidence, but which corresponded to my heredity. I had to resign from teaching, as all my courses were based on group dynamics that cannot work if your hearing is not well, even with the best hearing aids. I cannot participate also in meetings, especially if there is a lot of noise, and in Israel in the meetings and sometimes in the classes also there is a lot of noise. So, what can you do if such an unlucky event occurs. You have to bite the bullet - faire contre mauvaise fortune bon coeur. I wrote two books, this book and another book "Ethics Pays" proving that the most ethical countries receive the best grades on all the parameters, and vice versa. I have ceased to write articles and participate in forums on ethics, to deal on current ethical issues, on social and economic justice issues, and focus my activities in more generic issues, most of them not related uniquely on business ethics, but on more general, cultural, linguistic, drama, films, literature issues. It works well and maybe out of this coincidence we would find new ways of expression, as you have to keep busy whatever the circumstances are!

Well, I don't admit that I am in the last scene of the play, in my second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything. Shakespeare, who wrote it died at the age of 52, and wrote, staged and played as if he died at the age of 104. I am almost 20 years older and feel in the prime of my life, and Shimon Peres and Itzhak Navon our former presidents who are 20 years older than me are very active as well. You decide when to quit the stage and you should act as if today is your last day on earth – working very hard day and night in order to finish another book, see another play, visit another country. On the other hand you should act as if you'll live forever – starting to write new books, conveying to future generations your insights, as you don't know when you'll be left sans everything, when the final coincidence will occur!

A coincidence is a remarkable concurrence of events or circumstances which have no apparent causal connection with each other. The perception of remarkable coincidences may lead to supernatural, occult, or paranormal claims. Or it may lead to belief in fatalism, which is a doctrine that events will happen in the exact manner of a predetermined plan. From a statistical perspective, coincidences are inevitable and often less remarkable than they may appear intuitively. An example is the birthday problem, which shows that the probability of two persons having the same birthday already exceeds 50% in a group of only 23 persons. Measuring the probability of a series of coincidences is the most common method of distinguishing a coincidence from causally connected events. "The mathematically naive person seems to have a more acute awareness than the specialist of the basic paradox of probability theory, over which philosophers have puzzled ever since Pascal initiated that branch of science [in 1654] The paradox consists, loosely speaking, in the fact that probability theory is able to predict with uncanny precision the overall outcome of processes made up out of a large number of individual happenings, each of which in itself is unpredictable. In other words, we observe a large number of uncertainties producing a certainty, a large number of chance events creating a lawful total outcome." Arthur Koestler, The Roots of Coincidence

VI. NON-FICTION BOOKS AND ACTIVITIES

I am reading part and have read part of the following non-fiction books, and was creative in:

1. ARTS AND MUSEUMS

The reader can find details on the books, on the painters/sculptors/museums on Wikipedia, Encyclopaedias, Amazon/Local Books websites, Cory's/Painters & Museums websites

Reading BOOKS - Claude Monet, The art of Egyptian Hieroglyphics, Art of India, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Max Ernst, Edouard Manet, An history of the Italian Renaissance, Art at the turn of the millennium, History of modern art, Salvador Dali, Art of the XXth Century, Art in Society, Illustrated Encyclopedia of Western Art, The Great Collectors, A Treasury of Impressionism. (see also biographies of great painters, sculptors, artists)

I have read dozens of Art books, mainly on Impressionism, and have seen the best works of art, archeology, displays, architecture, etc., in museums, galleries, churches, mosques, synagogues, and sites in: New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Minneapolis, New Orleans, Boston, Seattle, Dallas, Fort Worth, Washington, San Jose, San Diego, Toronto, Lima, Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires, Wellington, Sydney, Bangkok, Taipei, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Singapore, Cairo, Nairobi, Abidjan, Johannesburg, Madrid, Sevilla, Barcelona, Montserrat, Cordoba, Granada, Coria, Lisbon, Edinburgh, Monte Carlo, Brussels, Amsterdam, Oslo, Copenhagen, Goteborg, Stockholm, Helsinki, Talin, Saint Petersburg, Frankfurt am Main, Munchen, Geneve, Bern, London, Paris, Berlin, Prague, Budapest, Vienna, Rome, Milano, Napoli, Athens, Corfu, Nicosia, Istanbul, Ephesus, Haifa, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Zagreb, Avignon, Aix en Provence, Marseille, Orange, San Diego, San Jose, Carpentras, Orange, Pont du Gard, Arles, Les Baux, Nimes, Saintes Maries de la Mer, Aigues Mortes, Montpellier, Toulouse, Carcassonne, Albi, Pau...

1.1 MY BEST MUSEUMS IN PARIS, LONDON AND NEW YORK

I have a sense of intellectual elation when I visit museums, similar to the elation I sense watching the best plays and concerts, reading the best books and poems, visiting Paris, or writing my novel or some of my case studies. My most favorite painters are the Impressionists and especially Renoir, but also Monet, Manet and Van Gogh. I sense a great sympathy to the painters and the models, as though I participate in the event. My empathy to art is not confined exclusively to the Impressionists, but also to Rembrandt, Renaissance painters and sculptors, much less romanticism painting, like Gericault's The Raft of the Medusa. I remain indifferent in front of this gigantic painting in the Louvre, but can be moved to tears by a painting of young women or a couple by Renoir, although the subject of the raft is much more tragic than the girls. I can visit the same museum ten times and I still enjoy seeing the paintings of the masters. My favorite museums are: In Paris - Orsay, because I find there most of the finest impressionist paintings I like, I can spend there hours and hours and visit it every month, although I go there only once every few years. Orangerie is a rather small museum but with excellent impressionist paintings, Rodin's museum is excellent, so is Marmottan, at the Louvre I feel rather lost – it is an excellent museum but maybe too excellent... Although I don't like much modern art, Centre Pompidou museum is so good that you can always find there what to see. It bothers me that although I have read so many books on modern art, Picasso, Cubism, I can't enjoy, be moved and understand those painters. Is it mainly a scam, or am I too blind to understand modern art?

In London I like the National Gallery, much less the British Museum, and I like most Courtauld Gallery. It is amazing how such a small museum is so perfect, and how I remain indifferent to the huge British Museum. Other good museums are: the National Portrait Gallery, Cabinet War Rooms where I feel a deep empathy to Churchill, Tate Britain and Tate Modern, Victoria and Albert Museum, many others, as you can always find a new one. In New York, I like most the Metropolitan, but also MoMA, Guggenheim, and the excellent Frick Collection and Whitney. The 9/11 Memorial Museum – Ground Zero is probably the worst museum I have ever seen. Millions were spent in vain and instead to convey one of the worst tragedies in an emotional way – you feel completely estranged and unmoved. It is beyond the scope of this book to describe all the other museums seen all over the world – however, I enjoyed very much the Provence museums, museums in Rome, Milano, Madrid, Washington, Cairo (where I still remember the mummies I saw with my class), Berlin, Barcelona, Amsterdam (Van Gogh and Rembrandt), Oslo, Saint Petersburg, Athens, Jerusalem, Haifa, Tel Aviv, the Balkans, Frankfurt, Brussels...

1.2 MY SON Dr JOSEPH CORY'S ACTIVITIES IN ARCHITECTURE

I do not paint, but I have designed graphs and visual displays - Bus. Plan Graphs Designed by Cory- 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 in business plans, that were called by colleagues works of art, I have taken pictures in more than 120 albums, some of them are works of art (see Cory's website). My son, Dr. Joseph Cory, is a well known architect, specializing in sustainable architecture - Geotectura, whose projects have received an international acclaim as the most pioneering and beautiful buildings of their kind. My son and me cooperated in designing the cover pages of my books, while I brought the ideas of the covers and my son designed them and was in touch with the publishers. Joseph is the artist in the family, familiar with all the museums and painters, and appreciating mostly modern painting. His PhD dissertation at the Technion, Israel Institute of Technology, Haifa, Israel, was about Frederick Kiesler and Salvador Dali and was named: 'Attempts to Transform the Surrealist Dream into an Architectural Reality', under the direction of Professor Michael Levin. The dissertation analyses the architectural activities of Kiesler and Dali and the influence surrealism had on them, while searching for the features, singled out in the outset of the study, of the surrealistic dream as opposed to reality, in works, sketches, criticism of modernism and descriptions of the difficulties in realizing structures. Emphasis was put on Kiesler's architecture and the influence surrealism had on both his theoretical and constructed work. These two personalities constitute the body of the main study, and most of the initial archive material relates to them. The study analyses the gaps between their surrealistic vision and the manner in which they actually realized their ideas. Surrealism in architecture is not a one-time phenomenon. The phenomenon has contemporary implications, it is a catalyst for creative planning and is not a school but rather a planning strategy of great potential.

Joseph's favorite painter is Salvador Dali, and he even proposed to his wife on the bridge connecting the two towers of Familia Sagrada by Gaudi in Barcelona. He is one of the most prominent architects in sustainable. His Geotectura studio is an award winning design practice that offers comprehensive services including architecture, interiors and environmental simulations. It is known for being creative and innovative while integrating sustainable design principles within each project. Its projects are based on multi-disciplinary research using an open source design approach and BIM in order to optimize the best results for each challenge. His Porter's School of Environmental Studies, one of his multiple projects, is built according to principles of green design. It is Tel Aviv University's first green building, and the first of its kind in Israel (first LEED Platinum project in Israel with 92 points!). The project is a living lab of ecological and social values for the community and the environment. It tells the story of the complex sustainability term and simplifies it to the public by strolling along the eco-wall, the ground floor and the roof that present current research of energy, water, soil, vegetation, materials and so on that they can see, touch and learn. The building can absorb changing technology and keep being relevant and attractive for leading researches around the world. The eco-wall is an iconic ever-changing window display for the other universities and visitors and act as a constant social-educational contributor. The U.S. Green Building Council has awarded Tel Aviv University's Porter School of Environmental Studies its highest distinction, LEED (Leadership in Energy & Environmental Design) Platinum. The Porter Building is the first in Israel, and only one of a few dozen in the world, to receive this exceptionally high measure of its long-term sustainability and environmental consciousness. The building scored 92 out of 110 points, making it only one of 17 other structures in the world to have garnered more than 90 points towards a LEED designation. Platinum, the highest distinction, is achieved by earning over 80 points. Buildings at only few other universities in the world, including Harvard and Yale, have received the coveted "Platinum" status. It is quite an achievement for the young Joseph to design/build a building which is one of the 17 most sustainable buildings in the world! I am proud that Joseph's and my fields of interests/activities are very similar, as sustainability, social responsibility and business ethics share a lot in common in concept and implementation.

1.3 THE ORSAY MUSEUM IN PARIS – IMPRESSIONISM, PAINTERS, BEST PAINTINGS

In this book we can find references to many painters as in the biographies chapter on Renoir, Rembrandt, links to many artists, painters, architects, sculptors, museums, and so on. We chose to quote in this book the Wikipedia entry on the Orsay Museum which I like best:

The Musée d'Orsay is a museum in Paris, France, on the left bank of the Seine. It is housed in the former Gare d'Orsay, a Beaux-Arts railway station built between 1898 and 1900. The museum holds mainly French art dating from 1848 to 1915, including paintings, sculptures, furniture, and photography. It houses the largest collection of impressionist and post-impressionist masterpieces in the world, by painters including Monet, Manet, Degas, Renoir, Cézanne, Seurat, Sisley, Gauguin and Van Gogh.

1.4 BEST EUROPEAN PAINTERS AND PAINTINGS (& CORY'S 72 BEST ARTISTS)

If I would have to chose who are the 100 best painters of all times, what are the best 100 paintings in the European culture, I would probably chose a similar listing as the one that I have found on the Internet. I object to the ranking, but if we look at the 100 best as a comprehensive list, and I overcome my reticence to most of modern painting, admitting that vox populi vox dei and if all the critics chose Picasso as the best painter I may prefer Renoir but he appears here in the list in no. 75. I take therefore this list as a package deal as I am not such an expert as they are.

by G. Fernández - theartwolf.com

Although this list stems from a deep study of the painters, their contribution to Western painting, and their influence on later artists; we are aware that objectivity does not exist in Art, so we understand that most readers will not agree 100% with this list. In any case, theartwolf.com assures that this list is only intended as a tribute to painting and the painters who have made it an unforgettable Art

1. PABLO PICASSO (1881-1973) – Picasso is to Art History a giant earthquake with eternal aftermaths. With the possible exception of Michelangelo (who focused his greatest efforts in sculpture and architecture), no other artist had such ambitions at the time of placing his oeuvre in the history of art. Picasso created the avant-garde. Picasso destroyed the avant-garde. He looked back at the masters and surpassed them all. He faced the whole history of art and single-handedly redefined the tortuous relationship between work and spectator

2. GIOTTO DI BONDONE (c.1267-1337) – It has been said that Giotto was the first real painter, like Adam was the first man. We agree with the first part. Giotto continued the Byzantine style of Cimabue and other predecessors, but he earned the right to be included in gold letters in the history of painting when he added a quality unknown to date: emotion

3. LEONARDO DA VINCI (1452-1519) – For better or for worse, Leonardo will be forever known as the author of the most famous painting of all time, the "Gioconda" or "Mona Lisa". But he is more, much more. His humanist, almost scientific gaze, entered the art of the quattrocento and revolutionized it with his sfumetto that nobody was ever able to imitate

4. PAUL CÉZANNE (1839-1906) – "Cezanne is the father of us all." This famous quote has been attributed to both Picasso and Matisse, and certainly it does not matter who actually said it, because in either case would be appropriate. While he exhibited with the Impressionist painters, Cézanne left behind the whole group and developed a style of painting never seen so far, which opened the door for the arrival of Cubism and the rest of the vanguards of the twentieth century

5. REMBRANDT VAN RIJN (1606-1669) – The fascinating use of the light and shadows in Rembrandt's works seem to reflect his own life, moving from fame to oblivion. Rembrandt is the great master of Dutch painting, and, along with Velázquez, the main figure of 17th century European Painting. He is, in addition, the great master of the self-portrait of all time, an artist who had never show mercy at the time of depicting himself

6. DIEGO VELÁZQUEZ (1599-1660) – Along with Rembrandt, one of the summits of Baroque painting. But unlike the Dutch artist, the Sevillian painter spent most of his life in the comfortable but rigid courtesan society. Nevertheless, Velázquez was an innovator, a "painter of atmospheres" two centuries before Turner and the Impressionists, which is shown in his colossal 'royal paintings' ("Meninas", "The Forge of Vulcan"), but also in his small and memorable sketches of the Villa Medici.

7. WASSILY KANDINSKY (1866-1944) – Although the title of "father of abstraction" has been assigned to several artists, from Picasso to Turner, few painters could claim it with as much justice as Kandinsky. Many artists have succeeded in painting emotion, but very few have changed the way we understand art. Wassily Kandinsky is one of them.

8. CLAUDE MONET (1840-1926) – The importance of Monet in the history of art is sometimes "underrated", as Art lovers tend to see only the overwhelming beauty that emanates from his canvases, ignoring the complex technique and composition of the work (a "defect" somehow caused by Monet himself, when he declared that "I do not understand why everyone discusses my art and pretends to understand, as if it were necessary to understand, when it is simply necessary to love"). However, Monet's experiments, including studies on the changes in an object caused by daylight at different times of the day; and the almost abstract quality of his "water lilies", are clearly a prologue to the art of the twentieth century.

9. CARAVAGGIO (1571-1610) – The tough and violent Caravaggio is considered the father of Baroque painting, with his spectacular use of lights and shadows. Caravaggio's chiaroscuro became so famous that many painters started to copy his paintings, creating the 'Caravaggisti' style.

10. JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM TURNER (1775-1851) – Turner is the best landscape painter of Western painting. Whereas he had been at his beginnings an academic painter, Turner was slowly but unstoppably evolving towards a free, atmospheric style, sometimes even outlining the abstraction, which was misunderstood and rejected by the same critics who had admired him for decades

11. JAN VAN EYCK (1390-1441) – Van Eyck is the colossal pillar on which rests the whole Flemish paintings from later centuries, the genius of accuracy, thoroughness and perspective, well above any other artist of his time, either Flemish or Italian.

12. ALBRECHT DÜRER (1471-1528) – The real Leonardo da Vinci of Northern European Renaissance was Albrecht Dürer, a restless and innovative genius, master of drawing and color. He is one of the first artists to represent nature without artifice, either in his painted landscapes or in his drawings of plants and animals

13. JACKSON POLLOCK (1912-1956) – The major figure of American Abstract Expressionism, Pollock created his best works, his famous drips, between 1947 and 1950. After those fascinating years, comparable to Picasso's blue period or van Gogh's final months in Auvers, he abandoned the drip, and his latest works are often bold, unexciting works.

14. MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI (1475-1564) – Some readers will be quite surprised to see the man who is, along with Picasso, the greatest artistic genius of all time, out of the "top ten" of this list, but the fact is that even Michelangelo defined himself as "sculptor", and even his painted masterpiece (the frescoes in the Sistine Chapel) are often defined as 'painted sculptures'. Nevertheless, that unforgettable masterpiece is enough to guarantee him a place of honor in the history of painting

15. PAUL GAUGUIN (1848-1903) – One of the most fascinating figures in the history of painting, his works moved from Impressionism (soon abandoned) to a colorful and vigorous symbolism, as can be seen in his 'Polynesian paintings'. Matisse and Fauvism could not be understood without the works of Paul Gauguin

16. FRANCISCO DE GOYA (1746-1828) - Goya is an enigma. In the whole History of Art few figures are as complex as the artist born in Fuendetodos, Spain. Enterprising and indefinable, a painter with no rival in all his life, Goya was the painter of the Court and the painter of the people. He was a religious painter and a mystical painter. He was the author of the beauty and eroticism of the 'Maja desnuda' and the creator of the explicit horror of 'The Third of May, 1808'. He was an oil painter, a fresco painter, a sketcher and an engraver. And he never stopped his metamorphosis

17. VINCENT VAN GOGH (1853-1890) – Few names in the history of painting are now as famous as Van Gogh, despite the complete neglect he suffered in life. His works, strong and personal, are one of the greatest influences in the twentieth century painting, especially in German Expressionism

18. ÉDOUARD MANET (1832-1883) – Manet was the origin of Impressionism, a revolutionary in a time of great artistic revolutions. His (at the time) quite polemical "Olympia" or "Déjeuner sur l'Herbe" opened the way for the great figures of Impressionism

19. MARK ROTHKO (1903-1970) – The influence of Rothko in the history of painting is yet to be quantified, because the truth is that almost 40 years after his death the influence of Rothko's large, dazzling and emotional masses of color continues to increase in many painters of the 21st century

20. HENRI MATISSE (1869-1954) – Art critics tend to regard Matisse as the greatest exponent of twentieth century painting, only surpassed by Picasso. This is an exaggeration, although the almost pure use of color in some of his works strongly influenced many of the following avant-gardes

21. RAPHAEL (1483-1520) – Equally loved and hated in different eras, no one can doubt that Raphael is one of the greatest geniuses of the Renaissance, with an excellent technique in terms of drawing and color

22. JEAN-MICHEL BASQUIAT (1960-1988) - Basquiat is undoubtedly the most important and famous member of the "graffiti movement" that appeared in the New York scene in the early '80s, an artistic movement whose enormous influence on later painting is still to be measured

23. EDVARD MUNCH (1863-1944) – Modernist in his context, Munch could be also considered the first expressionist painter in history. Works like "The Scream" are vital to understanding the twentieth century painting.

24. TITIAN (c.1476-1576) – After the premature death of Giorgione, Titian became the leading figure of Venetian painting of his time. His use of color and his taste for mythological themes defined the main features of 16th century Venetian Art. His influence on later artists -Rubens, Velázquez...- is extremely important

25. PIET MONDRIAN (1872 -1944) – Along with Kandinsky and Malevich, Mondrian is the leading figure of early abstract painting. After emigrating to New York, Mondrian filled his abstract paintings with a fascinating emotional quality, as we can see in his series of "boogie-woogies" created in the mid-40s

26. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA (1416-1492) - Despite being one of the most important figures of the quattrocento, the Art of Piero della Francesca has been described as "cold", "hieratic" or even "impersonal". But with the apparition of Berenson and the great historians of his era, like Michel Hérubel -who defended the "metaphysical dimension" of the paintings by Piero-, his precise and detailed Art finally occupied the place that it deserves in the Art history

27. PETER PAUL RUBENS (1577-1640) – Rubens was one of the most prolific painters of all time, thanks in part to the collaboration of his studio. Very famous in life, he traveled around Europe to meet orders from very wealthy and important clients. His female nudes are still amazing in our days

28. ANDY WARHOL (1928-1987) – Brilliant and controversial, Warhol is the leading figure of pop-art and one of the icons of contemporary art. His silkscreen series depicting icons of the mass-media (as a reinterpretation of Monet's series of Water lilies or the Rouen Cathedral) are one of the milestones of contemporary Art, with a huge influence in the Art of our days

29. JOAN MIRÓ (1893-1983) – Like most geniuses, Miro is an unclassifiable artist. His interest in the world of the unconscious, those hidden in the depths of the mind, link him with Surrealism, but with a personal style, sometimes closer to Fauvism and Expressionism. His most important works are those from the series of "Constellations", created in the early 40s

30. TOMMASO MASACCIO (1401-1428) – Masaccio was one of the first old masters to use the laws of scientific perspective in his works . One of the greatest innovative painters of the Early Renaissance

31. MARC CHAGALL (1887-1985) – Artist of dreams and fantasies, Chagall was for all his life an immigrant fascinated by the lights and colors of the places he visited.

Few names from the School of Paris of the early twentieth century have contributed so much -and with such variety of ideas- to change modern Art as this man "impressed by the light," as he defined himself

31. GUSTAVE COURBET (1819-1877) – Leading figure of realism, and a clear precedent for the impressionists, Courbet was one of the greatest revolutionaries, both as an artist and as a social-activist, of the history of painting. Like Rembrandt and other predecessors, Courbet did not seek to create beauty, but believed that beauty is achieved when an artist represents the purest reality without artifice

33. NICOLAS POUSSIN (1594-1665) – The greatest among the great French Baroque painters, Poussin had a vital influence on French painting for many centuries. His use of color is unique among all the painters of his era

34. WILLEM DE KOONING (1904-1997) – After Pollock, the leading figure of abstract expressionism, though one of his greatest contributions was not to feel limited by the abstraction, often resorting to a heartbreaking figurative painting (his series of "Women" are the best example) with a major influence on later artists such as Francis Bacon or Lucian Freud

35. PAUL KLEE (1879-1940) – In a period of artistic revolutions and innovations, few artists were as crucial as Paul Klee. His studies of color, widely taught at the Bauhaus, are unique among all the artists of his time

36. FRANCIS BACON (1909-1992) – Maximum exponent, along with Lucian Freud, of the so-called "School of London", Bacon's style was totally against all canons of painting, not only in those terms related to beauty, but also against the dominance of the Abstract Expressionism of his time

37. GUSTAV KLIMT (1862-1918) – Half way between modernism and symbolism appears the figure of Gustav Klimt, who was also devoted to the industrial arts. His nearly abstract landscapes also make him a forerunner of geometric abstraction

38. EUGÈNE DELACROIX (1798-1863) – Eugène Delacroix is the French romanticism painter "par excellence" and one of the most important names in the European painting of the first half of the 19th century. His famous "Liberty leading the People" also demonstrates the capacity of Painting to become the symbol of an era.

39. PAOLO UCCELLO (1397-1475) – "Solitary, eccentric, melancholic and poor". Giorgio Vasari described with these four words one of the most audacious geniuses of the early Florentine Renaissance, Paolo Uccello.

40. WILLIAM BLAKE (1757-1827) – Revolutionary and mystic, painter and poet, Blake is one of the most fascinating artists of any era. His watercolors, prints and temperas are filled with a wild imagination (almost crazyness), unique among the artists of his era

41. KAZIMIR MALEVICH (1878-1935) – Creator of Suprematism, Malevich will forever be one of the most controversial figures of the history of art among the general public, divided between those who consider him an essential renewal and those who consider that his works based on polygons of pure colors do not deserve to be considered Art

42. ANDREA MANTEGNA (1431-1506) – One of the greatest exponents of the Quattrocento, interested in the human figure, which he often represented under extreme perspectives ("The Dead Christ")

43. JAN VERMEER (1632-1675) – Vermeer was the leading figure of the Delft School, and for sure one of the greatest landscape painters of all time. Works such as "View of the Delft" are considered almost "impressionist" due to the liveliness of his brushwork. He was also a skilled portraitist

44. EL GRECO (1541-1614) – One of the most original and fascinating artists of his era, with a very personal technique that was admired, three centuries later, by the impressionist painters

45. CASPAR DAVID FRIEDRICH (1774-1840) – Leading figure of German Romantic painting, Friedrich is still identified as the painter of landscapes of loneliness and distress, with human figures facing the terrible magnificence of nature.

46. WINSLOW HOMER (1836-1910) – The main figure of American painting of his era, Homer was a breath of fresh air for the American artistic scene, which was "stuck" in academic painting and the more romantic Hudson River School. Homer's loose and lively brushstroke is almost impressionistic .

47. MARCEL DUCHAMP (1887-1968) – One of the major figures of Dadaism and a prototype of "total artist", Duchamp is one of the most important and controversial figures of his era. His contribution to painting is just a small part of his huge contribution to the art world.

48. GIORGIONE (1478-1510) - Like so many other painters who died at young age, Giorgione (1477-1510) makes us wonder what place would his exquisite painting occupy in the history of Art if he had enjoyed a long existence, just like his direct artistic heir - Titian.

49. FRIDA KAHLO (1907-1954) – In recent years, Frida's increasing fame seems to have obscured her importance in Latin American art. On September 17th, 1925, Kahlo was almost killed in a terrible bus accident. She did not die, but the violent crash had terrible sequels, breaking her spinal column, pelvis, and right leg.. After this accident, Kahlo's self-portraits can be considered as quiet but terrible moans

50. HANS HOLBEIN THE YOUNGER (1497-1543) – After Dürer, Holbein is the greatest of the German painters of his time. The fascinating portrait of "The Ambassadors" is still considered one of the most enigmatic paintings of art history

51. EDGAR DEGAS (1834-1917) – Though Degas was not a "pure" impressionist painter, his works shared the ideals of that artistic movement. Degas paintings of young dancers or ballerinas are icons of late 19th century painting

52. FRA ANGELICO (1387-1455) – One of the great colorists from the early Renaissance. Initially trained as an illuminator, he is the author of masterpieces such as "The Annunciation" in the Prado Museum.

53. GEORGES SEURAT (1859-1891) - Georges Seurat is one of the most important post-impressionist painters, and he is considered the creator of the "pointillism", a style of painting in which small distinct points of primary colors create the impression of a wide selection of secondary and intermediate colors.

54. JEAN-ANTOINE WATTEAU (1684-1721) – Watteau is today considered one of the pioneers of rococo. Unfortunately, he died at the height of his powers, as it is evidenced in the great portrait of "Gilles" painted in the year of his death

55. SALVADOR DALÍ (1904-1989) – "I am Surrealism!" shouted Dalí when he was expelled from the surrealist movement by André Breton. Although the quote sounds presumptuous (which was not unusual in Dalí), the fact is that Dalí's paintings are now the most famous images of all the surrealist movement.

56. MAX ERNST (1891-1976) – Halfway between Surrealism and Dadaism appears Max Ernst, important in both movements. Ernst was a brave artistic explorer thanks in part to the support of his wife and patron, Peggy Guggenheim

57. TINTORETTO (1518-1594) - Tintoretto is the most flamboyant of all Venetian masters (not the best, such honour can only be reclaimed by Titian or Giorgione) and his remarkable oeuvre not only closed the Venetian splendour till the apparition of Canaletto and his contemporaries, but also makes him the last of the Cinquecento masters.

58. JASPER JOHNS (born 1930) – The last living legend of the early Pop Art, although he has never considered himself a "pop artist". His most famous works are the series of "Flags" and "Targets".

59. SANDRO BOTTICELLI (1445-1510) – "If Botticelli were alive now he would be working for Vogue", said actor Peter Ustinov. As well as Raphael, Botticelli had been equally loved or hated in different eras, but his use of color is one of the most fascinating among all old masters.

60. DAVID HOCKNEY (born 1937) – David Hockney is one of the living myths of the Pop Art. Born in Great Britain, he moved to California, where he immediately felt identified with the light, the culture and the urban landscape of the 'Golden State'

61. UMBERTO BOCCIONI (1882-1916) – The maximum figure of Italian Futurism, fascinated by the world of the machine, and the movement as a symbol of contemporary times.

62. JOACHIM PATINIR (1480-1524) – Much less technically gifted than other Flemish painters like Memling or van der Weyden, his contribution to the history of art is vital for the incorporation of landscape as a major element in the painting.

63. DUCCIO DA BUONINSEGNA (c.1255/60 – 1318/19) – While in Florence Giotto di Bondone was changing the history of painting, Duccio of Buoninsegna provided a breath of fresh air to the important Sienese School.

64. ROGER VAN DER WEYDEN (1399-1464) – After Van Eyck, the leading exponent of Flemish painting in the fifteenth century; a master of perspective and composition.

65. JOHN CONSTABLE (1776-1837) – John Constable (1776-1837) is, along with Turner, the great figure of English romanticism. But unlike his contemporary, he never left England, and he devoted all his time to represent the life and landscapes of his beloved England.

66. JACQUES-LOUIS DAVID (1748-1825) – David is the summit of neoclassicism, a grandiloquent artist whose compositions seem to reflect his own hectic and revolutionary life.

67. ARSILLE GORKY (1905-1948) – Armenian-born American painter, Gorky was a surrealist painter and also one of the leaders of abstract expressionism. He was called "the Ingres of the unconscious".

68. HIERONYMUS BOSCH (1450-1516) – An extremely religious man, all works by Bosch are basically moralizing, didactic. The artist sees in the society of his time the triumph of sin, the depravation, and all the things that have caused the fall of the human being from its angelical character; and he wants to warn his contemporaries about the terrible consequences of his impure acts.

69. PIETER BRUEGEL THE ELDER (1528-1569) - Many scholars and art critics claim to have found important similarities between the works by Hyeronimus Bosch and those by Brueghel, but the truth is that the differences between both of them are abysmal. Whereas Bosch's fantasies are born of a deep deception and preoccupation for the human being, with a clearly moralizing message; works by Bruegel are full of irony, and even filled with a love for the rural life, which seems to anticipate the Dutch landscape paintings from the next century.

70. SIMONE MARTINI (1284-1344) – One of the great painters of the Trecento, he was a step further and helped to expand its progress, which culminated in the "International Style".

71. Frederic Edwin Church (1826-1900) - Church represents the culmination of the Hudson River School: he had Cole's love for the landscape, Asher Brown Durand's romantic lyricism, and Albert Bierstadt's grandiloquence, but he was braver and technically more gifted than anyone of them. Church is without any doubt one of the greatest landscape painters of all time, perhaps only surpassed by Turner and some impressionists and postimpressionists like Monet or Cézanne.

72. EDWARD HOPPER (1882-1967) – Hopper is widely known as the painter of urban loneliness. His most famous work, the fabulous "Nighthawks" (1942) has become the symbol of the solitude of the contemporary metropolis, and it is one of the icons of the 20th century Art.

73. LUCIO FONTANA (1899-1968) – Father of the "White Manifesto", in which he stated that "Matter, colour and sound in motion are the phenomena whose simultaneous development makes up the new art". His "Concepts Spatiales" are already icons of the art of the second half of the twentieth century.

74. FRANZ MARC (1880-1916) – After Kandinsky, the great figure of the Expressionist group "The Blue Rider" and one of the most important expressionist painters ever. He died at the height of his artistic powers, when his use of color was even anticipating the later abstraction.

75. PIERRE-AUGUSTE RENOIR (1841-1919) – One of the key figures of Impressionism, he soon left the movement to pursue a more personal, academic painting.

77. THEODORE GÉRICAUT (1791-1824) – Key figure in romanticism, revolutionary in his life and works despite his bourgeois origins. In his masterpiece, "The raft of the Medusa", Gericault creates a painting that we can define as "politically incorrect", as it depicts the miseries of a large group of castaways abandoned after the shipwreck of a French naval frigate.

78. WILLIAM HOGARTH (1697-1764) – A list of the great portrait painters of all time should never miss the name of William Hogarth, whose studies and sketches could even qualify as "pre-impressionist".

79. CAMILLE COROT (1796-1875) – One of the great figures of French realism in the 19th century and certainly one of the major influences for the impressionist painters like Monet or Renoir, thanks to his love for "plén-air" painting, emphasizing the use of light.

80. GEORGES BRAQUE (1882-1963) – Along with Picasso and Juan Gris, the main figure of Cubism, the most important of the avant-gardes of the 20th century Art.
81. HANS MEMLING (1435-1494) – Perhaps the most complete and "well-balanced" of all fifteenth century Flemish painters, although he was not as innovative as Van Eyck or van der Weyden.
82. GERHARD RICHTER (born 1932) – One of the most important artists of recent decades, Richter is known either for his fierce and colorful abstractions or his serene landscapes and scenes with candles.
83. AMEDEO MODIGLIANI (1884-1920) – One of the most original portraitists of the history of painting, considered as a "cursed" painter because of his wild life and early death.
84. GEORGES DE LA TOUR (1593-1652) – The influence of Caravaggio is evident in De la Tour, whose use of light and shadows is unique among the painters of the Baroque era.
85. GENTILESCHI, ARTEMISIA (1597-1654) – One of the most gifted artists of the early baroque era, she was the first female painter to become a member of the Accademia di Arte del Disegno in Florence.
86. JEAN FRANÇOIS MILLET (1814-1875) – One of the main figures of the Barbizon School, author of one of the most emotive paintings of the 19th century: The "Angelus".
87. FRANCISCO DE ZURBARÁN (1598-1664) – The closest to Caravaggio of all Spanish Baroque painters, his latest works show a mastery of chiaroscuro without parallel among any other painter of his time.
88. CIMABUE (c.1240-1302) – Although in some of his works Cimabue already represented a visible evolution of the rigid Byzantine art, his greatest contribution to painting was to discover a young talented artist named Giotto (see number 2), who changed forever the Western painting.
89. JAMES ENSOR (1860-1949) – Violent painter whose strong, almost "unfinished" works make him a precursor of Expressionism
90. RENÉ MAGRITTE (1898-1967) – One of the leading figures of surrealism, his apparently simple works are the result of a complex reflection about reality and the world of dreams
91. EL LISSITZKY (1890-1941) – One of the main exponents of Russian avant-garde painting. Influenced by Malevich, he also excelled in graphic design.
92. EGON SCHIELE (1890-1918) – Another "died too young" artist, his strong and ruthless portraits influenced the works of later artists, like Lucian freud or Francis Bacon.
93. DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI (1828-1882) – Perhaps the key figure in the pre-Raphaelite movement, Rossetti left the poetry to focus on classic painting with a style that influenced the symbolism.
94. FRANS HALS (c.1580-1666) – One of the most important portraitists ever, his lively brushwork influenced early impressionism.

95. CLAUDE LORRAIN (1600-1682) – His works were a vital influence on many landscape painters for many centuries, both in Europe (Corot, Courbet) and in America (Hudson River School).
96. ROY LICHTENSTEIN (1923-1977) – Along with Andy Warhol, the most famous figure of the American Pop-Art. His works are often related to the style of the comics, though Lichtenstein rejected that idea.
97. GEORGIA O'KEEFE (1887-1986) – A leading figure in the 20th century American Art, O'Keeffe single-handedly redefined the Western American painting.
98. GUSTAVE MOREAU (1826-1898) – One of the key figures of symbolism, introverted and mysterious in life, but very free and colorful in his works.
99. GIORGIO DE CHIRICO (1888-1978) – Considered the father of metaphysical painting and a major influence on the Surrealist movement.
100. FERNAND LÉGER (1881-1955) – At first a cubist, Leger was increasingly attracted to the world of machinery and movement, creating works such as "The Discs" (1918).
101. JEAN-AUGUSTE-DOMINIQUE INGRES (1780-1867) – Ingres was the most prominent disciple of the most famous neoclassicist painter, Jacques Louis David, so he should not be considered an innovator. He was, however, a master of classic portrait.

1.5 ON IMPRESSIONISM – ART MOVEMENT, PAINTERS, PAINTINGS

Finally, I'll bring here from the Wikipedia an entry on Impressionism, my favorite art movement:

Impressionism is a 19th-century art movement that originated with a group of Paris-based artists whose independent exhibitions brought them to prominence during the 1870s and 1880s. Impressionist painting characteristics include relatively small, thin, yet visible brush strokes, open composition, emphasis on accurate depiction of light in its changing qualities (often accentuating the effects of the passage of time), ordinary subject matter, inclusion of movement as a crucial element of human perception and experience, and unusual visual angles. The Impressionists faced harsh opposition from the conventional art community in France. The name of the style derives from the title of a Claude Monet work, Impression, soleil levant (Impression, Sunrise), which provoked the critic Louis Leroy to coin the term in a satirical review published in the Parisian newspaper Le Charivari. The development of Impressionism in the visual arts was soon followed by analogous styles in other media that became known as impressionist music and impressionist literature. Radicals in their time, early Impressionists violated the rules of academic painting. They constructed their pictures from freely brushed colours that took precedence over lines and contours, following the example of painters such as Eugène Delacroix and J. M. W. Turner. They also painted realistic scenes of modern life, and often painted outdoors. Previously, still lifes and portraits as well as landscapes were usually painted in a studio. The Impressionists found that they could capture the momentary and transient effects of sunlight by painting en plein air. They portrayed overall visual effects instead of details, and used short "broken" brush strokes of mixed and pure unmixed colour—not blended smoothly or shaded, as was customary—to achieve an effect of intense colour vibration. Impressionism emerged in France at the same time that a number of other painters, including the Italian artists known as the Macchiaioli, and Winslow Homer in the United States, were also exploring plein-air painting. The Impressionists, however, developed new techniques specific to the style. Encompassing what its adherents argued was a different way of seeing, it is an art of immediacy and movement, of candid poses and compositions, of the play of light expressed in a bright and varied use of colour. The public, at first hostile, gradually came to believe that the Impressionists had captured a fresh and original vision, even if the art critics and art establishment disapproved of the new style. By recreating the sensation in the eye that views the subject, rather than delineating the details of the subject, and by creating a welter of techniques and forms, Impressionism is a precursor of various painting styles, including Neo-Impressionism, Post-Impressionism, Fauvism, and Cubism.

In the middle of the 19th century—a time of change, as Emperor Napoleon III rebuilt Paris and waged war—the Académie des Beaux-Arts dominated French art. The Académie was the preserver of traditional French painting standards of content and style. Historical subjects, religious themes, and portraits were valued; landscape and still life were not. The Académie preferred carefully finished images that looked realistic when examined closely. Paintings in this style were made up of precise brush strokes carefully blended to hide the artist's hand in the work. Colour was restrained and often toned down further by the application of a golden varnish. The Académie had an annual, juried art show, the Salon de Paris, and artists whose work was displayed in the show won prizes, garnered commissions, and enhanced their prestige. The standards of the juries represented the values of the Académie, represented by the works of such artists as Jean-Léon Gérôme and Alexandre Cabanel. In the early 1860s, four young painters—Claude Monet, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Alfred Sisley, and Frédéric Bazille—met while studying under the academic artist Charles Gleyre. They discovered that they shared an interest in painting landscape and contemporary life rather than historical or mythological scenes. Following a practice that had become increasingly popular by mid-century, they often ventured into the countryside together to paint in the open air, but not for the purpose of making sketches to be developed into carefully finished works in the studio, as was the usual custom. By painting in sunlight directly from nature, and making bold use of the vivid synthetic pigments that had become available since the beginning of the century, they began to develop a lighter and brighter manner of painting that extended further the Realism of Gustave Courbet and the Barbizon school. A favourite meeting place for the artists was the Café Guerbois on Avenue de Clichy in Paris, where the discussions were often led by Édouard Manet, whom the younger artists greatly admired. They were soon joined by Camille Pissarro, Paul Cézanne, and Armand Guillaumin.

During the 1860s, the Salon jury routinely rejected about half of the works submitted by Monet and his friends in favour of works by artists faithful to the approved style.^[6] In 1863, the Salon jury rejected Manet's The Luncheon on the Grass (Le déjeuner sur l'herbe) primarily because it depicted a nude woman with two clothed men at a picnic. While the Salon jury routinely accepted nudes in historical and allegorical paintings, they condemned Manet for placing a realistic nude in a contemporary setting. The jury's severely worded rejection of Manet's painting appalled his admirers, and the unusually large number of rejected works that year perturbed many French artists. After Emperor Napoleon III saw the rejected works of 1863, he decreed that the public be allowed to judge the work themselves, and the Salon des Refusés (Salon of the Refused) was organized. While many viewers came only to laugh, the Salon des Refusés drew attention to the existence of a new tendency in art and attracted more visitors than the regular Salon. Artists' petitions requesting a new Salon des Refusés in 1867, and again in 1872, were denied. In December 1873, Monet, Renoir, Pissarro, Sisley, Cézanne, Berthe Morisot, Edgar Degas and several other artists founded the Société Anonyme Coopérative des Artistes Peintres, Sculpteurs, Graveurs ("Cooperative and Anonymous Association of Painters, Sculptors, and Engravers") to exhibit their artworks independently. Members of the association were expected to forswear participation in the Salon. The organizers invited a number of other progressive artists to join them in their inaugural exhibition, including the older Eugène Boudin, whose example had first persuaded Monet to adopt plein air painting years before. Another painter who greatly influenced Monet and his friends, Johan Jongkind, declined to participate, as did Édouard Manet. In total, thirty artists participated in their first exhibition, held in April 1874 at the studio of the photographer Nadar.

The critical response was mixed. Monet and Cézanne received the harshest attacks. Critic and humorist Louis Leroy wrote a scathing review in the newspaper Le Charivari in which, making wordplay with the title of Claude Monet's Impression, Sunrise (Impression, soleil levant), he gave the artists the name by which they became known. Derisively titling his article The Exhibition of the Impressionists, Leroy declared that Monet's painting was at most, a sketch, and could hardly be termed a finished work. He wrote, in the form of a dialog between viewers, Impression—I was certain of it. I was just telling myself that, since I was impressed, there had to be some impression in it ... and what freedom, what ease of workmanship! Wallpaper in its embryonic state is more finished than that seascape. The term Impressionist quickly gained favour with the public. It was also accepted by the artists themselves, even though they were a diverse group in style and temperament, unified primarily by their spirit of independence and rebellion. They exhibited together—albeit with shifting membership—eight times between 1874 and 1886. The Impressionists' style, with its loose, spontaneous brushstrokes, would soon become synonymous with modern life. Monet, Sisley, Morisot, and Pissarro may be considered the "purest" Impressionists, in their consistent pursuit of an art of spontaneity, sunlight, and colour. Degas rejected much of this, as he believed in the primacy of drawing over colour and belittled the practice of painting outdoors. Renoir turned away from Impressionism for a time during the 1880s, and never entirely regained his commitment to its ideas. Édouard Manet, although regarded by the Impressionists as their leader, never abandoned his liberal use of black as a colour, and never participated in the Impressionist exhibitions. He continued to submit his works to the Salon, where his painting Spanish Singer had won a 2nd class medal in 1861, and he urged the others to do likewise, arguing that "the Salon is the real field of battle" where a reputation could be made.

Among the artists of the core group (minus Bazille, who had died in the Franco-Prussian War in 1870), defections occurred as Cézanne, followed later by Renoir, Sisley, and Monet, abstained from the group exhibitions so they could submit their works to the Salon. Disagreements arose from issues such as Guillaumin's membership in the group, championed by Pissarro and Cézanne against opposition from Monet and Degas, who thought him unworthy. Degas invited Mary Cassatt to display her work in the 1879 exhibition, but also insisted on the inclusion of Jean-François Raffaëlli, Ludovic Lepic, and other realists who did not represent Impressionist practices, causing Monet in 1880 to accuse the Impressionists of "opening doors to first-come daubers". The group divided over invitations to Paul Signac and Georges Seurat to exhibit with them in 1886. Pissarro was the only artist to show at all eight Impressionist exhibitions. The individual artists achieved few financial rewards from the Impressionist exhibitions, but their art gradually won a degree of public acceptance and support. Their dealer, Durand-Ruel, played a major role in this as he kept their work before the public and arranged shows for them in London and New York. Although Sisley died in poverty in 1899, Renoir had a great Salon success in 1879. Monet became secure financially during the early 1880s and so did Pissarro by the early 1890s. By this time the methods of Impressionist painting, in a diluted form, had become commonplace in Salon art. French painters who prepared the way for Impressionism include the Romantic colourist Eugène Delacroix, the leader of the realists Gustave Courbet, and painters of the Barbizon school such as Théodore Rousseau. The Impressionists learned much from the work of Jean-Baptiste-Camille Corot and Eugène Boudin, who painted from nature in a direct and spontaneous style that prefigured Impressionism, and who befriended and advised the younger artists. A number of identifiable techniques and working habits contributed to the innovative style of the Impressionists. Although these methods had been used by previous artists—and are often conspicuous in the work of artists such as Frans Hals, Diego Velázquez, Peter Paul Rubens, John Constable, and J. M. W. Turner—the Impressionists were the first to use them all together, and with such consistency. These techniques include:

- Short, thick strokes of paint quickly capture the essence of the subject, rather than its details. The paint is often applied impasto.
- Colours are applied side-by-side with as little mixing as possible, a technique that exploits the principle of simultaneous contrast to make the colour appear more vivid to the viewer.
- Grays and dark tones are produced by mixing complementary colours. Pure impressionism avoids the use of black paint.
- Wet paint is placed into wet paint without waiting for successive applications to dry, producing softer edges and intermingling of colour.
- Impressionist paintings do not exploit the transparency of thin paint films (glazes), which earlier artists manipulated carefully to produce effects. The impressionist painting surface is typically opaque.
- The paint is applied to a white or light-coloured ground. Previously, painters often used dark grey or strongly coloured grounds.
- The play of natural light is emphasized. Close attention is paid to the reflection of colours from object to object. Painters often worked in the evening to produce effets de soir—the shadowy effects of evening or twilight.
- In paintings made en plein air (outdoors), shadows are boldly painted with the blue of the sky as it is reflected onto surfaces, giving a sense of freshness previously not represented in painting. (Blue shadows on snow inspired the technique.)

New technology played a role in the development of the style. Impressionists took advantage of the mid-century introduction of premixed paints in tin tubes (resembling modern toothpaste tubes), which allowed artists to work more spontaneously, both outdoors and indoors. Previously, painters made their own paints individually, by grinding and mixing dry pigment powders with linseed oil, which were then stored in animal bladders. Many vivid synthetic pigments became commercially available to artists for the first time during the 19th century. These included cobalt blue, viridian, cadmium yellow, and synthetic ultramarine blue, all of which were in use by the 1840s, before Impressionism. The Impressionists' manner of painting made bold use of these pigments, and of even newer colours such as cerulean blue, which became commercially available to artists in the 1860s. The Impressionists' progress toward a brighter style of painting was gradual. During the 1860s, Monet and Renoir sometimes painted on canvases prepared with the traditional red-brown or grey ground. By the 1870s, Monet, Renoir, and Pissarro usually chose to paint on grounds of a lighter grey or beige colour, which functioned as a middle tone in the finished painting. By the 1880s, some of the Impressionists had come to prefer white or slightly off-white grounds, and no longer allowed the ground colour a significant role in the finished painting.

Prior to the Impressionists, other painters, notably such 17th-century Dutch painters as Jan Steen, had emphasized common subjects, but their methods of composition were traditional. They arranged their compositions so that the main subject commanded the viewer's attention. The Impressionists relaxed the boundary between subject and background so that the effect of an Impressionist painting often resembles a snapshot, a part of a larger reality captured as if by chance. Photography was gaining popularity, and as cameras became more portable, photographs became more candid. Photography inspired Impressionists to represent momentary action, not only in the fleeting lights of a landscape, but in the day-to-day lives of people. The development of Impressionism can be considered partly as a reaction by artists to the challenge presented by photography, which seemed to devalue the artist's skill in reproducing reality. Both portrait and landscape paintings were deemed somewhat deficient and lacking in truth as photography "produced lifelike images much more efficiently and reliably". In spite of this, photography actually inspired artists to pursue other means of creative expression, and rather than compete with photography to emulate reality, artists focused "on the one thing they could inevitably do better than the photograph—by further developing into an art form its very subjectivity in the conception of the image, the very subjectivity that photography eliminated". The Impressionists sought to express their perceptions of nature, rather than create exact representations. This allowed artists to depict subjectively what they saw with their "tacit imperatives of taste and conscience". Photography encouraged painters to exploit aspects of the painting medium, like colour, which photography then lacked: "The Impressionists were the first to consciously offer a subjective alternative to the photograph". Another major influence was Japanese ukiyo-e art prints (Japonism). The art of these prints contributed significantly to the "snapshot" angles and unconventional compositions that became characteristic of Impressionism. An example is Monet's Jardin à Sainte-Adresse, 1867, with its bold blocks of colour and composition on a strong diagonal slant showing the influence of Japanese prints. Edgar Degas was both an avid photographer and a collector of Japanese prints. His The Dance Class (La classe de danse) of 1874 shows both influences in its asymmetrical composition. The dancers are seemingly caught off guard in various awkward poses, leaving an expanse of empty floor space in the lower right quadrant. He also captured his dancers in sculpture, such as the Little Dancer of Fourteen Years.

The central figures in the development of Impressionism in France, listed alphabetically, were:

- Frédéric Bazille (posthumously participated in Impressionist exhibitions) (1841–1870)
- Gustave Caillebotte (who joined forces with them in the mid-1870s) (1848–1894)
- Mary Cassatt (American-born, she lived in Paris and participated in four Impressionist exhibitions) (1844–1926)
- Paul Cézanne (although he later broke away from the Impressionists) (1839–1906)
- Edgar Degas (who despised the term Impressionist) (1834–1917)
- Armand Guillaumin (1841–1927)
- Édouard Manet (who didn't participate in any Impressionist exhibitions) (1832–1883)
- Claude Monet (the most prolific of the Impressionists and the one who embodies their aesthetic most obviously) (1840–1926)
- Berthe Morisot (1841–1895)
- Camille Pissarro (1830–1903)
- Pierre-Auguste Renoir (1841–1919)
- Alfred Sisley (1839–1899)

2. CINEMA & FILMS: GENERAL & BUSINESS ETHICS IN CORY'S BOOKS & COURSES, FESTIVAL FILMS, FRENCH NEW WAVE, US NEW HOLLYWOOD, BEST FILMS EVER, DIRECTORS, SCRIPTWRITERS, ACTORS, ACTRESSES, CORY'S LIST OF BEST FILMS

The reader can find details on the books, actors, directors, scriptwriters, films and festivals on Wikipedia, Encyclopaedias, Amazon, Local Videos & Cory's websites, Films/Festivals/Actors/Directors/Scriptwriters websites

Reading BOOKS - The Jews in American Cinema, The Chronicle of the Movies, Dictionnaire du cinema, The international Encyclopedia of Film, Movie Directors' Story, Hollywood Musicals, Ginger Rogers, Greta Garbo, Marlon Brando, Meryl Streep, James Dean, Great Lovers of the Movies, 500 Great Films, The Illustrated Who's Who of the Cinema, An Anthology of the Cinema edited by Helga Keller. (see also biographies of great actors, directors, scenarists, and Internet Websites as IMDb, the Haifa Film Festival, Rotten Tomatoes, etc.)

I have read dozens of books on cinema, have filmed hundreds of hours on travel around the globe and of our family in Israel, some of the films have an artistic value. Many videos were filmed on Cory's lectures and family, and are on Cory's website, including Cory's films and audios on the anniversaries. I attend every year the Haifa Film Festival, seeing there 30 to 50+ films in the ten days of the festival, and after seeing some of the other films after the festivals, it amounts to about 70 festival films every year. I give reviews on the films to my friends and grades them. On top of that, I see every year at least 150 more films from film rental, on the Internet if it is free as I don't want to be charged on the Internet, at cinemas in Haifa, until a year ago also on the Haifa cinematheque, and on television, if I stay at home – a film or two. The most important characteristic of the films at the Haifa Film Festival, besides being very artistic in most of the cases, is the cosmopolitan approach of the films from about 25 countries at each festival, for example in 2012: 23 Countries: France – 8, US – 6, UK – 4, Italy – 4, Germany – 3, Russia – 3, Israel – 3, Australia – 2, South Korea – 2, Belgium – 2, Hungary – 2, Uruguay - 2, Argentina, Romania, Iran, Netherlands, Indonesia, UK (India), Brazil, Japan, China, Greece, Austria – 1 each. It is true that I like most European/American movies, but I see and am enthralled also from films coming from South Korea, Argentina, Australia, Indonesia, India, Brazil, Japan, China, etc. The criterion for appreciating the films is excellence, although from time to time, I enjoy seeing kitsch films and light comedies, coming from Europe, India, US, Italy, or elsewhere. I read and see film reviews, and I was also for a few years a director on the Board of Directors of the Haifa Film Festival. I watch videos of films and documentaries and have a collection of hundreds of films.

 Total – 414, Average of 52 films – 7.96.

It is impossible to mention all the films that I have seen as they amount to a few thousands. I have mentioned above a list of 52 films seen at the Haifa Film Festival in 2012, but similar lists of films seen at the Haifa Film Festival in other years can be seen on my website, amounting to a few hundreds of films. A few hundreds of films with Business Ethics and Social Justice content in my library are detailed in this chapter. On top of that I have in my video library hundreds of films, plays, TV, most of them excellent films that I have recorded from the TV or bought. Finally, I have chosen to bring here a list of 240+ films that I have seen in my youth, when I was 12-17.5 in 1956-1961 and that have received the highest grades (8-10) in my diary, but the full list in my diary comprises more than a thousand films seen during those years, with details on the films. Altogether, I have lists of more than a thousand films, most of them classic movies. Before bringing the list of the best films that I have seen in 1956-1961 I'll mention the binges, my goofy judgements from those days that later on when my taste and judgement of films became more refined, I have changed completely my perspective and thought that they are the best films. So, which films received average of very low grades while they deserved the highest grades in retrospective? Modern Times, 7 brides to 7 brothers, To catch a thief, The court jester, Daddy long legs, Three men in a boat, Richard III, A farewell to arms, Les sorcieres de Salem, Julius Caesar, La violetera, Ivan the Terrible, Vertigo, Orfeu Negro, Hiroshima mon amour, Le joueur, La dolce vita, Napoleon, A bout de souffle, A lesson in love, The Virgin Spring, Les 400 coups. I have seen the film "I'll cry tomorrow" mentioned in this book in context of remembrance on Monday 17/3/1958 and I thought it was under average, as stated in my diary. The worst film that I saw in this period (with a grade of 0) was The Millionairess with Vittorio de Sica, Sophia Loren, and Peter Sellers. In general I was very critical in my judgements and less than a quarter of the total films were good, very good and excellent. Today, when I see films at the Film Festivals, most of them are good to excellent, which proves that either my taste has improved, or that in my old age I've become less critical, or that films participating in festivals are by definition better.

2.2 THE BEST FILMS SEEN IN MY YOUTH IN 1956-1961

I saw most of the films in 1956-1961 with friends, but many on my own as I used to see 3-4 films a week and nobody went to so many films. 2.3 LISTS OF FILMS IN CORY'S BUSINESS ETHICS COURSES AND BOOKS

I have probably the best and largest collection of films and plays on business ethics, social responsibility, social and economic justice (see herebelow list of films and in Theater – list of plays). I bought and collected the videos for my pleasure and later on for my courses, which were based mainly on discussing the dilemmas of the protagonists of the films and plays, by the students who personified the film's play's heroes, and ensuing group dynamics of the class. This was the best way with the best results for teaching business ethics, and I was chosen the Best Lecturer of the University of Haifa in Israel, scoring the highest grade – 5 out of 5. The films are international and comprise ethical dilemmas in the US, Scandinavia, France, India, Africa, the Far East, Israel, Latin America, Switzerland, etc. Some of us prefer to ignore unethical conduct, others prefer to join the wrongdoers in the plunder, but I have preferred to teach and write books on business ethics, in an unorthodox way which may be the most orthodox after all, as it is based on religion and philosophy but is translated to modern methods with cases, films and plays.

The students were enthusiastic, personifying the roles of the protagonists - classical and modern heroes of masterpieces - such as: All My Sons, The Merchant of Venice, Rhinoceros, The Visit, The Great Gatsby, Jean de Florette, An Enemy of the People, as well as documentaries or films based on true events such as: Wall Street, Erin Brockovich, The Insider, Rogue Trader, Enron - The Crooked E, Barbarians at the Gate, Damaged Care, and so on. Furthermore, the students understood far better ethical dilemmas while personifying Gordon Gekko, Erin Brockovich, Dr. Jeffrey Wigand, Dr. Thomas Stockman, Shylock, Karla Zachanassian, Beranger, Ken Lay, Cesar Soubeyran, Gatsby, Nick Leeson, Ross Johnson or Linda Peeno, than by studying the classical theories on Ethics by Aristotle, Bentham & Kant, as most of the business ethics professors teach.

Cory's book "Business Ethics for a Sustainable Society" comprises an analysis of 50 films, documentaries, novels and plays, more than half of them based on famous cases, such as the Ford Pinto, Barings Bank, RJR Nabisco, Dr. Jeffrey Wigand and the Tobacco Industry, Ben & Jerry's, McLibel, Linda Peeno and Medicare, Enron, Woburn contamination case, Erin Brockovich, Karen Silkwood, models of multinationals, documentaries on sustainability, etc.

The first part "Leadership, Integrity and Whistleblowers" comprises cases on ethical leadership, management and whistleblowers in the various departments of the organization and professional integrity, and the analysis of plays as "All My Sons", "Death of a Salesman", "An Enemy of the People", "Glengarry Glen Ross" and films as "Executive Suite", "F.L.S.T." and Ben & Jerry's model of leadership. The second part "Ethics in Corporate Governance, the Stock Exchange and Banking" comprises an analysis of films - Wall Street on the scandals of the eighties, Rogue Trader on the collapse of Barings Bank, Barbarians at the Gate on leverage buyouts and RJR Nabisco, hostile takeovers, wrongdoing to minority shareholders, etc. The third part "Ethics, Corruption, Wrongdoing and Stakeholders" examines the motives of ethical and unethical conduct, of corruption and wrongdoing, with an analysis of films on the victims of corruption - Jean de Florette, corruption in Medicare - Damaged Care, corruption in State administration - Marie: a True Story, wrongdoing of stakeholders in mega corporations - Class Action and the Ford Pinto case, corruption and bribery in government – Revizor, and The Threepenny Opera on business, government & crime. All of that with an excellent mix of classical and modern works.

The fourth part "Trust, Transparency and Fairness" comprises cases analyses of films on Enron, transparency in the media - The Insider - about Dr. Jeffrey Wigand and the tobacco industry, law, fairness and ethics - The Merchant of Venice, The Great Gatsby on wealth, fairness and ethics, Emile Zola \(L'Argent\) the ultimate ethicist, and others. The fifth part "Sustainability, Social Responsibility and Activism" comprises an analysis of films on ethical activism - Erin Brockovich, conformism in society - Rhinoceros, CSR in community - It's a Wonderful Life, Ecology - A Civil Action, education and society - Topaze, sustainability documentaries such as Al Gore's An Inconvenient Truth, Who Killed the Electric Car?, biodynamic farming, genetically engineered food, Paul Hawken, and social responsibility of modern tycoons - Warren Buffett. The sixth part "International Business Ethics and Globalization" comprises an analysis of films such as The Visit in its European and African versions, labor rights in the global context - The Take, ethical dilemmas of multinationals and stakeholders – McDonald's and McLibel, globalization models of Nike and other multinationals and Michael Moore's film The Big One.

2.4 LA NOUVELLE VAGUE/THE NEW WAVE FRENCH FILMS

La nouvelle vague/The New Wave is my youth, it is a group of French filmmakers of the late 1950s and 1960s, when I started to be quite an expert in films and developed my artistic taste in films. In my early teens I developed my taste in literature, in my mid teens when I moved to Haifa I developed my taste in films seeing excellent films three or four times a week. But actually this was the number of films I saw since age 0 in Cairo, Egypt, as my parents took me in the weekends (there were no baby sitters in those times) to see two films on one ticket on Saturday (westerns/comedies/thrillers) and one on Sunday (romance, musicals, masterpieces). When I came at the age of 9 to Israel I continued to see 3 or 4 films a week until the age of 15 (1959) when I moved to Haifa, and my taste evolved accordingly. When I came at the age of 17 to Jerusalem to study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, I couldn't see so many films but after I started to hear classical music in Haifa and I read at the University's library hundreds of plays my taste evolved in those two fields, although I did not have money to see many plays and concerts, unless there were reduced tickets for students. I started to see much more plays and concerts (even operas) at reduced price tickets to officers when I moved to Tel Aviv at the age of 20, I could also see many films as well. In the years 1967-1968 when I studied at Insead I saw in Fontainebleau and Paris many plays and films, especially at the Comedie Francaise – the best theater group in the world, where there were tickets at reduced prices. After I started to work at the age of 24 and married at the age of 25 I continued to see films, plays and concerts, first in Tel Aviv and Haifa where I lived and then all over the world when I started to travel on business and pleasure abroad. So, the New Wave is the story of my youth, I enjoyed most their filmmakers, as well as other European filmmakers – Bergman, Antonioni, Fellini, and British filmmakers.

The New Wave (French: La Nouvelle Vague) is a blanket term coined by critics for a group of French filmmakers of the late 1950s and 1960s. Although never a formally organized movement, the New Wave filmmakers were linked by their self-conscious rejection of the literary period pieces being made in France and written by novelists, along with their spirit of youthful iconoclasm, the desire to shoot more current social issues on location, and their intention of experimenting with the film form. "New Wave" is an example of European art cinema. Many also engaged in their work with the social and political upheavals of the era, making their radical experiments with editing, visual style and narrative part of a general break with the conservative paradigm. Using portable equipment and requiring little or no set up time, the New Wave way of filmmaking presented a documentary style. The films exhibited direct sounds on film stock that required less light. Filming techniques included fragmented, discontinuous editing, and long takes. The combination of objective realism, subjective realism, and authorial commentary created a narrative ambiguity in the sense that questions that arise in a film are not answered in the end. This is exactly what I expected from films – as opposed to the Hollywood routine where the bad ones lose, the good ones win, everything is expected, no surprises, no ambiguity, no objective and subjective realism actually no realism at all, as if it happened in another planet.

The auteur theory holds that the director is the "author" of his movies, with a personal signature visible from film to film. They praised movies by Jean Renoir and Jean Vigo, and made then-radical cases for the artistic distinction and greatness of Hollywood studio directors such as Orson Welles, John Ford, Alfred Hitchcock and Nicholas Ray. The beginning of the New Wave was to some extent an exercise by the Cahiers writers in applying this philosophy to the world by directing movies themselves. Apart from the role that films by Jean Rouch have played in the movement, Chabrol's Le Beau Serge (1958) is traditionally (but debatably) credited as the first New Wave feature. Truffaut, with The 400 Blows (1959) and Godard, with Breathless (1960) had unexpected international successes, both critical and financial, that turned the world's attention to the activities of the New Wave and enabled the movement to flourish. Part of their technique was to portray characters not readily labeled as protagonists in the classic sense of audience identification. We can say that today most of the good directors are New Wave directors as the French nouvelle vague showed us the path to a new kind of filmmaking, which was adopted by the Spanish, the Italians (who were also precursors of this trend with the French) the British and the Americans. Three new waves converged – the French with the New Wave, the Italians with Fellini and Antonioni, and Ingmar Bergman who was a category of his own.

The auteurs of this era owe their popularity to the support they received with their youthful audience. Most of these directors were born in the 1930s and grew up in Paris, relating to how their viewers might be experiencing life. With high concentration in fashion, urban professional life, and all-night parties, the life of France's youth was being exquisitely captured. The French New Wave was popular roughly between 1958 and 1964, although New Wave work existed as late as 1973. The socio-economic forces at play shortly after World War II strongly influenced the movement. Politically and financially drained, France tended to fall back on the old popular pre-war traditions. One such tradition was straight narrative cinema, specifically classical French film. The movement has its roots in rebellion against the reliance on past forms (often adapted from traditional novelistic structures), criticizing in particular the way these forms could force the audience to submit to a dictatorial plot-line. They were especially against the French "cinema of quality", the type of high-minded, literary period films held in esteem at French film festivals, often regarded as "untouchable" by criticism.

New Wave critics and directors studied the work of western classics and applied new avant garde stylistic direction. The low-budget approach helped filmmakers get at the essential art form and find what was, to them, a much more comfortable and contemporary form of production. Charlie Chaplin, Alfred Hitchcock, Orson Welles, Howard Hawks, John Ford, and many other forward-thinking film directors were held up in admiration while standard Hollywood films bound by traditional narrative flow were strongly criticized. French New Wave might be influenced by Italian Neorealism^[1] and classical Hollywood cinema. In a 1961 interview, Truffaut said that "the 'New Wave' is neither a movement, nor a school, nor a group, it's a quality" and in December 1962 published a list of 162 film directors who had made their feature film debut since 1959. Many of these directors, such as Edmond Agabra and Henri Zaphiratos, were not as successful or enduring as the well-known members of the New Wave and today would not be considered part of it. Shortly after Truffaut's published list appeared, Godard publicly declared that the New Wave was more exclusive and included only Truffaut, Chabrol, Rivette, Rohmer and himself, stating that "Cahiers was the nucleus" of the movement. Godard also acknowledged filmmakers such as Resnais, Astruc, Varda and Demy as esteemed contemporaries, but said that they represented "their own fund of culture" and were separate from the New Wave. Many of the directors associated with the New Wave continued and continue to make films into the 21st century. It is amazing how despite their age they continued to be as modern as in the sixties.

The movies featured unprecedented methods of expression, such as long tracking shots (like the famous traffic jam sequence in Godard's 1967 film Week End). These movies featured existential themes, such as stressing the individual and the acceptance of the absurdity of human existence. Filled with irony and sarcasm, the films also tend to reference other films. Many of the French New Wave films were produced on tight budgets; often shot in a friend's apartment or yard, using the director's friends as the cast and crew. Directors were also forced to improvise with equipment (for example, using a shopping cart for tracking shots). The cost of film was also a major concern; thus, efforts to save film turned into stylistic innovations. For example, in Jean-Luc Godard's Breathless \(À bout de souffle\), after being told the film was too long and he must cut it down to one hour and a half he decided (on the suggestion of Jean-Pierre Melville) to remove several scenes from the feature using jump cuts, as they were filmed in one long take. Parts that did not work were simply cut from the middle of the take, a practical decision and also a purposeful stylistic one. Those jump cuts made the whole flavor of the film, made it modern.

The cinematic stylings of French New Wave brought a fresh look to cinema with improvised dialogue, rapid changes of scene, and shots that broke the common 180° axis of camera movement. In many films of the French New Wave, the camera was used not to mesmerize the audience with elaborate narrative and illusory images, but rather to play with audience expectations. Godard was arguably the movement's most influential figure; his method of filmmaking, often used to shock and awe audiences out of passivity, was abnormally bold and direct. As a result of his techniques, he is an early example of a director who was accused of having contempt for his audience (something experimental filmmakers in the decades ahead, like Stanley Kubrick and David Lynch, would also be charged with). His stylistic approach can be seen as a desperate struggle against the mainstream cinema of the time, or a degrading attack on the viewer's supposed naivety. Either way, the challenging awareness represented by this movement remains in cinema today. Effects that now seem either trite or commonplace, such as a character stepping out of their role in order to address the audience directly, were radically innovative at the time. Woody Allen adopted this style, and so many other important directors.

Classic French cinema adhered to the principles of strong narrative, creating what Godard described as an oppressive and deterministic aesthetic of plot. In contrast, New Wave filmmakers made no attempts to suspend the viewer's disbelief; in fact, they took steps to constantly remind the viewer that a film is just a sequence of moving images, no matter how clever the use of light and shadow. The result is a set of oddly disjointed scenes without attempt at unity; or an actor whose character changes from one scene to the next; or sets in which onlookers accidentally make their way onto camera along with extras, who in fact were hired to do just the same. At the heart of New Wave technique is the issue of money and production value. In the context of social and economic troubles of a post-World War II France, filmmakers sought low-budget alternatives to the usual production methods, and were inspired by the generation of Italian Neorealists before them. Half necessity and half vision, New Wave directors used all that they had available to channel their artistic visions directly to the theatre. Finally, the French New Wave, as the European modern Cinema, is focused on the technique as style itself. A French New Wave film-maker is first of all an author who shows in its film his own eye on the world.

On the other hand the film as the object of knowledge challenges the usual transitivity on which all the other cinema was based, "undoing its cornerstones: space and time continuity, narrative and grammatical logics, the self-evidence of the represented worlds." In this way the film-maker passes "the essay attitude, thinking – in a novelist way – on his own way to do essays."

The Left Bank, or Rive Gauche, group is a contingent of filmmakers associated with the French New Wave, first identified as such by Richard Roud. The corresponding "right bank" group is constituted of the more famous and financially successful New Wave directors associated with Cahiers du cinéma (Claude Chabrol, François Truffaut, and Jean-Luc Godard). Unlike the Cahiers these directors were older and less movie-crazed. They tended to see cinema akin to other arts, such as literature. However they were similar to the New Wave directors in that they practiced cinematic modernism. Their emergence also came in the 1950s and they also benefited from the youthful audience. The two groups, however, were not in opposition; Cahiers du cinéma advocated Left Bank cinema. Left Bank directors include Chris Marker, Alain Resnais, and Agnès Varda. Roud described a distinctive "fondness for a kind of Bohemian life and an impatience with the conformity of the Right Bank, a high degree of involvement in literature and the plastic arts, and a consequent interest in experimental filmmaking", as well as an identification with the political left. The filmmakers tended to collaborate with one another. Jean-Pierre Melville, Alain Robbe-Grillet, and Marguerite Duras are also associated with the group. The nouveau roman movement in literature was also a strong element of the Left Bank style, with authors contributing to many of the films. Left Bank films include La Pointe Courte, Hiroshima mon amour, La jetée, Last Year at Marienbad, and Trans-Europ-Express.

The New Wave were influenced by Italian Neorealism, Film noir, classical Hollywood cinema (not so much), poetic realism, Auteur theory, Parisian cinophile culture, existentialism, Alfred Hitchcock. They influenced L.A. Rebellion, New Hollywood, New German Cinema, Cinema Novo. The most important influence was on New Hollywood: New Hollywood, sometimes referred to as the "American New Wave", refers to a periodization in American film history from the mid 1960s (Bonnie and Clyde, The Graduate) to the early 1980s (Heaven's Gate, One from the Heart) when a new generation of young filmmakers came to prominence in United States, influencing the types of films produced, their production and marketing, and the way major studios approached film-making. In New Hollywood films, the film director, rather than the studio, took on a key authorial role. "New Hollywood" usually refers to a period of film-making rather than a style of film-making, though it can be referred to as a movement. The films made in this era are stylistically characterized in that their narrative often strongly deviated from classical norms. After the demise of the studio system and the rise of television, the artistic quality of films and their commercial success was diminished. The "New Hollywood" period, spanning the mid-60s and early 80s, was a period of artistic and commercial revival. Though they largely continued to follow classical norms, the films made in this period are characterized in that their narrative logic and subject matter were often unconventional. The major figures of the New Hollywood are: Woody Allen, Robert Altman, Hal Ashby, Carroll Ballard, Warren Beatty, Robert Benton, Peter Bogdanovich, John Boorman, John Carpenter, Michael Cimino, Francis Ford Coppola, Brian De Palma, Clint Eastwood, Miloš Forman, Bob Fosse, William Friedkin, George Roy Hill, Dennis Hopper, John Huston, Norman Jewison, Philip Kaufman, Stanley Kubrick, Richard Lester, George Lucas, Sidney Lumet, Terrence Malick, John Milius, Paul Newman, Mike Nichols, Alan J. Pakula, Sam Peckinpah, Arthur Penn, Roman Polanski, Sydney Pollack, Bob Rafelson, John Schlesinger, Paul Schrader, Martin Scorsese, Ridley Scott, Don Siegel, Steven Spielberg, Robert Towne. In fact the best of the best American directors.

2.6 CORY'S LISTS OF THE BEST AND THE BEST OF THE BEST FILMS EVER MADE

Finally, I would like to present the Cory's List of the Greatest Movies of All Time, which is based on the films above with additional films that I enjoyed most, including Israeli films. There may be many excellent films that I have omitted but as I haven't seen them I cannot include them in my list which comprises only the films I liked best. Most of the films are masterpieces, but many films are films that I have enjoyed watching although they are not so artistic, films that have influenced my life, films that have assisted me in filmotherapy when I was unhappy and lonely. The list is given in alphabetical order without ranking, as all the films are quite excellent and do not need additional ranking, but nevertheless I have put in bold the best of the best – the greatest movies, at least as far as I can judge in retrospective. My book deals on cosmopolitan culture, and as such my list of the best films is cosmopolitan – more than any other list that I have found on the Internet. My list is quite unique, as it comprises films from all over the world and is not focused primarily on American films, British films or French films in the other lists, which are however the three best and most artistic film industries in the world. The list includes also the Italian, Japanese, Spanish, German, Russian, Swedish masterpieces by the best directors, but includes also films from dozens of other countries which are not comprised in most of the other lists – Latin American films mainly from Argentina, Mexico and Brazil, other European films mainly from the Czech Republic, Poland and Denmark, Asian films mainly from China, South Korea and India, and also Israeli films, Arabic films, Australian films, Canadian films, African films, etc. I have seen in cinematheques, film festivals and on TV hundreds of films from countries which are not in any lists, some of them are not artistic, some of them are excellent but I have forgotten their names as it is quite difficult to remember the names of Arabic films, Korean films, Serbian films, Romanian films, Hungarian films, Indian films, and so on.

We were supposed to meet my father at the entrance of a cinema but he didn't show up. There were no mobile phones and we couldn't check what happened. After an hour or so we were about to return home very anxious on what had happened to my father who was very punctual and it was the first time that he didn't show up. Just at this moment my father arrived and apparently there was a mix up with the name of the cinema. It was too late to go to most of the movies and there was only one cinema where we could go and they showed Androcles and the Lion. I enjoyed so much this comedy, based on George Bernard Shaw's play, as it was in sharp contrast to the anxiety of "losing" our father. Anna Karenina (1935) – US, Annie Get Your Gun (1950) - US, the musical I love most – I have seen the film several times and I saw the musical on stage in New York and Los Angeles when I crossed by mistake at night a neighborhood known for its riots, Annie Hall (1977) – US, the best film by Woody Allen, Anything Goes (1956) US, one of the best musicals with famous songs by Cole Porter, in a leading role in the film was the French dancer Zizi Jeanmaire, who sat on my knees at her performance in Paris while she was singing "Je cherche un millionnaire/I am looking for a millionaire", she asked me if I was a millionaire because I was dressed like one, and she was very disappointed when I answered her "No!" D - Dahab (1953) Egypt, I remember very well seeing this musical melodrama (link to the film in Arabic – 1 hour and 56 minutes) in 1953 in an open-air cinema of Cairo just before leaving the country. Dahab means gold in Arabic and in Hebrew (zahav) and is also the name of a small touristic site in Sinai by the Gulf of Aqaba, known also for the terrorist bombings in 2006 which killed and wounded Egyptians and tourists including Israelis and Europeans. But in the film I remember a young girl of my age Fayrouz the Egyptian Shirley Temple with a touch of Chaplin's The Kid and Al Jolson's The Jazz Singer. Fayrouz was actually Armenian born as Perouz Artin Kalfayan. Egypt was a true cosmopolitan society and even well-known actresses in Arabic films as Fairouz and Leila Mourad (who was Jewish) were not Arabs. Feyrouz/Fayrouz was born in Cairo on 15 March 1943 a year before me and when she made this film she was ten years old and I was 9. The Europeans "snobs" who were not integrated in the Egyptian society (except a small minority as the actresses and even politicians) did not go to Arabic films and did not speak Arabic, as French was the cultural language of the Europeans and English was the business language, while every nationality kept also its mother tongue – Italian, Greek, Armenian, Yiddish, Ladino, etc. Only when there were exceptional films which were a sensation as Dahab the Arabic films were screened at the European cinemas, as in the case of Dahab. Fayrouz was really a fantastic child actress who made her debut at the age of 7 in 1950 and retired at the age of 16 in 1959, marrying later an Egyptian actor. She sang and danced with a rare talent, the other actors were Magda and Ismail Yassin, as well as Anwar Wagdi who was also the film director and producer. Fayrouz's biggest role was in Dahab and she was sponsored by Wagdi in her short career. So, we have in a nutshell all my Egyptian experience in this story, even the terrorist epilogue in Dahab, while I wrote also extensively about the prologue - the riots of January 1952 burning the European Cairo including hotels and cinemas, killing and wounding hundreds of Europeans and Arabs, and almost killing my family. Museum in Haifa where my son Joseph Cory, PhD in Architecture, exhibited his works on Sustainable Architecture. I know very well the actress Hanna Laslo who received the best actress award at the 2005 Cannes Film Festival for her role in this film. Laslo also contributed a clip to the surprise party of Ruthy my wife in 1992. Gitai has received many prizes and divides his time today between Haifa and Paris - to this we say in Yiddish – auf mir gesugt/I wish it for myself, as I have two loves: Haifa my residence town and Paris the most beautiful and cultural city in the world, the center of the world, The French Connection (1971) - US, Frida (2002) – US, From Here to Eternity (1953) - US, Funny Face (1957) – US, Funny Girl (1968) – US.

Grace Kelly, and of course the music by Cole Porter played by Sachmo, and also the previous film based on the same play The Philadelphia Story (1940) with other excellent actors - Cary Grant, Katharine Hepburn, and my beloved actor James Stewart, Hiroshima mon amour/Hiroshima my love (1959) - France, His Girl Friday (1940) - US, The Homecoming (1973) - UK, Hotel Terminus: Klaus Barbie sa vie et son temps/Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie (1988) - France, The Hours (2002) - UK, an excellent film with excellent actors about an excellent author Virginia Woolf, House of Flying Daggers (2004) - China, The House on Garibaldi Street (1979) - US, How Green Was My Valley (1941) - US, Huckleberry Finn (1974, 1931, 1960, 1993) - US, Huis-Clos/No Exit (1954) - France, The Hurt Locker (2008) - US, The Hustler (1961) - US, Hyenas/The Visit (1992) - Senegal, this African film was far better than the American film The Visit, much more authentic and true to the Swiss play. My students also were fascinated by this extraordinary film and preferred this version.

I - Ieri Oggi Domani/Yesterday Today and Tomorrow (1963) - Italy, If I Want to Whistle I Whistle (2010) - Romania, Il capitale umano/Human Capital (2013) - Italy, Il Decameron (1971) - Italy, Il deserto rosso/Red Desert (1964) - Italy, Il gattopardo/The Leopard (1963) - Italy, Il giardino dei Finzi-Contini/The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (1970) - Italy, Il Grido/The Cry (1957) - Italy, Il portiere di notte/The Night Porter (1974) - Italy, Il Postino/The Postman (1994) - Italy, Il Trovatore (1978) - Austria, Impromptu (1991) - UK, In America (2002) - Ireland, An Inconvenient Truth (2006) - US, Indiana Jones and the Raiders of the Lost Arc (1981) - US, Inherit the Wind (1960) - US, Spencer Tracy and Fredric March - two of the best actors in the world in a confrontation that leaves you a bout de souffle/breathless, The Insider (1999) - US, Insomnia (1997) - Norway, The Inspector General (1949) - US, Interview (2003) - Netherlands, In the Heat of the Night (1967) - US, In the Name of the Father (1993) - Ireland, small countries like Ireland can make great films, but so are Irish playwrights and authors among the best in the world, Intolerance (1916) - US, Intouchables (2011) - France, Io e te/Me and You (2012) - Italy, I Pagliacci by Leoncavallo (1943) - Italy, Irma la douce (1963) - US, Island in the Sun (1957) - US, I Soliti Ignoti/Big Deal on Madonna Street (1958) - Italy, more than ten excellent Italian films in this paragraph, proving that Italian cinema is diversified - romantic, comedy, tragedy, modernist, historic, operas, and in all those categories Italian movies, directors, screenwriters, actors and actresses excel, Italian for Beginners (2000) - Denmark, It Happened One Night (1934) - US, It's a Wonderful Life (1946) - US, I am probably a sentimentalist, moved by films about love and marriage, as the films that I enjoyed most are Ingmar Bergman's Scenes from a marriage and Frank Capra's masterpiece It's a Wonderful Life, that was critically derided as being "simplistic" or "overly idealistic". I accept with proud to be called simplistic, idealistic, or romantic - but I believe that love, family, marital good relations, children, and their interaction with society are the most important topics for films. Anyhow, I have tears in my times every time that I watch the last scenes of It's a Wonderful Life, and I have watched them at least 30 times, as I used to conclude my courses in business ethics with this film, proving at least in an ideal world, that you can be a family man, an ethical businessman, a pillar of your town's society, altogether as I have tried to be all my life. I am maybe poorer in Milton Friedman's neoliberal terms, but I do feel and so is my family that we are, as George Bailey in this film, the richest people in town!

J - Jailhouse Rock (1957) - US, The Jazz Singer (1927) - US, Jean de Florette (1986) - France, I was moved to tears by this film based on Pagnol's novel and its sequel Manon every time that I showed it to my students in business ethics courses, when we see that ethics does not prevail in business and in life and that the Cesars and Ugolins, played materfully by Yves Montand and Daniel Auteuil, win them all - having respect and money although not always happiness, while the idealists as Jean de Florette - Gerard Depardieu, lose everything, at least before the sequel Manon. I have often the impression that all the world is a stage and all the men and women merely players, and God if he exists receive us all the Cesars, Ugolins, Jean de Florette and Manon, at the end of our show on earth congratulating us for our performances regardless if we acted the role of the villain or the saint. That is why secular ethicists are to be praised especially if they know that most of the time they lose and are not even rewarded in "paradise". Jeux interdits/Forbidden Games (1952) – France, Jezebel (1938) – US, JFK (1991) – US, Jimmy's Hall (2014) – Ireland, Johnny Guitar (1954) – US, Judgment at Nuremberg (1961) – US, The Juggler (1953) – US, Jules et Jim (1962) – France, Julius Caesar (1953) – US, one of the plays I love most after studying it at high school, having the privilege to seat next to Robert Hossein who directed live his actors in the first performance of the play in Paris, quoting Brutus in my courses, and appreciating this film as one of the best films ever made.

K - Kandahar: The Sun Behind the Moon (2001) – Iran, Kapo (1960) – Italy, Kazablan (1974) – Israel, with the singer/actor Yehoram Gaon with whom I was interviewed and correspond, The Kid (1921) – US, a hundred years later my grandchildren enjoy this Chaplin's film as well as Modern Times, proving once more that masterpieces are immortal, The King and I (1956) – US, King Lear (1983) – UK, The King of Comedy (1983) – US, King of Jazz (1930) – US, King Richard the Second (1978) – UK, The King's Speech (2010) – UK, The Kiss (1896) – US, Kiss Me Kate (1953) – US, The Kite Runner (2007) – Afghanistan, Knife in the Water (1962) – Poland, Korczak (1990) – Poland, Kramer vs. Kramer (1979) – US, one of the best films ever made on family's crisis, with two of the best actors – Dustin Hoffman and Meryl Streep.

L - La belle et la bete/Beauty and the Beast (1946) - France, La Belle Helene by Offenbach (2000) – France, La bete humaine/The Human Beast (1938) – France, La Boheme by Puccini (1965) – Germany, La citta delle donne/City of Women (1980) – Italy, L.A. Confidential (1997) - US, La Dolce Vita (1960) - Italy, I have seen this film several times and every time I enjoy it more, more than half a century later it is as modern as it was in 1960, Ladri di biciclette/Bicycle Thieves (1948) – Italy, The Lady Eve (1941) – US, The Lady from Shanghai (1947) – US, La femme du boulanger/The Baker's Wife (1938) – France, Marcel Pagnol excelled in the plays that he wrote, the films that he wrote and directed, the novels that he wrote, his memoirs, his autobiography, his humanism, in this film Pagnol reached the peak of his humanism, his kindness, his outstanding understanding of human nature, La Forza del Destino (1950) – Italy, La Grande Bellezza/The Great Beauty (2013) – Italy, La grande illusion (1937) - France, one of the masterpieces of the cinema, La Grande Vadrouille/The Great Stroll (1966) – France, Lakme by Delibes (1976) Australia, La lengua de las mariposas/Butterfly's Tongue (1999) – Spain, La mala educacion/Bad Education (2004) – Spain, La meglio gioventu/The Best of Youth (2003) – Italy, I like very much sagas, films of 8 or 10 hours, I am not bored as I am delighted to see how the protagonists evolve like in life, in this Italian film lasting 400 minutes especially, L'annee derniere a Marienbad/Last Year at Marienbad (1961) – France, La Notte/The Night (1961) - Italy, La peau douce/The Soft Skin (1964) – France, La Pianiste/The Piano Teacher (2001) – France, La Piscine/The Swimming Pool (1968) – France, La rafle/The Round Up (2010) – France, La regle du jeu/The Rules of the Game (1939) – France, La reine Margot (1994) – France, L'Argent \(1928, 1988\) – France, these two films are indeed masterpieces – one of them is silent and the other one is "only" 250 minutes long, yet Emile Zola is incomparable in his novels, and their adaptations to the screen and the stage. If I have to chose one film about business ethics it is undoubtedly L'Argent – as it comprises all the facets of ethics and corruption in business. Zola wrote about corruption in banks and finance during the reign of Napoleon III, but the same problems are encountered 150 years later in the Great Recession of 2008, nothing was learned – the crooks still win, the suckers still lose, in France, Israel, and the US, L'armee des ombres/Army of Shadows (1969) – France, La stanza del figlio/The Son's

Room (2001) – Italy, The Last Emperor (1987) – Italy, films are not only about family or business, fortunately they deal also about distant countries and past epochs, and we can dream of being there, especially in such outstanding movies as The Last Emperor and The Last of the Mohicans (1992) – US, The Last Picture Show (1971) – US, La Strada (1954) – Italy, Late Marriage/Hatuna Meukheret (2001) – Israel, In the last two decades Israeli films have attained at last international standards and Late Marriage was one of the first films to be perfect in all respects, Late Spring (1949) – Japan, Latin Lover (2015) – Italy, La Traviata by Verdi (1983) – Italy, I have seen at least twenty films of operas, I like most of course Verdi and Rigoletto, but La Traviata and La vie parisienne are two of the best as well, Laura (1944) – US, La Vie Parisienne by Offenbach (1977) – France, La Violetera/The Violet Seller (1958) – Spain, La vita e bella/Life is Beautiful (1997) – Italy, L'Avventura (1960) – Italy, Lawrence of Arabia (1962) – UK, Le ballon rouge/The Red Balloon (1956) – France, Le charme discret de la bourgeoisie/The discreet charm of the bourgeoisie (1972) – France, L'Eclisse/Eclipse (1962) – Italy, Le comte de Monte Cristo (1998) – France, one of the best novels of all times that was dealt at length in this book was also adapted many times to the screen, Le jour se leve/Daybreak (1939) – France, Le journal d'une femme de chambre/The diary of a chambermaid (1964) – France, Le locataire/The Tenant (1976) – France, Le mepris/Contempt (1963) – France, Le Misanthrope (1994) – France, films on the best plays are also very frequent and what can be better than to see one of the best plays by Moliere in Paris, Israel and on screen, L'enfant/The Child (2005) – Belgium, Le notti di Cabiria/Nights of Cabiria (1957) – Italy, Le Nozze di Figaro by Mozart (1975) – Germany, Leon/Leon: The Professional (1994) – France, Le Pere Goriot (2004) – France, Le proces/The Trial (1962) – France, film is the best media to show the anguish of Kafka's books, you have nightmares for months after seeing Kafka's films, Le quai des brumes/Port of Shadows (1938) – France, Le salaire de la peur/The Wages of Fear (1953) – France, sometimes small budget films as this one are greater than life and I still remember every minute of the film more than 60 years after seeing it, Les contes d'Hoffmann by Offenbach (2002) – France and also The Tales of Hoffmann (1951) – UK, Les demoiselles de Rochefort/The Young Girls of Rochefort (1967) – France, Les enfants du paradis/Children of Paradise (1945) – France, Les enfants du siecle/Children of the Century (1999) – France, I have seen many films on the wonderful love story of George Sand and Alfred de Musset and I have read their correspondence, and it still interests me every time, Les Faux-monnayeurs/The Counterfeiters (2010) – France, Les grandes familles/The Possessors (1958) – France, I have a profound disrespect to most of the "grandes familles", "royal houses", aristocrats, tycoons, politicians, proving once more the truth of the Hebrew saying: what is the difference between a mountain/Har and a minister/important people/Sar – the mountain seems small when you see it in the distance and huge when you see it close, with the minister/the tycoon/the aristocrat/politician/who's who – it is the opposite..., Les invasions barbares/The Barbarian Invasions (2003) – Canada, Les liaisons dangereuses (1959) – France, I may be fair in my conduct in business, with friends, with my wife and family, but it does not mean that I don't enjoy reading the most unfair conduct as in this wonderful book and film, watching gangster films as The Godfather, and films about greater than life crooks as L'Argent, Les Marchands de Gloire (1998) – France, Les Misérables \(1998-UK\), (2012-UK), (2002-France), (1935-US), (1934-France), (1982-France), (1958-France), I have seen many films on this book and I have enjoyed most of them, as I have enjoyed the novel, and all Hugo's masterpieces, Les parapluies de Cherbourg/The Umbrellas of Cherbourg (1964) – France, Les 400 coups/The 400 Blows (1959) – France, I enjoy most films of the French Nouvelle Vague and this is one of their first movies, Les sorcières de Salem/The Crucible (1957) – France, very few people have seen this film which is a masterpiece, far better than all the other adaptations of Miller's play to the screen, and to think that the French succeeded to depict the atmosphere of Salem in the US three hundred years ago just proves that a good film is really cosmopolitan, Les trois

A Song to Remember (1945) – US, Son of the Bride/El hijo de la novia (2001) – Argentina, I remember being a member of the Argentinian film club in Jerusalem in 1964 when I was 20 together with my Argentinian friend Mario Diamant – the films were so rudimentary, so boring, so childish, and now – a few decades later the Argentinian films are among the best in the world, The Son of the Sheik (1926) – US, Sons and Lovers (1960) – UK, Sophie's Choice (1982) – US, The Sound of Music (1965) - US, one of the best musicals and films ever made, a masterpiece, great songs, great acting, with the one and only Christopher Plummer who was Captain Von Trapp in this film, Mike Wallace in The Insider – part of my business ethics courses as it has the most salient dilemmas personified with two other excellent actors Al Pacino and Russel Crowe. Plummer at the age of almost 90 still acts and receive the highest awards, and indeed you have to be a great actor to personify two such opposites and Von Trapp and Wallace, Sous les toits de Paris/Under the Roofs of Paris (1930) – France, South Pacific (1958) – US, one of the best musicals and musical films ever made, Spartacus (1960) – US, Spring Summer Autumn Winter... and Spring (2003) – South Korea, a Korean masterpiece, Stagecoach (1939) – US, Stalag 17 (1953) – US, Stanno tutti bene/Everybody's Fine (1990) – Italy, A Star Is Born (1954) – US, Stories We Tell (2012) – Canada, The Stranger/Al Majhoul (1984) – Egypt in Arabic, part of my business ethics courses as it raises many ethical dilemmas, A Streetcar Named Desire (1951) – US, Stromboli (1950) – Italy, Suddenly Last Summer (1959) – US, The Sun Also Rises (1957) – US, Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971) – UK, Sunset Boulevard (1950) – US, I remember seeing this film at the age of 6, and surprisingly enough I did not appreciate it, I was even afraid by the scaring Gloria Swanson, only decades later I overcame my reticence and saw it once again – a masterpiece, proving that maybe it is too early to take your small children to all the films that the grownups want to see, Super Size Me (2004) – US, Sweet Bird of Youth (1962) – US.

T – Tai-Pan (1986) – US, A Taste of Honey (1961) – UK, the British and the Italian film industries had their glorious era until the seventies, and only recently they have regained their excellence, unlike the French film industry that has remained excellent during more than a century, Terms of Endearment (1983) – US, Tevya/Tevye/Tevye the Dairyman (1939) – US in Yiddish about Ashkenazi Jews, The Take (2004) – Canada, Ten/10 (2002) – Iran, Ten Blocks on the Camino Real (1966) – US, Thelma and Louise (1991) – US, Therese Desqueyroux (2012) – France, Therese Raquin (1953) – France, There's No Business Like Show Business (1954) – US, There Will Be Blood (2007) – US, The Thief of Bagdad (1924) – US, The Third Man (1949) – UK, The 39 Steps (1935) – UK, Three Colors: Blue/Trois couleurs: bleu (1993) – France, Three Colors: Red/Trois couleurs: rouge (1994) – France, Three Colors: White/Trois couleurs: blanc (1994) – France, Three Mothers (2006) – Israel, about Egyptian Jews, the first Israeli film telling the story of Egyptian Jews, unlike the dozens of novels that were published on this topic, Three Sisters (1970) – UK, Through A Glass Darkly (1961) – Sweden, Time (2006) – South Korea, Tin Men (1987) – US, Tirez sur le pianiste/Shoot the Piano Player (1960) – France, Titanic (1997) – US, To Be or Not to Be (1942/1983) – US, I enjoyed most the remake in 1983 with Mel Brooks and his wife Anne Bancroft, both were perfect, and the film was one of the funniest movies that I have ever seen, To Have and Have Not (1944) – US, Toi le venin (1958), France, directed by Robert Hossein, whom I saw at one of the plays he directed in Paris when he came after the performance on stage and talked to the public, Tokyo monogatari/Tokyo Story (1953) – Japan, Tom Sawyer (1973) – US, Too Big to Fail (2011) – US, Topaze \(1936, 1951\) – France, Top Hat (1935) – US, the ultimate musical comedy with Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire, singing and dancing to the tune of Irving Berlin's Cheek to Cheek, Topsy-Turvy (1999) – UK, Tosca (1976) – Italy, Touchez pas au grisbi (1954) – France, Touch of Evil (1958) – US, The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948) – US, The Trial (1993) – UK, Tristan und Isolde by Wagner (1995) – Germany, Triumph of the Spirit (1989) – US, Tune in Tomorrow.../La tia Julia y el escritor (1990) – US, Turandot by Puccini (1987) – US, Twelfth Night (1996) – UK, 12 Angry Men (1957) – US, 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea (1954) – US, Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992) – US, Tycoon (2002) – Russia.

Piccoli is one of my most favorite actors. He has appeared in many different roles, from seducer to cop to gangster to Pope, in more than 170 movies. Piccoli has worked with Jean Renoir, Jean-Pierre Melville, Jean-Luc Godard, Claude Lelouch, Jacques Demy, Claude Sautet, Louis Malle, Agnès Varda, Leos Carax, Luis Buñuel, Costa-Gavras, Alfred Hitchcock, Marco Ferreri, Jacques Rivette, Otar Iosseliani, Nanni Moretti, Jacques Doillon, Mario Bava, Manoel de Oliveira, Claude Faraldo, Raúl Ruiz, Theodoros Angelopoulos and Alain Resnais, Violettes Imperiales/Violetas Imperiales/Imperial Violets (1952) – France, The Virgin Spring (1960) - Sweden, Viridiana (1961) – Spain, Vertigo (1958) - US, The Visit (1964) - US, Viva la liberta/Long Live Freedom (2013) – Italy, Vivre sa vie/My Life to Live (1962) – France, Volver (2006) – Spain, one of the best films written and directed by Pedro Almodovar. With two excellent actresses – Penelope Cruz and Carmen Maura. Drawing inspiration from the Italian neorealism of the late 1940s to early 1950s and the work of pioneering directors such as Federico Fellini, Luchino Visconti, and Pier Paolo Pasolini, Volver addresses themes like sexual abuse, loneliness and death, mixing the genres of farce, tragedy, melodrama, and magic realism, Voyage of the Damned (1976) – UK, Vu du pont/A View from the Bridge (1962) – France,

W – Wadjda (2012) – Saudi Arabia in Arabic, an excellent film indeed, very interesting and moving, Walk on Water/Lalekhet al hamayim (2004) – Israel, Wall-E (2008) – US, Wall Street (1987) - US, one of the best films that I have ever seen first of all because the excellent actor Michael Douglas – Gordon Gekko, who has become the ultimate capitalist maximizing profits to the delight of Milton Friedman and ruining the lives of all the others, as in the neoliberal regimes that I oppose so much. This was the backbone of my courses on business ethics as it gives in a nutshell most of the dilemmas of business, War and Peace (1956) – US, War and Remembrance (1988) – US, this film and The Winds of War are the best films that I have ever seen on the inter-world wars and the second world war, a very long saga, but interesting and thrilling from the beginning to the end, The War of the Worlds (1953) – US, Washington Square (1997) – US, Water (2005) – India, The Weeping Meadow (2004) – Greece, West Side Story (1961) - US, in the same decade I saw this excellent film and saw the musical on Broadway in June 1968, the first musical that I have seen in the US, Whale Rider (2002) – New Zealand, When Father Was Away On Business (1985) – Serbia, When Harry Met Sally... (1989) – US, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1966) – US, a masterpiece on stage and in film, The Wild

X– The X-Files (1998)– US. An American science fiction thriller film directed by Rob Bowman.

Y - Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942) - US, an American biographical musical film about George M. Cohan, known as "The Man Who Owned Broadway". He is considered the father of American musical comedy. James Cagney, one of my favorite actors, was a fitting choice for the role of Cohan since, like Cohan, he was an Irish-American who had been a song-and-dance man early in his career. His unique style of half-singing and half-reciting the songs, reflected the style that Cohan himself used, Y tu mama tambien/And Your Mother Too (2001) – Mexico.

Z - Z (1969) - Algeria, Costa Gavras is one of my favorite directors, and this film is one of his best, I had the privilege of hearing his lecture at the Haifa Film Festival, Zelary (2003) – Czech, Zero de conduite/Zero for Conduct (1933) – France, Ziegfeld Follies (1946) – US, Zorba the Greek (1964) – UK, one of the best films I have ever seen, directed by Cypriot Michael Cacoyannis and starring Anthony Quinn, one of my favorite actors, as the title character. It is based on the novel Zorba the Greek by Nikos Kazantzakis, which I am still reading in Greek. The supporting cast includes Alan Bates, Lila Kedrova, Irene Papas and Sotiris Moustakas. And in the "waiting list" after we closed the polls we can find excellent films as The Five Pennies...

The best films in Cory's list of films amount to 830, out of which 360 are the best of the best films, 5 times better than the 72 "virgins" offered to the terrorists, which proves that you don't have to go to heaven in order to get your rewards on a virtuous life – you can watch 360 films which are la crème de la crème of the film industry in all countries and you get paradise on earth. All the films have links to entries in Wikipedia, IMDb, and other sites, as well as the directors, scriptwriters, actors and actresses. With the other lists of films – we bring in this book links to more than a thousand films, you can chose to read the One Thousands and One Nights of Scheherazade or the 1,000+ nights for watching the best films from all over the world in my lists. If we add to that the books by the 720 best authors of modern literature in my lists you can fill in a lifetime reading the best books of those authors, watching the best films, hearing the hundreds of best classical music works by more than a hundred composers - symphonies, concerti, lieder, chamber music, the best operas, visiting the best museums with the best paintings and sculptures, in short living a true cosmopolitan cultural life, as stipulated in this book - an ode to culture.

In this book we find also references to the geniuses of cinema, as Chaplin and Bergman in the biographies, and in other chapters about other directors, scriptwriters, actors and actresses. Many chapters in this book are about films with business ethics and social justice content as well. So, what do we have in Cory's List? Silent films and talkies, black and white and color films, widescreen and 3-D films, short films and very long films, films from all over the world, but mainly from the leading countries in quality films – US, France, UK, Italy, Sweden, Japan... More than half of the films were produced more than 50 years ago or are based on books written and works composed more than 50 years ago, which shows either that the best films are the oldies until the end of the sixties (as in songs, literature, classical music...), or that I prefer the films that I have seen in my youth until the age of 25, which probably had a stronger impact on my life. My lists are the most cosmopolitan lists of films, as truly I am interested in films from a wide variety of countries, which I see in festivals and in Israel that is more open to cosmopolitan films, literature, and music – because the Jews came from more than a hundred countries in the diaspora and we are probably the most multi-cultural country in the world. Most of the films in my lists are quality films, but there is also a high proportion of "lesser quality" films, which were chosen because of the impact they had on my life, and because I enjoyed them very much. The reader may notice an "optical" error – that the American films are much more predominant than all the other films. We have to analyze it in view of the fact that almost all the films produced in India, China, Israel, Egypt, or Russia are films about those countries only and not films about other countries, while many American films are films dealing with other countries, as the US film industry is Universal (also MGM, RKO...), and deal with other countries as The African Queen, The Life of Emile Zola, Bel Ami, Titanic, Anna Karenina, Arch of Triumph, Hans Christian Andersen, Les Misérables, Schindler's List, Rhinoceros, Exodus, To Be or Not To Be, The Diary of Anne Frank, Doctor Zhivago, Don Quixote, Gigi, The Great Dictator, Julius Caesar, Stalag 17, For Whom The Bell Tolls, An Enemy of the People, The Three Musketeers, Frida, Fanny, Irma la douce, Island in the Sun, The Sheik, The Shop Around the Corner, etc.

The films from the US amount to 379 or 46% of the total number of films in my list - 830. This percentage may seem very high but as stipulated before many of those films are truly cosmopolitan, about many other countries, as the American film industry – the largest in the world, at least in quality, is the most predominant film industry in the world. I lived most of my life in Israel, except 9 years in Egypt in my childhood, 1 year in France at Insead, and on the aggregate a few years in business, study and pleasure trips all over the world, some of the trips for one or two months. In Israel we are exposed mainly to American films, although in comparison to France, Italy or Russia, we see much more foreign films than local films in those countries, because there are many local quality films there, as compared to relatively very few Israeli films, that have become quality films only in the last decade or two. Nevertheless, in comparison to all the other lists that I have seen on the Internet, my list is the more cosmopolitan as the other lists comprise in many cases at least three quarter American films or even 100%, and in my list the American films amount to less than half. In the second place we find in my list 120 films from France, or 14% of the total number of films. This large number is objective and subjective as well – objective as I and many specialists believe that the French film industry is the best in the world, and the American percentage is much higher only because the American film industry is much larger than the French one. Subjective as I like much more French films, I was almost never disappointed by the quality of a French film, French is my mother tongue, most of the films that I have seen in my childhood in Egypt were French, and most of my business, pleasures and study trips were in Paris, where I saw many excellent French films.

The British films amount to 86 or 10% of the total number of films. The British film industry is an excellent film industry, and I think that proportionately to the total number of films produced in the country there are more excellent British films and French films than American films. The British films are also relatively more cosmopolitan and many of them deal on topics which are not British. The Italian number of films amount to 61 or 7% to the total number of films. Many Italian films are quality films, among the best in the world, and in general I can say that the best directors, scriptwriters, actors and actresses are mostly American, French, British, and Italian. This does not mean that there are not excellent film-makers in other countries as Ingmar Bergman in Sweden or Akira Kurosawa in Japan, but those are only a few in comparison to the Americans, British, French and Italians. The total percentage of those four countries in my list amounts to 77%, more than three quarters. Still, my list is more cosmopolitan than most of the other lists, as the films from the other 43 countries (in total we have 47 countries in my list), amount to almost a quarter of the total number of films. Actually, the number of countries in my list could have been much more than 50 if I had included the excellent films that I have seen at the Haifa Film Festival and elsewhere from Georgia, Chile, Peru, Thailand, Iceland, Bulgaria, Morocco, Lebanon, etc., but I had to stop somewhere the list, otherwise I would have reached easily more than 1,000 excellent films that I have seen, and indeed there are more than a thousand if we add the list of the films with business ethics content and the list of 1955-1961.

The second tier of films in my list include 9 countries with 6 to 20 films – 1% to 2% each from the total, namely – Germany – 20 (2%), Spain – 18, Israel – 15, Sweden – 14, Russia – 11, Canada – 9 (1%), Japan – 8, Denmark – 6, Poland – 6. Altogether 13% of the total. This data is somewhat subjective, and I confess – I am not a professional critic/reviewer of films, I have not seen many excellent Japanese or Russian films that were not shown in Israel, and I also don't remember very well the names of Japanese or Russian films. I have no doubt that those film industries as well as most of the other industries in this segment (Sweden with Ingmar Bergman, Poland with Kieslowski, Germany with Wim Wenders, and Spain with Almodovar) are perceived by many critics as better than the Israeli film industry, yet I have included relatively more excellent Israeli films, because I live in Israel, and I enjoy much seeing Israeli films, even if sometimes they are not the best, as I have stated above that many films in my list are not quality films but films that I have enjoyed more than the others. In Israel we see relatively less films from those countries, I see them mainly in the Film Festivals, and I am aware that I have not seen most of the best ones, at least if I compare my list to the lists on the Internet. So, 13 countries have about 90% of the total number of films, and 34 countries have only 10%.

In the third tier of countries we find films with 3-5 films, about 0.5% of the total films each: Australia – 5, Romania – 5, India – 5, Ireland – 5, China – 4, Mexico – 4, Austria – 4, Greece – 3, Argentina – 3, New Zealand – 3, South Korea – 3, Iran – 3. I am quite sure that here also there are hundreds of excellent films that I was not exposed to, mainly from India, China, South Korea and Argentina, but as I included in my list only films that I have seen they were not included. Finally, the countries with 1-2 films: Egypt, Portugal, Czech Republic, Netherlands, Turkey, Serbia, Hungary, Brazil – 2 films each. Ukraine, Slovakia, Armenia, Saudi Arabia, Switzerland, Senegal, Belgium, Ethiopia, Norway, Finland, South Africa, Algeria, Bosnia, Afghanistan – 1 film each. And I am aware that most of the countries deserve much more, but I have not seen enough quality films from there, and even so I have much more countries in my list than others. Nevertheless, as I want to be fair to the film industries from countries other than the leading ones in my list – US, France, UK, Italy – I bring here links to Internet Lists of their best films:

2.7 CINEMA OF ISRAEL, THE HAIFA FILM FESTIVAL, LISTS OF ISRAELI FILMS

Cinema of Israel (Hebrew: קולנוע ישראלי Kolnoa Yisraeli) refers to movie production in Israel since its founding in 1948. Most Israeli films are produced in Hebrew. Israel has been nominated for more Academy Awards for Best Foreign Language Film than any other country in the Middle East. Movies were made in Mandatory Palestine from the beginning of the silent film era although the development of the local film industry accelerated after the establishment of the state. Early films were mainly documentary or news roundups, shown in Israeli cinemas before the movie started. One of the pioneers of cinema in Israel was Baruch Agadati. Agadati purchased cinematographer Yaakov Ben Dov's film archives in 1934 when Ben Dov retired from filmmaking and together with his brother Yitzhak established the AGA Newsreel. He directed the early Zionist film entitled This is the Land (1935). In 1948, Yosef Navon, a soundman, and Yitzhak Agadati, producer of the first Hebrew-language film with his brother, Baruch Agadati, found an investor, businessman Mordechai Navon, who invested his own money in film and lab equipment. Agadati used his connections among Haganah comrades to acquire land for a studio. In 1949 the Geva film labs were established on the site of an abandoned woodshed in Givatayim.

In 1954, the Knesset passed the Law for the Encouragement of Israeli Films (החוק לעידוד הסרט (הישראלי)). Leading filmmakers in the 1960s were Menahem Golan, Ephraim Kishon, and Uri Zohar. The first Bourekas film was Sallah Shabati, produced by Ephraim Kishon in 1964. In 1965 Uri Zohar produced the film Hole in the Moon, influenced by French New Wave films. In the first decade of the 21st century, several Israeli films won awards in film festivals around the world. Prominent films of this period include Late Marriage (Dover Koshashvili), Broken Wings, Walk on Water and Yossi & Jagger (Eytan Fox), Nina's Tragedies, Campfire and Beaufort (Joseph Cedar), Or (My Treasure) (Keren Yedaya), Turn Left at the End of the World (Avi Nesher), The Band's Visit (Eran Kolirin) Waltz With Bashir (Ari Folman), and Ajami. In 2011, Strangers No More won the Oscar for best Short Documentary. In 2013 two documentaries were nominated the Oscar for the Best Feature Documentary: The Gatekeepers (Dror Moreh) and Five Broken Cameras, a Palestinian-Israeli-French co-production (Emad Burnat, Guy Davidi). Author Julie Gray notes "Israeli film is certainly not new in Israel, but it is fast gaining attention in the U.S., which is a double-edged sword. American distributors feel that the small American audience interested in Israeli film, are squarely focused on the turbulent and troubled conflict that besets us daily." 2014 was the best year for Israeli films at the Israeli box-office. Israeli-made films sold 1.6 million tickets in Israel, the best in Israel's film history.

Filmmaking in Israel has undergone major developments since its inception in the 1950s. The first features produced and directed by Israelis, such as "Hill 24 Doesn't Answer" and "They Were Ten", tended, like Israeli literature of the period, to be cast in the heroic mold. Some recent films remain deeply rooted in the Israeli experience, dealing with such subjects as Holocaust survivors and their children (Gila Almagor's "The Summer of Aviya" and its sequel, "Under the Domim Tree") and the travails of new immigrants ("Sh'hur", directed by Hannah Azoulai and Shmuel Hasfari, "Late Marriage" directed by Dover Koshashvili). Others deal with issues of modern day Israeli life, such as the Israeli-Arab conflict (Eran Riklis's "The Lemon Tree", Scandar Copti and Yaron Shani's "Ajami") and military service (Joseph Cedar's "Beaufort", Samuel Maoz's "Lebanon", Eytan Fox's "Yossi and Jagger"). Some are set in the context of a universalist, alienated, and hedonistic society (Eytan Fox's "A Siren's Song" and "The Bubble", Ayelet Menahemi and Nirit Yaron's "Tel Aviv Stories"). The Israeli film industry continues to gain worldwide recognition through International awards nominations. For three years consecutively, Israeli films ("Beaufort" (2008), "Waltz with Bashir" (2009) and "Ajami" (2010)) were nominated for Academy Awards. The Spielberg Film Archive at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is the world's largest repository of film material on Jewish themes as well as on Jewish and Israeli life. The main international film festivals in Israel are the Jerusalem Film Festival and Haifa Film Festival. The Haifa Film Festival is one of the best film festivals in the world.

The Haifa International Film Festival is an annual film festival that takes place every autumn (between late September and late October), during the week-long holiday of Sukkot, in Haifa, Israel. The festival was inaugurated in 1983 and was the first of its kind in Israel. Over the years, it has become the country's major cinematic event. The Haifa International Film Festival attracts a wide audience of film-goers and media professionals from Israel and abroad. Throughout the week, special screenings are held of c.170 new films. Apart from movies screened around the clock at seven theaters, the festival features open-air screenings. Film categories include feature films, documentaries, animation, short films, retrospectives and tributes. The Board of Directors is composed of film and culture professionals and public figures (I was an independent director in the Board). The festival is underwritten by the City of Haifa, the Ministry of Education, the Israeli Film Council, and the European Union, as well as commercial companies. For many years I used to watch 50-60 films from 20 to 30 countries, during the ten days of the festival, and I think that I broke a Guinness Record, as I was there from early morning to late night every day.

2.9 WALL STREET AND ETHICS - THE FILM "WALL STREET" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the film:

Wall Street, 1987, 120 min., Director Oliver Stone, with Michael Douglas, Charlie Sheen

Summary and Analysis:

The film describes the ethical dilemmas of a father - Carl Fox - and his son - Bud Fox - and how they are influenced by a financial tycoon - Gordon Gekko. Bud Fox doesn't succeed as a broker, which raises the question: Can you afford to be ethical only if you are successful? Carl, a foreman in an airline company, cannot understand why Bud decided to be a broker. Bud answers that he can earn in a year five times more, as he has no ethical considerations. Gordon Gekko appreciates the perseverance of Bud in trying to reach him and is willing to hear him for five minutes. Bud volunteers insider information on his father's company. The style of Gekko is military, very violent (I want him to bleed), a very common style. Bud becomes a hero at work after his success with Gekko, who is known to be unethical. Gekko demands from Bud to continue to supply him insider information like he did with Bluestar, as Gekko is not a gambler, he does not risk anything and plays for sure. Bud has inhibitions as he knows that it is illegal and he can lose his license. But Gekko lures him with bonuses of hundreds of thousands dollars if he will assist him to win as he doesn't like to lose.

Gekko who comes from a humble background despises WASPs, who love animals but can't stand people (but does he like them?). Gekko doesn't want Harvard graduates, he prefers poor and hungry people, but wise and unscrupulous, who want to win. If you need a friend get a dog. Gekko contributes many donations to community and is a member of the New York Zoo, a trait very common to unethical companies who donate to community and cultural activities (tobacco companies?). Gekko describes the minority shareholders as a flock of sheep who get slaughtered. He demands from Bud to spy on Wildman and try to obtain some information on which company he wants to takeover. Although it is illegal, Bud agrees as Gekko tells him that he has already slipped when he gave him insider information on his father's company. Gekko rationalizes his conduct. His father died aged 49 after working very hard. That's why he is entitled to be ruthless and unethical, although the illegal actions are performed by others. Gekko lures Bud with the exorbitant amounts that he will win, not a miserable $400K, rich enough to have your own jet, $50-100M, A player or nothing... Which types of people can Gekko influence? Can an MBA graduate with courses in ethics succumb to Gekko? He is undoubtedly charming and convincing (most unethical people are?) In the meantime, Bud has long talks with his mentor Lou Mannheim who warns him to remain ethical. On the other hand, Darien Taylor, Bud's lover, has a bad influence on him, as she is interested in winners only, whatever the cost is.

Wildman wants to turnaround the Annacot steel factory after the takeover while Gekko is only interested in a speculative profit. He intends to dismantle the company and layoff most of its employees. Wildman tells him: We are talking about lives and jobs. You are a rogue and lousy blackmailer... Are Wildman and Gekko made from the same stuff or is there a difference between tycoons? Gekko rationalizes Bud's new conduct by saying that nobody loses. Is it true? What about the stakeholders: the employees, customers, suppliers, creditors, minority shareholders? Bud is generous towards his father, while in the past he only took money from him. But it raises Carl's suspicions and he warns him from unethical moves. Gekko clarifies to Bud that it's preferable that he will look as if he operates by himself. It's Bud's responsibility and Gekko supposedly doesn't know a thing. This is a crucial issue, as unethical managers/directors don't sign any incriminating documents and don't incur any criminal risks. Bud buys a superb flat in Manhattan and gets accustomed to a very high standard of living. This is another consideration that increases degeneration. You are willing to pay any moral price in order to remain on the same standing, that you, your wife and your kids have acquired.

One of the highlights of the film is the fantastic performance of Gekko at the Shareholders' Meeting of Teldar. He wants to takeover the company and he manipulates the minority shareholders against the existing controlling shareholders and management. He says that America has become a second grade power because of such incompetent managers as the existing Teldar's management. Gekko: America has to return to the time of Carnegie and Mellon (the robber barons) who risked their own money. Not like the bureaucratic executives of today. There are now 33 vice presidents and the whole management owns only 3% of the equity. They lost $110 million last year and half of it was lost because of overstaffed personnel and the correspondence between them. Gekko: The New law of America is the survival of the unfits. Either you do it right or you are annihilated. On the last seven transactions that I made there were 2.5 million shareholders who have earned 12 billion dollars. I don't destroy corporations I liberate them. And finally his speech on greed: Greed is good, greed is right, greed works, greed clarifies, cuts through and captures the essence of the evolutionary spirit. Greed, in all of its forms - greed for life, for money, knowledge - has marked the upward surge of mankind, and greed will not only save Teldar Paper but that other malfunctioning corporation called the USA.

What is our impression on Gekko's speech? Can we agree to it completely, partly, not at all? America has really become in the '80s a second grade power because of excessive bureaucracy in government and business. Teldar with its existing management cannot survive, but is the solution to let greedy tycoons like Gekko dismantle it? What about the rights of stakeholders? Gekko boasts of the fantastic profits he has generated to his shareholders but he forgets to mention the distribution of the profits, as he got the lion's share and the others - peanuts. The survival of the fittest as advocated by Gekko is the opposite of ethics. Of course the fittest must run the economy but not at the expense of the weakest. All the stakeholders should be treated equitably. Without ethics we shall return to the catastrophes of the '80s and to Enron.

Gekko tries to takeover Bluestar, Carl's company, cut down salaries and streamline the business. He manipulates the pilots and stewardesses, with the assistance of Bud, but doesn't succeed to outfox Carl Fox. Carl tells his son that the rich people have always conned the poor ones and that's what he'll do also with Bluestar's employees. You should never work with greedy men. Carl prefers the existing owners even if they are incompetent, but they have founded the company out of nothing and gave employment to thousands. Bud answers his father that his conduct is influenced by the fact that he is jealous of him, but Carl answers that he has never measured the success of a man by the size of his wallet. A basic consideration in activist business ethics is never to work with companies and businessmen who are motivated uniquely by profits and especially by greed. In the long run you are always conned by those people and companies. This is the first of Cory's laws. Success, profits and valuation are very important but ethics is no less important.

Bud learns that Gekko has taken over Bluestar only to dismantle it and plunder the pension funds. Unethical tycoons have often acquired companies only for their pension funds, leaving the employees without any money for retirement. Without ethics you don't care for employees. Bud who is supposedly Bluestar's new CEO does not agree with Gekko's move and Gekko answers him: You're walking around blind without a cane. A fool and his money are lucky enough to get together in the first place. Which means that with ethics you can't get rich. But this time Bud knows the employees. We have here the personification principle stating that it is much harder to wrong people if you know them personally. He asks Gekko "How much is enough?". But for Gekko there is never enough, somebody wins somebody loses. Money itself isn't lost or made, it's simply transferred from one perception to another. Gekko: The richest one percent of this country owns half of our country's wealth, five trillion dollars. One third of that comes from hard work, two thirds comes from inheritance, interest on interest accumulating to widows and idiot sons and what I do, stock and real estate speculation. 90% of people out there have little or no net worth. I create nothing. I own. Gekko: You are not so naïve as to think that we are living in a democracy. It's the free market and you are part of it. You can survive only if you have the Killer Instinct. Gekko suggests Bud very convincingly to cooperate and he'll have enough money for his father too.

Is Gekko right with his arguments? What is better: Half of the wealth owned by 1% of the population or by 20-30%, what will generate more employment, growth, long run profits and valuation? In Israel, for example, half of the stock exchange is owned by 10 families.

After the heart attack of his father Bud decides to leave Gekko and join the ethical and poorer club. He is arrested after his illegal transactions are discovered. He decides to betray Gekko and becomes a whistleblower. Staring at the abyss Bud finds finally his character.

2.10 ETHICS OF HOSTILE TAKEOVERS - THE FILM "OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the play "Other People's Money" (1989) by Jerry Sterner

The film is based on the play with slight changes:

Other People's Money, 1991, 103 minutes, Director Norman Jewison, with Danny DeVito, Gregory Peck, Penelope Ann Miller, Piper Laurie

Summary and Analysis:

Larry Garfield is a serial liquidator of companies acquiring undervalued companies, called by him - "sleeping beauties", tearing them apart to the detriment of the stakeholders and owners, as the valuation of the parts is higher than the whole. Andrew Jorgenson, an old-school manager-owner, believes that companies should serve mainly their stakeholders but loses his company to the New Economy's tycoon Garfield. Garfield, a corporate raider, attempts to acquire an 81 year old New England Wire & Cable company. He fights the company's CEO and tries to convince the shareholders to rally him in order to increase their profits to the detriment of the company's employees, who would lose their jobs, the community and most of the stakeholders. Garfield is arrogant, greedy, self-centered, ruthless, but very convincing to the shareholders with his "Darwinist" arguments.

The film begins with a monologue of Garfield: "I love money, more than what I buy with it. Money doesn't care what I do and what my beliefs are. But more than I love money, I love other people's money." This is the summary of the film and of a merger course - to employ as much as possible other people's money, to convey them the risks but to keep the profits for you. Is it ethical, why do the "suckers" who give the Garfields money never learn? His opposite is Andrew Jorgenson, who manages and owns a large part of the company. He is loved by his wife, his family, his friends, his workers, and he thinks also by his shareholders. But in a moment of truth the shareholders decide to back Garfield's attempt to takeover the company in order to dismantle it and to increase their valuation at the expense of the workers, the community and the stakeholders. Garfield shows them that their valuation has decreased sharply over the years, while the salaries of the workers have increased, the community continues to levy taxes, the products have become obsolete, and the management is totally incompetent.

Jorgenson has 20% of the shares and Garfield has managed to acquire 12%. Both of them have to convince the remaining shareholders who should back up one of the policies. The climax of the film is the confrontation between Garfield and Jorgenson at the Shareholders' Meeting. Kate is a prominent lawyer in one of the largest law firm, she is also the daughter of Jorgenson's wife, so she tries to find a compromise between the two, unsuccessfully. Jorgenson is afraid of the Shareholders' Meeting. He is not familiar with the new economy, things have changed, what happened to the people who assisted each other? He doesn't want that "this" man would win, he is proud of the business he has established, he is worried that his workers would lose their jobs, he fights for principles, the good old ones... In his speech, Jorgenson says that his company has overcome all its crises in the last 80 years. If the company will be closed it would ruin the community. He points with an accusing finger to Larry the Liquidator who threatens to ruin the company, he is the post-America businessman, the new robber baron. But the old ones left something behind: mines, steel, railroads, industry, banks, while Garfield does not produce anything, only paper. Larry doesn't promise to manage the company better than him, he just says that he'll kill them as they are worth more dead than alive. He finishes his speech by saying that the company will increase its valuation, they are stronger as they are survivors. If Garfield will prevail, they'll remain only with lawyers and tax heavens. If you kill your neighbor it is murder, but if Garfield wants to maximize profits he is effectively a murderer. The company is much more than its value in the stock exchange, it is a place with workers, products, a management who cares for people. Jorgenson receives a standing ovation. His "people" are much more cooperative than Dr. Thomas Stockman's people in An Enemy of the People. But when their money is at stake they would react in the same manner. The only difference in over a century that has elapsed between those two plays is that the people are now politically correct and give the ethical businessman a standing ovation while voting for the unethical businessman.

Garfield answers in a brilliant speech: "Amen, Amen, and Amen. What you have just heard is a prayer, a prayer for a dead company, as the company is dead. I didn't kill it, it was dead when I got there. It is too late for prayers. Even if we believed in miracles it is too late because there are new technologies, obsolescence, optical fibers. We are dead but we are not bankrupt. We have a responsibility for the workers? The community? Who cares? This company has spent your money in the last ten years. Did the community lower their municipality taxes? The share is now worth one sixth of its valuation ten years ago. But the workers have doubled their salaries. They don't care for the shareholders. The only one who cares about you is me, I am your only friend. I don't produce anything? I don't make money? Take the money I'll make you earn and invest it wherever you want, in investments that are fruitful to the community. I am called Larry the Liquidator as in my funeral you'll come with a smile in your face and pockets full of money." The shareholders vote for him and the Board is replaced. The classical duel between Garfield and Jorgenson reminds of a Western duel, only that this time the bad guy wins. It is no more High Noon with Gary Cooper, it is High Time that the western hero, this time an old and tired Gregory Peck, should go and let Larry Garfield to take over. Garfield was elected democratically, the shareholders wanted him and that's what they'll get. But in the horizon we can see Enron, WorldCom and all the corporate scandals caused by such Liquidators. If Greed is the only criterion for success, as Gordon Gekko says, greed will act also to the detriment of the minority shareholders who will lose all their money, as in the survival of the fittest, not only the old Jorgenson succumbs, also the shareholders lose, as there is always one fitter in the battle of the fittest: whether it is Ken Lay, Gekko or Garfield. Surely, it is never the stakeholders who are the true owners of the company and if they will unite they will be the fittest. They have the ultimate power and all the Garfields are mere parasites who take a ride on their back and suck their blood.

2.11 CORRUPTION IN MEDICARE - THE FILM "DAMAGED CARE" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the film:

Damaged Care, 2002 (TV), 114 min., Director Harry Winer, with Laura Dern.

Summary and Analysis:

The film is about the true story of Dr. Linda Peeno, a woman pushed to the edge, risking her career and family to punish the ruthless companies who valued profits over human lives. Trained as a doctor, Linda went all out, using her experience to testify on behalf of patients suing their insurers. In spite of all the difficulties and risks she decided to fight the unethical Medicare companies, the HMO, Health Maintenance Organizations, insuring the sick people. Peeno is the whistleblower who exposes the corruption in the system people are unaware of. The film leaves the audience shocked and frustrated with the existing US medical system, but similar systems exist nowadays all over the world. Damaged Care centers around the state of ethics in medical care and what happens when corporations get involved in medical decision making the bottom line take precedence over sound medical care. It shows the dilemmas faced by the doctors, the managers, as well as the plight of their patients. Peeno is torn by ethics, family and career. Laura is a doctor who married and had kids before she was able to practice medicine. Her first efforts to return to the work place lead her to becoming a medical reviewer for a large HMO. There she is told she will help to stop the practice of doctors ordering (and making the insurance companies pay for) unneeded tests and procedures. It becomes clear that in fact she is there to rubber stamp denials and add an aura of legitimacy to the practice of denying people the services their premiums paid for. Despite her stress and unhappiness her husband has her stay on in order to supplement the family income. Only after she has to make a life or death decision does she begin to realize that the system itself is flawed and cannot be fixed from the inside. As she expresses her concerns publicly the family starts to fall apart and the increased stress almost makes Peeno give up the fight. Her moment of truth comes with the help of two people - a nun and a former nurse now a victim of the system she once worked for.

When medical insurance was privatized the Medicare companies faced a very serious ethical dilemma: to what extent could they assist their patients in giving them expensive treatments at the expense of the profitability of the companies. What is more important: a heart transplant to save the life of a patient, less expensive medical treatments, or obtaining an adequate or maximal return on investment? Furthermore, in many cases the hospitals make unnecessary surgery in order to benefit from the medical insurance and improve the doctors' experience. The manager of the first company where she starts working, Humana, explains her that in the last three years the medical expenses increased by tens percents. She has to be tough in order to make tough decisions. She ensures them that she will be able to do so and gets the job. Linda has to check if the treatments requested adhere to the criteria of the companies and are covered by the medical insurance. The doctors supervise the nurses' activities. Linda befriends Cheryl Griffith, a nurse who has a humane approach to her patients. Her bosses involve irrelevant considerations like approval of unnecessary treatments that are recommended by doctors they want to promote as they might bring them new patients. Linda tells the management that the system is expensive and cumbersome, and this prevents to give the patients the proper treatments. She thinks that they invest the money in the wrong places.

A new manager starts working in the company, Dr. Scarwood, who complains that nobody cares of the bottom line, and from now on it will be the unique consideration. He wants to receive every week from the doctors what is the level of rejections they have authorized. He asks them to reject more and more requests for treatments in order to cut costs and increase profitability. Linda cannot agree to this approach who contradicts her ethical standards. Peeno is not allowed to approve expensive treatments. She doesn't want to impose to the doctors which treatments to approve and how to treat their patients. A doctor phones Peeno and asks for her approval on a heart transplant, otherwise his patient will die. Before she decides what to do, her boss and colleagues give her to read the terms of the insurance policy in order to find a way how to reject the request. The ethical argumentation is that if she will agree to the transplant it will be at the expense of a baby needing a palate surgery or three chemotherapy treatments. The employer of the patient ensured that the insurance would not cover heart transplants. Finally, Peeno gives a negative answer and the doctor tells her that she is a murderer. But all her colleagues congratulate her as she has saved the company half a million dollars. She asks herself is she responsible for the patient's death or not, even if the company is legally covered and is not obliged to finance the transplant. Linda notices in the same time how the company installs in its lobby an expensive statue valued at a similar cost than the heart transplant. She weeps and regrets her decision. Two colleagues encourage her to complain on the inhumane attitude of the company's management, they promise to back her in the management's meeting.

Scarwood announces that they have acquired another company in Miami, its cash flow will improve because of the retirees, as many of them will die of age and the company will save their drugs and treatments, in short the bottom line will improve substantially. The colleagues decide not to back her, as they don't want to confront the CEO. Linda resigns and tells her children that she has done it for ethical reasons, as she doesn't want to find excuses why not to save lives. Linda's children and husband react to her resignation with mixed feelings as they need the money from her salary. They tell her the standard excuse: "Why didn't you stay in the company in order to fight from within for your ideas?" She asks her family to stand by her side but her husband tells her that she could at least have consulted him. She answers that if she would stay - something in her would have died, but Doug says that everybody has to pay a price. Doug is a doctor and says that today you need a business degree in order to practice.

In March 1988 Linda starts to work in Brothers Louisville Kentucky. Her friend Cheryl who worked with her at Humana finds her this job and tells her that this employer is much more receptive to the patients' needs. She says that there is a difference between a responsible action and greed. It is possible to deny requests for objective reasons and not in order to increase profitability. She checks herself every day in order not to transgress the lines. Their hospital is an NGO headed by Dr. Gershon and he is also one of the owners and managers of Brothers. Linda is contented with her job. But the parent company of Brothers is a Minnesota company that decides to inspect Linda's company after noticing that they lose a lot of money. Andrew McCullough is appointed as the new CEO and he tells the doctors that what will prevail from now on is only the bottom line. Cheryl resigns but Linda cannot as they have bought recently a new house. They have financial obligations. This time she'll stay with the company and tell what she thinks. Linda receives a case of a nurse who is paralyzed and cannot communicate with anyone, named Dawn Dubose. She received a severe stroke at the age of 31 and needs infinite treatments. Cheryl is replaced by Gemma Coombs who works in unison with the new boss. The CEO tells Linda (who cooperated with him to his satisfaction in another issue) that she must find a way to get rid of Dawn. She costs a lot and her case is lost anyhow, and besides they can devote the limited resources to better applications.

Linda tells her husband that she has reached the same crossroad as before, but she cannot understand why. It is an NGO, the doctors should care about their patients and they are the owners of the company. But they tell her that they cannot afford her high moral standards. Linda meets a lawyer Paul Sheinberg and tells him that she has approved the request for treatment of the child represented by him, but he shows her a letter of refusal of her company. She understands that Gemma has overruled her decision although she reports to Linda, probably with the backing of McCullough. This is unethical and she asks the lawyer what to do. He tells her that he is studying now Ethics in Louisville College and he gives her the book by Thomas Martin studied in the course. Linda confronts Gemma in a management meeting and tells her that if she overrules her decisions another time she will fire her. Linda tells Paul that she cannot make decisions against her moral judgment. She makes a presentation to the management on a computer that can assist Dawn to communicate with her surroundings. It could lower their costs if they approve to purchase it as Dawn would tell what she needs and they'll save a lot of unnecessary costs. Linda approves the purchase of the computer for Dawn but has to resign subsequently.

Linda meets a nun from Loretta convent on the plane and gives to the nuns a lecture on her experience in Medicare. She senses that if something wouldn't be done the situation would only deteriorate. In March 1993 a small child was sent to a distant hospital where his insurance company Kaiser gets a discount of 15%, in spite of his critical condition. Linda appears on TV in the program Date Line and says that such cases should not occur in a country with the best Medicare. The child's family sues the company and wins. Linda tells the audience that the purpose of the insurance company is to make profits and not to give adequate treatments to its clients. The TV station is submerged with heated responses of the public. Linda speaks vehemently against Humana and other companies and Humana asks her to retract what she said. Her husband has contracts with Humana and he is afraid that he'll lose them if she doesn't retract. He is not willing to back her crusade. Linda receives many telephone threats that if she'll continue her campaign her family will suffer from it. The lawyer of a policeman asks her to be an expert witness against Humana in a case where the company refuses to give expensive treatments to the policeman's daughter who suffers from mental retardation. The nun urges Linda to abide Hippocrates's oath and help the patients. Linda receives anonymously a proof on her husband's unfaithfulness and he admits it. Her daughter urges her not to give evidence as it will ruin her father's practice, but Linda says that she made compromises for 15 years for her husband's sake but now she has to do what she seems right. She separates from her husband because of his unfaithfulness.

Linda agrees to be a witness on behalf of the policeman's daughter. She is the only one to do so and all the others are afraid from Humana. Linda is from now on perceived as a whistleblower. She knows how to attack those companies as she worked there. She didn't think that they would take so personally her testimony but for those unethical companies money is very personal. Dawn sends her a touching letter thanking her for enabling her to have at last a voice and to be able to communicate with the world. Linda explains to the court how the doctors receive bonuses if they manage to diminish the expensive treatments. The companies have an incentive to receive only clients that would increase their profitability. Humana wanted to save millions by getting rid of 31 chronic patients who were in the policemen's insurance policy. They wanted to get rid of the problematic children. Because of Linda's testimony the policeman receives a compensation of $78.5M from Humana. Humana appealed the decision on the high damages. The parties settled outside court. Linda comes to visit Dawn who thanks her for finding a voice but Linda tells her that she should thank her as she assisted her to find her inner voice. She promises her to continue until she will be heard.

Linda appears before the Health subcommittee of the American Congress. She confesses that in 1987 as a doctor she caused the death of a man because she refused to approve a heart's transplant. This case, as well as others, have affected her soul, but the distance was great and the anonymity of the patient eased her conscience (this reinforces the need for personification as a vehicle for ethical behavior). To ease her conscience she was told that she didn't prevent treatment, she only prevented payment. Now she is not willing to agree anymore to these double standards. History shows what happens when systems operate without transparency, they need to be inspected and fully transparent, otherwise many more deaths and suffering will happen until the public will find the courage to change the course of action.

2.12 GREED UNLIMITED - THE ENRON CASE - THE FILM "THE CROOKED E" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on Articles and Internet material on Enron.

Based on the book Anatomy of Greed, The Unshredded Truth from an Enron Insider (2002) by Brian Cruver

The film is based on the book with slight changes:

The Crooked E, the Unshredded Truth about Enron, TV 2003, 100 min., Director Penelope Spheeris, with Christian Kane and Brian Dennehy

Summary and Analysis:

Some basics about Enron: At the end of 2001 Enron went bankrupt, the largest bankruptcy ever in the US. 10,000 employees lost their job. $25 billion were lost. Thousands lost their pension and life savings. The film describes the story of the junior managers, not the sharks. Brian Cruver, a young manager who started working at Enron in the beginning of 2001, has received a values education in his Texan hometown, discerning between right and wrong. When Brian starts working at Enron the share price is $55.70. Working at Enron was a dream come through as he learned at the university all about Enron and its success, it was the best company and everybody envied him for working there with very high salaries. Enron was no. 7 in the US and wanted to become no. 1. The company started in the energy industry but in 2001 80% of its turnover came from intangible assets. Brian hears at the introductory meeting that in order to ensure the integrity of the company they took the prestigious Audit firm Arthur Andersen. Ken Lay is the founder and Chairman of the Board and Jeff Skilling is the CEO. In Enron they believe in RICE - Respect, Integrity, Communications and Excellence. Slogans, public relations, one of the best ethical codes... Enron is innovative, ambitious, bold. Enron plays by the rules, keeps its promises, is fair, stand by its words, that's the Enron way.

But words aside, the executives are motivated by an aggressive system of bonuses based on the profitability of the company, or to be more precise on the actualization of future profits, even if they are very doubtful and spread over ten years, but are included in this year results. The policy is based on image, perception, how you are perceived by everyone and not how you really are. A lot of brainwashing to the customers, creditors, shareholders and employees. Enron contributes generous donations to the Bush administration and lends its plane to Bush. Brian works in the bankruptcy department that gives insurance on bankruptcy of key clients. How ironic and presumptuous from a company that went bankrupt in the same year. In a conversation with Mr Blue, an Enron key executive, he tells Brian that Enron is the Wild West, outer space, there is no limit to Enron besides the limits it sets to itself. Unfortunately it proved to be true, as there was no limit to the crookedness of its dealings. Here again we hear militaristic terms such as "they don't take prisoners", "they can do everything and it doesn't matter at what cost". An indication to unethical companies is among others an unlimited expense account. The junior managers spend $500 on a lunch. They are married to Enron and their partners come only after Enron. Brian's relations with his fiancée deteriorate as she doesn't fit the mentality. The secretaries are ex-strippers, Playboy's playgirls of the month, the morality of the key executives is very slack, most of them are remarried with younger women.

The temptation is very high. There are executives who received bonuses of tens of millions of dollars on fictitious sales and profits. All of it with the supervision of Arthur Andersen. Cruver learns that Enron owes billions but nobody cares. The creditors continue to give Enron credit and the system continues to operate without any boy who says that the king is naked. But there is a whistleblower Sherron Watkins, VP, who tells Ken Lay about the dubious partnerships, but Lay doesn't respond, as of course he knew it all. Ken Lay advocates full transparency. He reports on fantastic sales and profits, but he sells shares at high prices, overall more than $200M, while he tells others to buy Enron's shares. The SEC starts to investigate on transactions with related parties, where ultimately Enron hid all its operational losses. But the basic question is how comes that the SEC started to investigate almost at the end when it was too late to remedy the situation. Here again we see the difference between ethics and the law. Legally most of what they did was right (of course the shredding of material evidence was illegal, but you can't prove something that was shredded, as a material witness who gets murdered by the Mafia cannot testify). They were backed up by AA and by the best lawyers, but ethically they were wrong.

Clifford Baxter, Vice Chairman of Enron's Board, committed suicide (or was murdered) in January 2002. He complained before the collapse to Skilling the CEO about the dubious transactions with related parties and Sherron Watkins says that he was of the utmost integrity. Ken Lay was convicted on May 2006 on his call to investors to buy shares while he knew of the company's problems who were not disclosed properly. He died on July 2006. Skilling, who resigned a few months before bankruptcy (he was CEO only for a few months) was convicted on May 2006 of 19 counts of fraud and was sentenced to 24 years in prison. Richard Causey, Enron's controller was sentenced in 2006 to 5.5 years in prison. Andrew Fastow, Enron's CFO, admitted in January 2004 to two charges of conspiracy and is the highest ranked executive of Enron who became state's witness. He was sentenced to 6 years in prison. 21 Enron executives were convicted. The draconic Sarbanes-Oxley Act was enacted in 2002, following the Enron scandal, giving fines of up to $20M and jail sentences of up to 20 years on fraud. Enron who had a turnover of $100 billion before its collapse in 2001 remained with only $12 billion in assets to distribute to more than 20,000 creditors. Stephen Cooper, the company's interim CEO, said the bankruptcy reorganization plan has the backing of 80% of creditors. Creditors are seeking to recover more than $200 billion but only $67 billion of that amount is justified. The amount of assets available to creditors would grow if Cooper succeeds with a mega claim against leading banks that helped Enron create complex deals to hide debt and inflate cash flow. The largest group of creditors would receive 14.4% of their debt. On September 2006, Enron sold Prisma Energy its last remaining business, according to the final restructuring plan submitted to the bankruptcy court. 9.4 billion dollars were distributed to creditors, 26% of all the justified claims.

Enron shareholders, whose investments in Enron were worth $60 billion in 2000 have been virtually wiped out and would receive nothing under the bankruptcy reorganization plan. Cruver shows how the small investor is lured to buy Enron's shares, secretaries investing all their savings, ordinary people who lose time after time because of criminals who tell them to invest money in their companies while they are selling their shares. Enron's top executives say that in Enron everybody wins. Is it true, who wins and who loses? A few months before the collapse Enron discloses (casually) an extraordinary loss of $1 billion. This loss was hidden in the complex structure built by Fastow. A similar way of hiding operational losses was discovered by me in one of my case studies of an American company who reached a multibillion dollar valuation hiding its losses in extraordinary restructuring charges. I made a comparison between my books and the rules of wrongdoing minority shareholders that I have discovered and Enron which validated the rules. Creative accounting, whistleblowers, collaboration of auditors, sales of shares by executives just before the collapse, Omerta cover-up etc. are at the backbone of the cases and research, Enron just made it blow-up. And in all the cases those who food the bill are the minority shareholders, the ordinary employees, the community and the creditors. Mr. Blue confesses to Cruver ultimately that management received inflated bonuses based on unrealistic profits. Executives told investors to buy shares when they sold them. What made the company go around was sheer greed. It was the globalization of stupidity. In Enron it was forbidden to report on problems, those who did it were transferred and because of it there were many accidents and tens of people died. The system was conceived in order to enrich very few people at the expense of masses of shareholders and employees. They bribed politicians, the auditors, the media. He admits that he is guilty and that all of them were cheap immoral speculators. He estimates that there are still thousands of Enrons. After they discover another debt of $2.5 billion the company collapses, most of employees are fired. Cruver returns to the basic values of integrity and ethics, and publishes the book.

2.13 TRANSPARENCY, ETHICS AND THE MEDIA – Dr. JEFFREY WIGAND AND THE TOBACCO INDUSTRY - THE FILM "THE INSIDER" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the film:

The Insider, 1999, 157 min., Director Michael Mann, with Al Pacino and Russel Crowe

Summary and Analysis:

The fact that the film is based on a true story increases the credibility of the film. The film starts with a scene where Lowell Bergman, the producer of 60 minutes, succeeds in obtaining an interview by Mike Wallace with the leader of the Hizballah, based on the program's reputation, integrity and objectivity. There are excellent working relations between Wallace and Bergman in the famous CBS program "60 minutes".

Dr Jeffrey Wigand had a senior position in one of the largest tobacco companies Brown Williamson, where he was VP R&D, but he feels an outsider socially in the company where he is employed. Is it one of the reasons why he decides to become a whistleblower? We should remember that Dr Stockmann in An Enemy of the People was very sociable and that didn't help him when his conduct was opposed to the interests of his friends. We should bear in mind also the consideration of the disease of his daughter in Wigand's ethical decisions. The film shows the phases that Wigand undergoes until he decides to become a whistleblower. After he arrives to the conclusion that the company introduces addictive ingredients to the cigarettes he decides to quit as this conduct is against his conscience. He is faced with the dilemma: what is more imperative for him - adherence to the law and the confidentiality agreement or adherence to his conscience? He cannot conceal the reason of the death of hundred of thousands people as the result of the tobacco company's conduct. Wigand brings as an example the conduct of Johnson & Johnson, where he worked in the past, who lost in the Tylenol case huge amounts when they decided not to risk the life of their customers when a lunatic introduced poison to a few capsules. In the BW case the management poisons deliberately its customers. As a scientist he can't agree to it. This conduct raises the question: Can a tobacco company be conceptually ethical when they poison their customers, even if they donate millions to humanitarian causes?

Mike Wallace is very much interested in interviewing Dr Wigand who is called "The Ultimate Insider". He is the Chief Scientist in the no. 3 tobacco company in the US. It is like blowing the whistle on an unsafe plane which puts at risk the life of its passengers. Wallace is warned that the tobacco companies will ruin CBS as they spend annually $600M in legal expenses. They have never lost in damages trials, but if court will compel Wigand to testify they will not be able to say that he has infringed his confidentiality agreement. Wigand is willing to lower his standard of living and become a teacher, but he is content with his decision, his wife unfortunately is not. Wigand's wife cannot stand the heat, the stress, the disease of their daughter, their lower standard of living. What is the character required for a whistleblower's wife? She decides to divorce Jeffrey while Stockmann's wife stands by him. This is due maybe to the methods of unethical companies to slander the whistleblowers, look for their unethical conduct, threaten and sue them.

Wigand accuses Bergman that he is a commodity for him. Retrospectively, is it true? What is the integrity required from journalists who should be transparent, can they desert or betray their sources? The film hints at a potential cooperation of the FBI with the tobacco company, which might be due to promises to FBI's agents to work in the future for the company. Is it possible to prohibit civil servants from going to work for companies? What are the risks of such conduct? The whistleblower needs to remain very cool, when the lawyers threaten him, when he could go to jail, when his family desert him, when he receives bullets in the mail... The lawyer of CBS points out that there are some doubts about the credibility of Wigand. As the truth is more considerable the threats are fiercer. The data of BW about addiction is theirs and if they win the case they could become the owners of CBS. No mention is made of ethics, the health and lives of millions, only financial risks

The owners of CBS want to sell the media company to Westinghouse and they do not want to stand the risk of getting a multibillion lawsuit that could jeopardize the merger. They therefore decide not to release the interview (the executives are about to benefit millions from the merger) and Wigand feels that Bergman has betrayed him. Bergman is called by CBS executives: fanatic, anarchist, and he answers them: "Are you journalists or businessmen?" Transparency limited. Bergman and Wallace take opposite standings as Wallace favors CBS's executives decision. Bergman's wife supports him and encourages him to leave the company. We witness the apologetics of Wallace who tells Bergman that he is at the end of his career and he doesn't want to be remembered as the one who destroyed CBS because of his interview. What about ethics, victims? Only ego, reputation and money. The tobacco companies paid in damages 246 billion dollars following this scandal. Wigand was elected the teacher of the year in Kentucky. Bergman lectures on journalism at Berkeley. Does it prove that whistleblowers cannot remain in the business world and can only teach?

2.14 ETHICAL ACTIVISM, ERIN BROCKOVICH VERSUS KAREN SILKWOOD - THE FILMS "ERIN BROCKOVICH" AND "SILKWOOD" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the films:

Erin Brockovich, 2000, 132 min, Director Steven Soderbergh, with Julia Roberts, Albert Finney

Silkwood, 1983, 131 min, Director Mike Nichols, with Meril Streep, Kurt Russell, Cher

ERIN BROCKOVICH

Summary:

The film is based on a true story. Erin is a single mother with three small children and a low income. She is injured in a car accident and hires Ed Masri to handle her case. Ed loses, because of her "big mouth", he says. Erin insists to work at Masri's law firm, and while filing some dossiers she discovers medical documents in real estate deals between home owners who lived in the vicinity of a plant owned by a large corporation PG&E. When she investigates the case, Erin discovers that PG&E tried to buy the houses in order to conceal the pollution of the water used by the residents who probably emanated from the factory. As a result of the pollution hundreds got sick with cancer and other diseases, but nobody thought that the cases were connected. She convinces Masri to handle the case and to sue the company on behalf of the victims. They agree and sign with Ed an agreement ensuring him a remuneration of 40% of the compensation on a success fee basis. Ed has liquidity problems handling the case and he decides to collaborate with a large law firm Potter, namely with two lawyers Kurt Potter and Theresa Dallavale. Erin resents it as they don't appreciate what she has achieved. Nevertheless, after they fail to convince the plaintiffs to an arbitration agreement she succeeds in obtaining the consent of all of them to the arbitration. The judge decides that PG&E should compensate the victims with $333M and Erin tells the good news to Dona Jensen, one of the victims.

Analysis:

The film emphasizes the importance of perception, image, looks, dress and conduct in the business world. Some of the issues raised by the film are: What is the nature of the relations between Ed Masri and Erin Brockovich? What is the nature of the charm of Erin on the victims of the polluted water? What is the attitude of Pacific Gas & Electric Corp. regarding the pollution of the water? Why don't the victims of pollution react until Erin starts her investigation? The film shows how Ethical Activism has become one of the modern vehicles to combat corrupted companies. We should "Beware of corrupted companies' presents", especially when they want to purchase the houses closest to the polluted water. We are faced by the dilemmas of Donna Jensen's family and their sicknesses.

Ultimately, the American system works quite well when it enables an ordinary woman without education to subdue a huge conglomerate. Could such a woman win a similar case in another country? Are class actions in other countries as successful as in the US? The investigation enables Erin to reach self fulfillment. Erin is a good example for all prejudiced people proving that you can look cheap but be extremely intelligent, with a fantastic memory, an outstanding detective aptitude, excellent convincing abilities, courage, and capacity of lashing her opponents. PGE tries to intimidate Masri and Brockovich with their sales turnover ($28 billion a year), their infinite resources, the seniority of their lawyers.

We ask ourselves if it is ethical that the lawyers in class actions charge even 40% of the compensation received, if they win the case. What is the risk that they incur? How can a small law firm cope with tycoons? How does Erin succeed to convince the assembly of the plaintiffs to agree to arbitration after she has convinced them to let Masri handle their case? Erin does not hesitate to take samples of polluted water running away from the security officers of PGE. She is not deterred by threats on her life and her kids. What are the qualities and type of character required from a whistleblower or an ethical activist? We can analyze the difference between the law firms of the case: the small Masri's and the large Potter's, as well as the difference between Erin's mode of conduct and Theresa Dallavale's, and why the latter cannot win the confidence of the victims. Another comparison is between the tragic fate of Silkwood to the success of Donna Jensen who receives assistance from Erin. What has changed in the last 20 years in the US, is it similar in other countries? We face the personification of wrongdoing, in the confrontation between Miss Sanchez, PGE's lawyer, and Erin who gives her drinking water from PGE and she refuses to drink.

This feminist film emphasized the change of roles between George, Erin's friend, who takes care of her children, and Erin who is the breadwinner of the family. Another facet is the generosity of Ed Masri who gives Erin a car, a high salary, and ultimately a bonus of $2M, beyond her brightest expectations. Is Masri a typical example of an American lawyer? Trust and Ethics are the secret weapons of Erin who comes from the people and remembers it. Instead of common belief that 'nothing is personal' Erin believes that everything is personal. Here again we have a whistleblower who comes to Erin, because of her charm, her dedication, his cousin's death, or all of those reasons. Finally, we see the courage of the American judge who is not fooled by the pomposity of PGE's lawyers and awards $333M to the plaintiffs. Would the judges in other countries behave similarly?

SILKWOOD

Summary and Analysis:

In a sharp contrast with Erin Brockovich we witness the tragic fate of Karen Silkwood, who was an activist employee. Karen Silkwood (Meryl Streep) died in 1974 trying to bring evidence on dangerous practices of a nuclear facility in Oklahoma and blow the whistle to a reporter from the New York Times. She was the only one who dared to oppose the nuclear energy company and help her fellow workers who got cancer from the contamination. The factory was finally closed shortly after her death. Silkwood may be perceived by some as "vulgar" but she develops a strong sense of social responsibility and she becomes a warrior with integrity who is not afraid to fight her own employer against all odds. Some of the key issues of the film are: the nature of the relations between Karen and Drew Stephens (Kurt Russell), the secret of the charm of Silkwood in her relations with her coworkers, the reporters, the close friends, the nature of the relations between Dolly Pelliker (Cher) and Karen, and we suspect that Dolly is responsible for turning in Karen to the company, thus causing her death.

The attitude of Kerr-McGee, the employer of Karen, towards the radioactive contamination of the workers in its plant is negative from the start, they try to conceal evidence, but the victims of contamination refuse to take any measure against the company until Karen starts to organize the protest. The workers receive an adequate treatment from the company's physicians but refuse to complain to the authorities, possibly because they are afraid, there is no chance anyhow to change things, they cannot prove anything, and they are afraid of unemployment. The film shows how Employee's and social activism is a modern vehicle to overcome unethical activities. We witness the inner struggle of Karen who wanders if her body was contaminated on purpose by the company because she was perceived as a troublemaker. But she is not afraid, as she believes that what she does is right.

The American Justice system in 1974 was incapable to find evidence on the murder of Karen Silkwood and on the contamination by the company. However, a huge difference has occurred in the system since those times to today, as illustrated by Erin Brockovich. The company tried to intimidate Karen, threaten her, silence her. They are ready to do anything as they are driven only by one motive - greed and maximization of profits at the expense of the workers's health, the community and the stakeholders. The company buys the silence of the lambs which is connected with the uneducated background of the workers and the unemployment in the community. One wonder: What are the chances of a simple worker as Silkwood to fight against a large company, having unlimited resources, the best lawyers, political connections in every place? What are the nuances in the attitudes to life between Karen and Drew? Why does Silkwood have a social responsibility motivation and her employers have none?

The attitude of the Media to the struggle of Silkwood is ambivalent, so is the attitude of the labor unions to the struggle of Silkwood. Silkwood dies because she was a pawn in the power struggles of the media and the unions. But Silkwood's death was not in vain. Karen knew that she was endangering her life and didn't listen to Drew's advices to let it off. She was ready to go the extra mile in order to fight for her beliefs, even if she didn't receive gratitude from the workers, the unions, the press and the friends.

Silkwood pays the full price as a whistleblower, the ultimate price. She is murdered as many others before. But her death attracts publicity. Tens of years before - nobody would even speak of her death, tens of years after - her struggle would be fruitful. There is an evolution in the struggle of the stakeholders, in democracy, consumerism, quality, human rights, ecology, fight against poverty, end of wars, giving hope that the social responsibility and ethical struggle will prevail. And the film ends with the unforgettable Requiem of Silkwood, how she separates from Drew and her labor unions colleagues, the car accident and her grave. We hear only the spiritual befitting to a popular heroine as Silkwood coming from the people and working for them, with social responsibility.

2.15 ECOLOGY AND ETHICS - THE FILM AND THE BOOK "A CIVIL ACTION", THE WOBURN CONTAMINATION CASE - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the book A Civil Action (1995) by Jonathan Harr

The film is based on the book with slight changes:

A Civil Action, 1998, 112 min., Director Steven Zaillian, with John Travolta, Robert Duvall

Summary and Analysis:

The families of children who died from leukemia sue two companies for dumping toxic waste, a tort very expensive to prove. Jan Schlichtmann, a tenacious lawyer, is addressed by the families of the victims. When investigating the seemingly non-profit case, he finds it to be a major environmental issue that has a lot of impact potential. A leather production company is found to be responsible for the deadly cases of leukemia, but it is also the main employer of the area. Jan Schlichtmann and his colleagues set out to have the company forced to decontaminate the affected areas in Woburn, Massachusetts and to sue a major sum of compensation. But the lawyers of the leather parent company are not easy to get to and soon Jan and his firm find themselves in a battle of mere survival. The case becomes Jan's obsession to the extent that he is willing to give up everything - his career and his clients' goals - in order to continue the case against all odds.

In 1982, a case was filed in Massachusetts district court which would become one of the most complicated and controversial in American legal history. The story begins ten years earlier with the death of Jimmy Anderson from leukemia. When Jimmy's mother discovered that several other children in her neighborhood suffered from the same disease, she came to believe that the area's notoriously foul drinking water was to blame. After years of false starts, a 1979 finding that local wells were contaminated by toxic solvents opened the door for legal action. The families that had lost children joined together in a law suit against two Fortune 500 companies (WR Grace and Beatrice Foods) believed to be the source of the contamination. Helping document the bitter, controversial and long battle are attorneys from both sides, bereaved parents and Judge Walter Skinner. What can we say about the objectivity of Skinner, his preferences to the lawyers of one side or the other, what is the reason of his attitude? What can we say about the conduct of Facher, has he any moral criteria? What is the background of his behavior - ambition, greed, hate of Jan, ego, contempt to the weak parties? What can we say about the conduct of the victims, when do they decide to fight? The leadership of Mrs. Anderson, the reason they choose Jan, do they trust him, does he deliver the goods?

Jan commits a professional suicide. His obsession works finally against his clients as against his own interests. Why does he continue to do so against all odds? Instead of celebrating the law, the story is a maddening look at the elusiveness of the courtroom case. When Jan and his friends descend into the case, the unbridled sense of power and money is abandoned. This case is ultimately about survival, ecological and personal. Is money the only reward for lost or broken lives? What is more important for the victims - compensation, punishment, cleaning the ecology of their neighborhood? Facher and the manager of the leather company are very humane, they are not love-to-hate persons. Facher represents the law at its brilliant foundation - to best represent one's client. The leather company manager is very convincing in his argumentation that he is a pillar of society, his family worked there for generations, he gives employment, he wants to earn money disregarding any other goals. Both of them despise ethical argumentation and perceive the victims and their lawyers as blackmailers who want to make money from their children's death at the expense of their companies. Both of them have a clear conscience to the end.

The film and the book leave you wondering how such injustices continue to occur in America. After all the legislation on ecological matters, we discover that ultimately with good lawyers and insensitive judges you could win a case even if you are guilty, as the weak parties - the victims and their second rate lawyers - have no chance to combat the corrupted companies with their highest paid lawyers and unlimited funds. The film captures the irony of lawyers at their best and their worst.

Jan Schilchtmann is the hottest young lawyer in Boston. He will do anything to win a case. He is a personal claims lawyer, very cynical and manipulative, stating that "whites are worth more than blacks, men more than women, the rich more than the poor and a long agonizing death over a quick one, a white male professional in his forties in his prime earning potential is worth the most and a dead child is worth least at all". Yet he decides to litigate with two huge conglomerates in order to compensate the families of children who died from leukemia, a charge that is very difficult to prove. Jan has therefore a very complex personality or alternatively the reason of his conduct is his transfiguration. The families believe that money is not the point and they just want that the companies will acknowledge their responsibility and apologize to them.

But as corporations apologize with money and they have deep pockets, it is a case worth taking for Jan in a civil action. Jan with his limited team and funds fights the huge corporations and gets personally involved which is lethal for a lawyer as for a doctor. He shows empathy, which is a grave disservice to the legal profession because it clouds his judgment. The lawyers teeter on the waterfalls of bankruptcy to the point of mortgaging their homes. It has become a source of pride, ego, which is opposed to the recommended conduct of a lawyer as prescribed by Facher at his law class.

Facher, the attorney for Beatrice, is a statesman-like man of experience, but has a isolated yet eccentric personality. He is a knowledgeable man and his observation on the justice system is true, but at times appalling. When Jan tells him he is searching for the truth, he tells him: "You've been around long enough to know that the courtroom is not the place to look for the truth". And he truthfully says that the case stopped being about children the moment Schlichtmann filed for action. Facher is the complete opposite of Jan. The frugal Facher is not impressed by any of the lawyers or their arguments but the free pen that he can take home. The book and the film present the feelings and priorities of those injured by the negligence of a corporation. The characters evolve during the story understanding what is important and what is superficial. The greedy Jan grows a conscience and starts out on a quest to defend the less privileged.

The book and film are based on true events exposing the American legal system bare, it shows the impartial brutality of the adversarial system, and how one mans flaws can be amplified by that system, until they consume not only him, but all those around him. Trials and lawsuits are examples of how corrupt and rotten the legal system and some lawyers are. Is it worth having a system where the first party to come to their senses (to cut their losses and call for a settlement) is the loser? A Civil Action also shows that despite the need for compassion it is better to have a lawyer who thinks more with the head than the heart. The film, but even more so the book, show the price of justice and how justice is understood in the legal process. In fact, it draws a very fine dichotomy between ethical and legal justice and shows how hard it is to get justice in a legal setting. That is why ethics is so important as it does not have the drawbacks of the legal system and ethical considerations can remain pure. The moral of the story is that we should be grateful for people who are willing to go to extreme lengths, at great personal cost, to define justice on their own terms and to fight for it.

If we compare A Civil Action to Erin Brockovich we can analyze what were the reasons that Erin without any legal experience can win a case which is very similar to the case that Jan has not succeeded to win. But still, he had a limited success, although he did not collaborate as closely as Erin did with the victims. Erin had also Ed Masri and Potter to balance her impulses while Jan worked almost alone and even if his colleagues tried to influence him they did not succeed. Maybe the reason is that Erin's conduct was not motivated at all by greed but by compassion while Jan's conduct was motivated at least in the beginning by greed. Ecology is the great winner of the case. The pollution of the water of Woburn has ceased completely and the soil was cleaned from the toxic materials. The river was cleaned and the area has become a park for recreation to the inhabitants of Woburn. But it will take thousands of years to clean completely the area although it took only a few years to pollute it. The companies paid huge amounts for the cleaning process instead of fully compensate the victims. Or maybe, this is justice, as the goal of the families was not to get compensation for the lives of their children as there is no compensation for that but just to prevent that such cases will not occur in the future and will not kill other children. They have succeeded in obtaining these goals as the case hastened the legislation on ecological issues, just as the Enron bankruptcy brought about the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

2.16 ETHICAL DILEMMAS OF MULTINATIONALS AND STAKEHOLDERS – McDONALD'S AND THE FILM "McLIBEL" - SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Based on the film:

McLibel, 2005, 85 min., Director Franny Armstrong, on McDonald's libel suit in the UK

McDonald's used the UK libel laws to suppress criticism of the press and activist organizations. The BBC and The Guardian apologized to McDonald's. But then the multinational sued gardener Helen Steel and postman Dave Morris. They refused to give in to McDonald's. In the longest trial in English legal history, the two underdogs represented themselves against McDonald's £10 million legal team. Every aspect of the corporation's business was cross-examined: from junk food and McJobs, to animal cruelty, environmental damage and advertising to children. Outside the courtroom, Dave brought up his young son alone and Helen supported herself working nights in a bar. McDonald's tried every trick against them, such as legal manoeuvres, top executives flying to London for secret settlement negotiations, and even spies. Seven years later, in February 2005, the marathon legal battle finally concluded at the European Court of Human Rights. And the result took everyone by surprise - especially the British Government. The two Don Quixotes won on every account. The film is about the importance of freedom of speech now that multinational corporations are more powerful than countries. Filmed over ten years by no-budget Director Franny Armstrong, McLibel is the David and Goliath story of two people who refused to say sorry. And in doing so, they changed the world.

Beginning in 1986, "London Greenpeace", a small environmental campaigning group distributed a pamphlet entitled What's wrong with McDonald's: Everything they don't want you to know. This publication made a number of allegations against McDonald's, including that the corporation sells unhealthy food; exploits its workers; practices unethical marketing of its products, in particular towards children; is cruel to animals; needlessly uses up resources; contributes to poverty in the Third World by forcing peasants either to leave their land in favour of export crops which could satisfy McDonald's needs, or to convert their land to raise cattle; creates pollution with its packaging; and is partly responsible for destroying the South American rain forests. In 1990, McDonald's responded by bringing libel proceedings against five London Greenpeace supporters, Paul Gravett, Andrew Clarke and Jonathan O'Farrell, as well as Steel and Morris, for distributing the pamphlet on the streets of London. Gravett, Clarke and O'Farrell apologised Steel and Morris, on the other hand, refused to back down and decided to fight the case.

The trial began in June 1994 and became the longest civil case in British history. In England the defendants had to prove that the criticisms of the leaflet were true. Morris was an out-of-work postal employee from Tottenham and Steel a community gardener for Haringey Borough Council. Furthermore, they were denied Legal Aid by the courts on the basis that it wasn't policy for libel cases. Although the pair were deemed no legal match for McDonald's enormous legal assets, they represented themselves, receiving much free legal advice, and doing enormous amounts of research in their spare time; they would eventually call 180 witnesses to prove their assertions about food poisoning, unpaid overtime, misleading claims about how much McDonald's recycled, and even about how McDonald's hired "corporate spies sent to infiltrate the ranks of London Greenpeace". McDonald's spent millions of pounds, while the protesters had £30,000 raised from public donations. The lack of funds meant Morris and Steel were not able to call all the witnesses they wanted, especially witnesses from South America who would have testified in support of the claims about the destruction of the rainforest.

The corporation found itself on trial before the British people and the world, particularly with regard to those claims involving labour practices and the nutritional content of McDonald's food. The case became a media circus, especially when top McDonald's executives were forced to take the stand and be questioned by the two non-lawyers. In June 1995, McDonald's offered to settle the case (which "was coming up to its first anniversary in court") by donating a large sum of money to a charity chosen by the two; in addition, they would drop the case if Steel and Morris agreed to "stop criticising McDonald's". Steel and Morris secretly recorded the meeting, in which McDonald's executives said the pair could criticise McDonald's privately to friends but must cease talking to the media or distributing leaflets. Steel and Morris wrote a letter in response saying they would agree to the terms if McDonald's ceased advertising its products and instead only recommended the restaurant privately to friends.

On 19 June 1997, Mr Justice Bell delivered a more than 1000-page decision largely in favour of McDonald's, summarised by a 45-page paper read in court. Steel and Morris had proven the truth of three fifths of the claims in the original leaflet but were found guilty of libel on several points. Although a legal victory for McDonald's, the case had long since been deemed a Pyrrhic victory for the company, as Bell's decision found that the defendants proved many of the points made in the London Greenpeace pamphlet. Thus, Bell noted that McDonald's did endanger the health of their workers and customers by "misleading advertising", that they "exploit children", that they are "culpably responsible" in the infliction of unnecessary cruelty to animals, and that they are "antipathetic" to unionisation and pay their workers low wages. Furthermore, although the decision awarded £60,000 to the company, McDonald's legal costs were much greater, and the defendants lacked the funds to pay it. Steel and Morris immediately appealed the decision. Worse, evidence that surfaced during the trial regarding McDonald's business practices proved extremely embarrassing for the company. It has been estimated that the case has cost McDonald's £10,000,000.

The European Court of Human Rights ruled in 2005 that "McLibel" environmental campaigners David Morris and Helen Steel should have been given legal aid by the British government. The British legal system breached the right to a fair trial and freedom of expression, the European judges said. The Strasbourg-based court ordered Britain to pay Morris and Steel a total of 35,000 euros and offer them a retrial. In its ruling, the court said the denial of state legal aid to the defendants, a part-time barmaid and an unemployed single father, had skewed the case from the start. "The denial of legal aid to the applicants had deprived them of the opportunity to present their case effectively before the court and contributed to an unacceptable inequality of arms with McDonald's," it wrote. The ruling also argued there was "a strong public interest in enabling such groups and individuals outside the mainstream to contribute to the public debate." This verdict was the end of a courtroom fight in which the pair accused the British government of breaching their human rights because British law denies libel defendants legal aid, and because the libel laws obliged them to justify every word of anti-McDonald's allegations contained in the leaflets they distributed.

The 2005 film quoted McDonald's as offering little comment on the European Court decision other than to point out that it was the Government and not McDonalds who was the losing party and that "times have changed and so has McDonald's." When the heroes of this saga left the Court they were applauded by the public. They have made their point by convincing the public that the issue will not be settled by the court but by public opinion. The media interviewed them and the public appreciated their struggle for transparency and maintenance of the public's rights versus the multinationals. The film juxtaposes the interview with Helen and David and the interview with the General Manager of McDonald's in the UK. Activism has won and proved who is the real "giant".

In response to public pressure, McDonald's has sought to include more healthy choices in its menu and has introduced a new slogan to its recruitment posters: "Not bad for a McJob". The word McJob, first attested in the mid-1980s and later popularized by Canadian novelist Douglas Coupland in his book Generation X, has become a buzz word for low-paid, unskilled work with few prospects or benefits and little security. McDonald's disputes the idea that its restaurant jobs have no prospects, noting that its CEO, Jim Skinner, started working at the company as a regular restaurant employee, and that 20 of its top 50 managers began work as regular crew members. In a bid to tap into growing consumer interest in the provenance of food, the fast-food chain recently switched its supplier of both coffee beans and milk. UK chief executive Steve Easterbrook said: "British consumers are increasingly interested in the quality, sourcing and ethics of the food and drink they buy". McDonald's coffee is now brewed from beans taken from stocks that have been certified by the Rainforest Alliance, a conservation group. Similarly, milk supplies used for its hot drinks and milkshakes have been switched to organic sources which could account for 5% of the UK's organic milk output.

McDonald's announced on May 22, 2008 that, in the U.S. and Canada, it will be introducing cooking oil for its french fries that contains no trans fats. The company will use canola-based oil with corn and soy oils by year's end for its baked items, pies and cookies. In April 2008, McDonald's announced that 11 of its Sheffield restaurants have been using a biomass trial that had cut its waste and carbon footprint by half in the area. In this trial, waste from the restaurants were collected by Veolia Environmental Services and used to produce energy at a power plant. McDonald's plans to expand this project, although the lack of biomass power plants in the U.S. will prevent this plan from becoming a national standard anytime soon. In addition, in Europe, McDonald's has been recycling vegetable grease by converting it to fuel for their diesel trucks.

2.17 GLOBALIZATION MODELS OF NIKE & OTHER MULTINATIONALS - THE DOCUMENTARY FILM "THE BIG ONE" - SUMMARY & ANALYSIS

Based on the film:

The Big One, 1997, 91 min., Director Michael Moore

The film The Big One, a funny odyssey movie follows Michael Moore's tour to promote his book on downsizing, one of the worst plague of the century's end, plumbing the depths of corporate America. Moore criticizes in his book the conduct of Nike and Procter & Gamble towards their employees and those of their subcontractors. The boom in the economy and globalization is followed by downsizing and reliance on temporary employees, with very low salaries and no social benefits. Moore encountered a different picture of America from the one painted by large U.S. corporations which boasted that profits were up, unemployment was down and the stock market was booming. "Every city I went to, people would tell me stories," says Moore. "Stories about how their company just posted a record profit and they lost their job; about how they had to work two jobs and still couldn't make enough to get by. Everyone was afraid they'd be downsized next. It was clear that even though things were better for corporate America, the 'good-times' were not trickling down to the rest of the country." We should remember Joseph Stiglitz's comments on the fallacy of the neo liberals that the boom is trickling down to the lower-paid workers. In fact workers pay always the price – in economic booms as plants are relocated to low-cost countries and in recessions as workers because of lay-offs and unemployment.

Moore invites Nike's CEO Phil Knight to visit with him one of his Indonesian subcontractor's company. When he declines his offer, Moore urges him to open a shoe factory in Flint, Michigan, devastated by the downsizing of General Motors' factories. Knight declines this offer as well. Moore's film gives voice to well-reasoned arguments that have most easily gotten lost amid the Clinton-era boom's corporate downsizing and reliance on "temporary" employees. In cities like Des Moines, Minneapolis, St. Louis, and Portland, The film juxtaposes Moore's deeply biting humor speaking before bookstore patrons and confrontations with security personnel at companies such as Procter & Gamble. Moore speaks clandestinely with Borders employees organizing a union. The film is not merely about downsizing, it is a severe critique on globalization and its most salient models – Nike and Procter & Gamble, just as the film "Bad Seed" is a critique on the model of Monsanto. Moore concludes, "I set out to make a funny, entertaining and hopefully enlightening movie about what I saw on my trip across America. Ultimately I hope it will give people a chance to have a good cathartic laugh, and know that they're not alone, that however good things are for corporations, most Americans are just like them... I hope people leave the theaters laughing and shaking their fists, not in despair but in outrage. A democracy is, after all, only as good as its participants. If it becomes a spectator sport, it's all over."

In her article "Michael Moore, Sticking Out Like a Sore Thumb", Rita Kempley, Washington Post Service, published by the International Herald Tribune on April 23, 1998, writes: "Michael Moore has done for documentary films what Whiz did for cheese: made the dry form accessible, fun even, for the ordinary Joe or Jane, the very audience the native son of Flint, Michigan, wants to reach and aims to please. The writer, director and raconteur, who shambled onto the scene as the impudent protagonist of "Roger & Me," is up to his old tricks in "The Big One," a scathingly funny look at corporate hubris and political bombast. Some critics have suggested that "The Big One" refers to the 270-pound filmmaker, who shot the picture during a promotional tour for his book, "Downsize This!," then goes and appears in virtually every scene. But Moore begs to disagree: "If I were writing the review, I would say this is a selfless film by a guy who could have taken the money from 'Roger & Me' and gone on and made goofy summer-camp movies. I got offered a million dollars to do a Dunkin' Donuts commercial a couple of weeks ago." No question he turned Dunkin' down... Documentary filmmakers are trained to follow a script or a theme, Moore explains. He decided to follow the schedule set by his publisher, Random House, and see what happened. "Nothing was planned in advance. The week we show up in St. Louis is the last week for those Payday workers. The day I shot in Milwaukee, we're getting lunch in the food court at the Mall of America and meet the ex-con who was a TWA reservations clerk while he was in jail." While the guerrilla filmmaker makes his patented house calls on various corporate executives, all but one are as elusive as General Motors' chairman, Roger Smith, whom Moore pursued with such hilarious futility in his 1989 debut, "Roger & Me." Astonishingly, the chairman of Nike, Phil Knight, one of Moore's "favorite corporate crooks," invited him over to the Nike campus for a strange and unguarded pair of interviews. Knight, who genuinely seems to believe in Nike's altruism, must have imagined he could justify his company's practices and his own dubious sentiments. Asked to justify the export of U.S. jobs overseas and its use of underpaid, underage laborers, Knight doesn't miss a beat. "Americans just don't want to make shoes," he says."

And like the McLibel case and many other activist cases the film The Big One resulted in a change of policy from Nike. In a stunning announcement on May 12, 1998, Phil Knight, CEO of Nike, declared that the minimum age of footwear factory workers in Indonesia would be raised to 18 years of age. The decision changes a history of child labor in Indonesia, where, according to watchdog groups, factory workers have been found as young as twelve years old. "I congratulate Nike and Phil Knight on the brave decision to raise the minimum age of factory workers," says Mr. Moore. "In making 'The Big One', I hoped that we could change social policy at one of the world's largest employers. I did not expect the change to happen this quickly."

The visits to East and West Germany were when they were separate countries, to Hong Kong when it was a British colony. There were also short stays in Iceland, Ireland, etc, visits in territories in dispute: Golan Heights – Syria, West Bank – Jordan, etc, and visits along the borders of Turkish Cyprus, Lebanon, Laos, Burma-Myanmar, China, etc.

All 60+ visits to countries were for Tourism (residence – Egypt, France, Israel), visits to 25 countries were for Business, visit to 12 countries were for – Academic, including studies at the Lycee in Egypt, studies up to BA in Israel, MBA & PhD in France, German studies in Germany, seminars in U.S.A., Switzerland, Israel, France..., Teaching and Lecturing in France, Singapore, Israel, Italy...

I am not the ultimate cosmopolitan, 60 countries may sound a lot, but I visited most of the countries for short visits of a few days and only once. I never relocated and stayed in Israel from the age of 9, more than 60 years, with a one year break when I studied at Insead, in Fontainebleau near Paris, France, in 1967/1968. The short stays of a day to a few days were in: Venezuela, Argentina, Brazil, all the African countries stated above except Egypt, Hong Kong, Japan, Vatican, Hungary, Czech Republic, Slovenia, East Germany, Austria, Sweden, Finland, Russia, Estonia, Andorra, Serbia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Republika Srpska, Montenegro, Albania, Macedonia, Bulgaria and Romania. I have stayed for a week, two weeks and up to a month in: Peru, Turkey, Thailand, Australia, New Zealand, Portugal, Monaco, Cyprus, Croatia, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, and Norway. I have stayed for more than a month up to a few months in aggregate in: Canada, Taiwan, Singapore, Spain, Italy, Greece, Switzerland, West Germany/Germany, and United Kingdom. I have stayed in Egypt for 9 years, in France in the aggregate about two years, in the US in the aggregate about a year, and in Israel – about 60 years less than the periods that I traveled abroad, and short visits to the West Bank and Golan Heights.

If I accumulated all the long periods that I stayed in the US on business and tourism, or visiting my son's family, it would amount to about a year, with long stays of 3 to 6 weeks. I worked with a group of 26 people on a contract with a large aerospace company at Fort Worth for 5 weeks, I traveled for months when my company got public and raised money on an IPO, in New York and on a road show from coast to coast, I acquired a company in Boston and spent weeks in negotiations and as a member of the Board of Directors of the subsidiary. I worked for a company in Los Angeles, visited my son Amir's family in Palo Alto and before that in Seattle...

I have endless memories from my visits to the US, I'll just mention some events on service and punctuality comparing them to Israel. I was astonished in my first visits in the US from the excellent service that we encountered wherever we went, in malls, restaurants, banks and hotels. When Ruthy, my wife, visited for the first time the US it was in the eighties to visit her sister who spent a couple of years with her family in Palo Alto. She visited for the first time a mall, that her sister recommended, and entered a large store with an Israeli friend. At the store she was extremely surprised from the excellent service she received (how are you today, have a good day, don't worry I've plenty of time for you). After a while she addressed the saleswoman telling her that she probably thinks that she is Rachel who comes here a lot, but she is her twin sister... Her Israeli friend, who lived already for twenty years there, laughed and told her that this is the way that customers are treated even when they come to the shop for the first time and nag them incessantly. Her friend remembered that when she was on visit to Israel she went to an exclusive boutique, dressed casual as she was used to in spite of the multimillion exit of her husband, and wanted to purchase a very expensive dress, the shop assistant looked at her casual dress and told her that she'll show her other dresses as this one was too expensive for her budget...

A few years ago, I was asked to buy a camera accessory in New York, but mind you I was told: "buy it only where I tell you as they have the best quality at the cheapest price". I noticed that the shop is open on Sunday but closed on Saturday and when I arrived to the shop I understood why – it was a huge shop in the middle of Manhattan run by ultra-orthodox Jews who held most of the positions in the shop and managed the shop as well. I had to wait on line for a quarter of an hour as I came earlier than the opening hour and was sure that I'll spend there all morning with so many people waiting to be served. I was surprised that five minutes after the shop opened I came in and there was no queue. It took me less than ten minutes to buy the accessory who had to be brought from the warehouse and before a quarter of an hour after the shop opened I have purchased and paid. I was so astonished that I asked to speak with the manager of the shop who was also an ultra-orthodox standing nearby. I told him that I wanted to congratulate him as this was the best run shop that I have ever visited in my life, and asked him how come that the ultra-orthodox here in the US excel so much in work while in Israel they spend all day long in the Yeshivas in most/many cases not ever working. He smiled and told me that it is because the US government is not foolish enough as the Israeli one to finance idle people, that the Torah requires explicitly for everyone to work even if they learn, and that the patent of religious people studying all day long without working was exclusive to Israel, unlike what happens in the US and Europe.

But I have encountered the most salient example of an excellent service, this time too good service, when I was the CFO of an Israeli very large high tech company. In those times I was Jack of all trades, responsible for Sales, Marketing, Finance, M&A and strategic planning. As I found out that the best way to expand in the US is by acquiring a US company, I negotiated with a local US company and decided to purchase it. The time of the closing arrived and we had to transfer a very large multimillion amount to the private owners of the company who came especially to Israel in order to sign all the agreement documents. At 4PM, when the US bank where we held our substantial deposits opened I phoned the bank, introduced myself – Jacques Cory, CFO of ..., and said that I have to transfer this huge amount to an American company. After a few moments I was transferred to the manager responsible for those transactions, I introduced myself, and asked him to transfer this amount from our bank account to the bank account of the sellers. He was very polite, said that he'll do it right away, and when I asked when they would see the amount in their bank account he said that it will be there within 10 minutes. After 10 minutes the bank of the sellers phoned them and told them that they have received the full amount. There were "bezos y abrazos" as we say in Spanish "hugs and kisses", well actually there were no kisses, es passt nicht with Americans, but we drank on the occasion (I drank only water), and the closing was very jovial, we congratulated each other, and hoped for the best...

In the middle of the night I had a nightmare and awoke in cold sweat. I dreamt that a swindler has phoned our American bank and transferred all our money to his private account. When I reconstructed what has happened I noticed that one of the largest US banks has transferred this huge amount without knowing me, without requesting a written confirmation, without demanding to speak to the CEO, they wanted to oblige us, to comply to our request and to speed their excellent service to us. First of all – the customer must be happy! In the morning I came sullen to my office, convened all the employees of the Finance department, rebuked the treasurer, and prepared instantly a detailed procedure how to transfer money from our US bank account, requesting prior identification, written confirmation, special codes known only to the CFO, the CEO, the US Branch manager, approval in writing and verbal from our CEO, and so on. I phoned the US bank at 4PM and asked to speak to the Branch manager, he expected congratulations but I reproached him for the careless way in which they have transferred the huge amount. What would have happened if I would have transferred the amount to my private account or if somebody else introducing himself as me would have taken all our money and transferred it to his account. The Americans were very surprised at my reaction as they thought that they had behaved correctly giving the best service to their clients, they were not also accustomed to be reprimanded as you never offend someone doing business in the US, even if he is wrong, and he made you lose money. You just fire him, wishing him a nice day...

And from service to punctuality in the US and Israel. On my first trip to the US in 1968, we travelled for almost a month in the most populated parts of this great nation, from the Nigara Falls to Washington DC, from Detroit to New York. The whole trip was financed for most of the alumnis of Insead by David Rockefeller who wanted to promote business between the US and the Common Market and I received my diploma from him personally at the Chase Manhattan headquarters in New York, but was too poor to purchase the expensive photo. It is said that L'exactitude est la politesse des rois – punctuality is the politeness of kings, and although I am not a descendant of kings, not even a baron (although I met of course several times the Baron Edmond de Rothschild, who gave me the scholarship for Insead), I was almost never late throughout all my life. But in the trip I was late once (for 5 minutes), and the story goes like that: I sat in the bus and shared a room throughout the trip with a count (at Insead "half" of the students were barons, counts or marquises, or at least sons of tycoons, except me of course who wore the same jacket all the year round) from a country which I'll not disclose its name in order not to strenghten prejudices. We became very good friends and once in Philadelphia, after we have put our luggage on the bus, we went to a nearby coffee shop for a breakfast. In the past few days, there were some alumni who were late, and it disturbed the schedule of the trip. So, the alumnus who was in charge of the trip, decided that the bus shall leave Philadelphia at 9 sharply and the students who will not be on time in the bus will remain in Philadelphia. There was only one problem, he was also a count from a family with hundreds of years of animosity with the family of my count. It goes without saying that they were from different nationalities.

At ten minutes to nine, I reminded my friend that we have to pay and go to the bus, otherwise we'll stay in Philadelphia. My friend laughed and said: "I know those bastards, they just talk and talk but he wouldn't dare to leave us here." At five minutes to nine, I got nervous, and said that I'll leave him and go by myself to the bus, but he said: "Don't behave like a chicken, you Israelis are supposed to be very brave". It was after the Six Day War, and what he implied but didn't say that you should be brave as opposed to your Jewish compatriots whom I know from my country. Well, now it was a question of honor, and I had to prove him that all his prejudices were incorrect. So, I stayed, and at nine we paid and ran for the bus, but alas, we saw the bus leaving without us. None of the students complained, although we were very good friends with most of them, which is another issue. We remained in Philadelphia without money (it was in our luggage), without knowing where we have to stay for the night in Washington, and of course we missed all the visits of the day. But we were young and resourceful, and we went to the reception of the hotel, phoned the organization who took care of the logistics and they told us the name of the hotel in Washington and advanced us $100 for meals and bus tickets. We visited Philadelphia, and since then I didn't have the opportunity to visit the city, maybe because of the trauma, but my son Amir spent two fantastic years there as a Wharton student. In the late afternoon we took a bus to Washington with the rest of our money and when we arrived there it was late at night and we didn't have enough money for a taxi, so we had to go by foot for an hour in a dangerous neighborhood, but fortunately my count was very bulky and muscular, and we had enough mishaps for the day already, and fate was smiling for us at last, so all went well.

When we arrived at last to the hotel, the rival count laughed at us and said: "I told you that we'll leave pünktlich at nine and so we did!" I didn't disclose the nationality of the guy, as the Insead alumni spoke five languages and we used pünktlich in our English conversation as well. I'll just add that the other count was slim and strong only in words, and leave the reader to imagine what ensued, what we said to our friends who all of a sudden were against the organizer, they apologized that they didn't notice that we were missing, and when they did it was too late to return. Almost 50 years have elapsed since this event and I'm still not in speaking terms with the rival count, especially that if I disclosed the names and nationalities of the protagonists, with their family conduct in World War II, it would be clear what was the true reason that the count decided to leave both of us in Philadelphia, but of course he maintains until today that he did it only because we disrupted the trip, as he was extremely politically correct. When we arrived to New York, my friend invited me to a party at his family penthouse near Central Park. I remember that I met there a girl named Gwendolyn who was astonished that I arrived to the party after spending the day in Harlem. It was 1968, and you had to be very courageous (or careless) to visit Harlem, but as I don't have prejudices and I was always a sympathizer of the underprivileged, it was after the murder of Martin Luther King and Bob Kennedy, I was sure that nothing will ever happen to me. But Gwendolyn told her friends of my bravery and this was helpful to eradicate more entrenched prejudices of her family and friends. It is worthwhile to mention that I received during all my life the doubtful compliments – outside Israel that I don't look or behave like a Jew, and in Israel that I don't look and behave like an oriental. Those who are prejudiced continue to cherish their prejudices, and they feel good that they are not racists as they have their "Jewish friend" or "Oriental friend". But I had also my prejudices, that however, I abandoned during this breakthrough year at Insead, the month before in Berlin and the month after in the US. I had negative prejudices against Germans whom I thought before were mostly anti-Semite, I found out that on the contrary they were extremely pro-Israelis, although some of them, but no more than the usual average were indeed against Jews. I lost also my prejudices against Arabs, as our best friends were Lebanese and Syrians, and on the contrary I found out that my positive prejudices towards French and Americans were unfounded and they were just like every other nationality, some were good and some were bad, no more and no less than the others, no more and no less than the Jews, Israelis, Italians, Poles, Arabs, Germans or English.

So, since then I don't think that I have any prejudices towards anybody, and especially not towards aristocrats and rich people. In Israel and in Egypt I never met aristocrats and rich people (I met some nouveaux riches who behaved pompously and I ridiculed them). At Insead in 1967 and 1968, most of the students and most of my friends, and I had dozens of friends, were aristocrats or rich people as the tuition and living expenses were very high and only rich people could afford to pay it. Very few had scholarships and only some of the Israelis had a scholarship for all their expenses paid by the baron Edmond de Rothschild. I felt like a fish in the water at Insead and not as an outsider as I felt at the University of Jerusalem. I received a socialist education, despising aristocrats and rich people without knowing them, brainwashed by the propaganda in my youth movement and by the literature I read. At Insead, first of all, I was at last at the same age as the other students and not the youngest student (I finished my graduate studies at the age of 20) as in Israel. Furthermore, I didn't like the faculty of Economics and I attended as few courses as possible, while I liked very much the international business studies at Insead. In Israel I was also one of the few "orientals" (less than 10% studied after high school, out of a population of more than 50% of the Israelis), and surely one of the poorest students. In a society which was quite racist and spiteful to poor people, at least at the University of Jerusalem which was then the only university in Israel with the Technion which taught only BSc courses. I felt that most of the students in Economics at the University were snobs, judging people by the size of their wallet, their origins, and on what can they benefit from the friendship.

What I say here may be completely untrue and give only my subjective feelings, but I felt during my academic studies and also during most of my primary and secondary studies (except for the first two years of high school) estranged and not belonging, which didn't prevent me to have very good friends (a few only) in spite of that. At Insead at last I felt completely at home, the aristocrats and rich people by the dozens were my good friends, didn't patronize me although they knew that I didn't have money, and behaved as equals, cordial, and as true friends. This was maybe due to the fact that all the studies were based on case studies and group dynamics in which I excelled, I had the hello as an Israeli after the glorious Six Day War, and I didn't have any inferiority complex towards anybody. I assisted also the other students whenever needed, I was an excellent student, and a very thoughtful friend. Even, the baron as we called Edmond de Rothschild behaved equally although in his case he also paid for the tuition. I remember that he came once to have lunch with his Israelis grantees at the students' restaurant and for our bad luck they served chicken with the bones. So, we looked at each other baffled, not knowing how to behave in front of the baron, who would think that the Israelis are barbarians and don't have any manners. He noticed our confusion, and he told us that he didn't know either how to eat the chicken, so he grabbed it with his hands and, relieved, we did the same. In comparison to the nouveaux riches that I knew from Israel those aristocrats and rich people who lived in riches for generations didn't need the affected manners that they thought came with the riches. I owe at least the kick-off of my career to the baron, without him it would have taken me much longer if at all to succeed. I wrote also how David Rockefeller financed our trip to the US for a month, so in spite of my prejudices I benefited a lot from philanthropists, although many tycoons of today have a despicable conduct and I write about that a lot in my ethical books and articles.

Many socialist friends say that I have a selective memory and tycoons are OK as long as they give me scholarships or grants, because the forefathers of the Rockfellers and the Rothschilds behaved unethically towards their stakeholders, but I hope that I am objective, and if you check the history of every aristocrat or philanthropist's families you may find skeletons in their closets, but so can we find in every nation as well – Spanish with the Inquisition, German with the Holocaust, French with Vichy and Dreyfus, Arabs with the Israeli War of Independence, Six Day War, etc., UK, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands, Spain, Portugal, Japan, etc. with colonialism, US with Vietnam, and our lovers would also add Israel and the West Bank occupation. What matters after all is what happens today – Germany is the most friendly country towards Israel, France has uprooted most of the anti-Semitic seeds that it had 70-100 years ago (now, I am not so sure, as they don't do enough to eradicate the animosity of some of their radical Muslim minorities, extreme left and right parties, and "ordinary" racists), there is no more segregation in the US, apartheid in South Africa, and Spain wants to give citizenship to all the Sephardis. Edmond de Rothschild was one of the most ethical bankers in his generation, and David Rockefeller behaved quite opposite to how the robber barons behaved. If you remember too much what has each country done in the past, or what the family of a benefactor did two generations ago, you would remain without friends and stay confined to your country – you have to judge a country upon its conduct in the present generation or a man only upon his conduct during his life time. Beware of too much purism, otherwise you'll always be spiteful and angry.

As I have chosen to speak in this chapter about punctuality, I will bring here three other stories – one when I arrived on time after all, one when I was late for the first time, and one when I did not arrive. During my years as a consultant and projects manager, I managed large projects, one of them was to get an Approved Enterprise for an American company that wanted to invest $270 million in Israel. This was by far my largest project and also the highest amount ever approved to an investment in Israel, so it brought a lot of attention. The tycoons who "didn't see from a meter" as we say in Hebrew, were all of a sudden my best friends, there were articles in the newspapers, I met personally Ariel Sharon who was the Minister of Industry and Shimon Peres who was the Minister of Finance, everybody wanted to be my friend and receive a part of the investment or finance it. The final meeting for getting the approved enterprise was to be held in Jerusalem at the headquarters of the Ministry of Industry at 9 AM. I live in Haifa, so I left home at 5 AM, four hours before the meeting, while normally it took then two to three hours to arrive by car to Jerusalem. This day all the mishaps happened, there were accidents, traffic jams, and finally when I arrived to the Ministry I couldn't find parking. At ten minutes to nine, I had to reach a decision – it was unthinkable that I would be late, because of the importance of the issues, the fact that the general manager of the ministry was to attend and I couldn't be late. So, I parked... on the parking lot of the general manager! This was the only one available and I figured that even if he arrived at the last moment, his driver would take care of his car. When we finished the meeting a few hours later (I didn't disclose the "crime" that I did, possibly my worst crime ever) I saw that my car was not there. I didn't ask where my car was, as I didn't want to make a bad impression, and so I took a taxi to the tow car parking garage, I paid the fine of a few hundred Shekels willingly (I would have paid also a thousand dollars – which gives me an idea for a business – parking lot for latecommers that cost a hundred dollars for parking), took my car and returned home. For the first time in my life I parked where I was not supposed to park. Does the end justifies the means? I would in no case park on the parking lot of a handicapped, but for once, because of the extreme situation, I made something that for me was extremely unethical.

I taught for ten years at seven universities, in Israel and abroad, in Haifa, Tel Aviv, Netanya, Singapore, etc. and was never late for my courses. When I taught at Tel Aviv, I used to arrive a couple of hours before time – as a buffer in case that the train would be late, to talk to students who knew that they can always find me before the course, and to cool off before starting to teach. If I was sick I came to teach, and I gave my conduct as an example to the students who were often late – they gave a lot of excuses, but I argued that there is no excuse for being late. However, once I was late by 40 minutes... to my course at the Tel Aviv University. I took an early train as always, I found in my waggon a student from the Carmel College, and read a novel as I always did during my travels on train. This was a novel by Balzac, so I didn't notice what was going on the train. All of a sudden I saw fire on both sides of the waggon and it was full of smoke. There was quite a panic, bearing in mind that the driver didn't notice the fire and the train continued its travel to Tel Aviv. The doors were locked as a safety measure when the train was moving. I didn't lose my temper, I am at my best in extreme situations, and together with other passengers banged on the driver waggon. His wagon is also locked because in case of a terrorist attack they would not take hold of the train. Finally, after a couple of minutes, that we thought were an eternity he heard our bangs and saw the fire, he opened his door and stopped the train.

We had to evacuate the train hastily, but there was a problem as we stopped in the middle of nowhere where there were large rocks and we had to jump to the rocks that were two meters below. The young people, and my student the first one jumped and received us "the elderly", women and children in his arms, and we were not hurt. A couple of days later at my course I praised this student as a hero, as he saved us from wounds, as 120 other passengers were. The cause of the wounds was that the doors of the waggons didn't open although the train has stopped and the other passengers, especially in the wagon next to us which caught fire, had to break the windows and jump from the broken windows to the rocks, and so were wounded. The wounded were taken care by some of the passengers who were doctors, nurses, soldiers and train staff.

The first thing that I did after jumping from the burning train was to phone home and tell Ruthy that I am OK and not to worry to the news that she would hear shortly. The second thing that I did was to phone the faculty at the Tel Aviv university, explained to them that our train was on fire and there were many wounded, but I was OK, except that I have inhaled a lot of smoke. They told me to return home, but I answered that I'll come to the course and tell the students to stay in the class, but I don't know when they will evacuate the passengers who were not wounded. As we stopped in the wilderness (there are still some wild spots from Haifa to Tel Aviv) there was no way to evacuate us. The wounded finally were taken to the hospitals, including those who inhaled smoke. But although I inhaled smoke and could barely breathe, I refused to be evacuated and remained there until finally, after a couple of hours buses came to take us to Tel Aviv and from there I took a taxi to the University and started my course right away with a 40 minutes delay, the first (and only) time in my academic career. The students were amazed how I continued my routine without interruption and I told them that I'll teach them two more lessons on the first week of the vacations to compensate for the loss of the 40 minutes and those who didn't have the opportunity to present their case studies would do that next week. I suffered very much from this event, both physically and mentally – as having inhaled a lot of smoke I had problems in giving my lectures (at those times I lectured for 20 hours every week), but the students didn't notice it, but even more mentally as I suffered from the fact that my course, which always went punctually started on time and ended on time, after having accomplished all the assignments of the lecture, were for the first time unbalanced for a couple of weeks. I nearly got killed, if the train would not have stopped all the train would got burned, and we were in the waggon just after the one that caught fire, so it was just a question of minutes that saved my life, and furthermore I was not even wounded by the rocks, but luckily the only damage was this minor one. I try to find the right proportions in my reaction to what happens to me, on the one hand events that disturb my harmonious life annoy me very much, and on the other hand loss of health and money, rejection of my books by publishers or of my candidacy to PhD programs by universities don't bother me too much. My basic attitude is that if I can't change the course of events I am not annoyed, as it is not worthwhile to lose your temper on "acts of God or devil", but if I can – I do my best to change the situation, even if the events are minor.

The third event of punctuality was an event where I didn't arrive at all to the meeting with my directeur de these in Paris. If you write a dissertation for a PhD in France, you have to be in excellent terms with your directeur de these, as he directs your thesis/dissertation and no one else gets involved in the process until the end when they appoint a jury who examines you in a session open to the public at a large hall of your university in Paris. I was lucky to find a good directeur de these who was interested in my subject – ethics to minority shareholders – a breakthrough dissertation, the first one ever in the world on this topic, which is one of the most accurate in the business world, and after the scandals of 2001/2 and the Great Recession of 2008/9 even more. This professor worked at the University of Paris, the most prestigious university in France and one of the best in the world. I started to work on the dissertation, first of all reading more than a hundred books, and much more articles, including the professional books that she recommended me, and after that started to write my dissertation, researching cases of wrongdoing to minority shareholders in the US, France and Israel. Every month or two months I traveled to Paris on business, as I worked on many projects there, and also to meet my professor. All what I had to pay was a registration fee of 200 Euros, as education in France is free up to the PhD and also to foreign students. All went well for a couple of years and the directeur de these was happy with my progress (I continued to work full time, and I made my research, read the books, and afterwards wrote the 500 pages dissertation on top of that in a 25 hours day). In 2000, after having finished the writing and arriving to conclusions – finding the rules that govern wrongdoing to the minority shareholders, I sent it to my professor, and we scheduled to meet during my next visit to Paris. But, l'homme propose et Dieu dispose, man can plan but God or fate decides, on the day that I scheduled to meet her there was a general strike in Paris.

There was no metro, no buses, no taxis, and the meeting place was not in a walking distance from my hotel. I tried for a couple of hours to get a taxi, that were almost unavable, to no avail, and finally I had to phone her and tell her that I cannot get to the meeting. I saw that she was pissed off (the directeur de these is like a God for the PhD students, less so for a student aged 55 who had accomplished a thing or two in his life), she said that it will have bad repercussions on my PhD, that she was not contented with my conclusions, and that I should try again and again to meet her as she wanted to tell me in details what were her reservations. I tried to hire a car, I told the reception of my hotel that I was willing to pay any price for a taxi or a car but to no avail. Ultimately, when I met her on the next month in my new visit to Paris she told me that if I was not willing to change my conclusions she would not approve my dissertation. I told her that my conclusions were scientifically proven and were based on a thorough research and on 30 years of experience, it was the essence of the dissertation and there was no way that I would change her. So, she said that in this case she would not approve my dissertation and that all what I have worked would be worthless as no other university or professor would want to work with me. She thought that I would give in, but I wouldn't give up. Actually, she was almost true, as it was quite impossible to find a university or a professor who would accept my dissertation after what happened with the University of Paris. I am an expert in finding a way out of hopeless situation. After consulting many professors, applying to more than 100 universities all over the world, I decided to translate my dissertation into English, and write two books that would be based on my dissertation. I found one of the most prominent academic publishers in the world Kluwer that agreed to publish both books in 2001. The books received good reviews, but even more, I could present them as the basis for my new dissertation, especially after that the Enron scandal in December 2001 and the other corporate scandals that ensued proved that I was right in all my conclusions, and that I had foreseen the scandals in my books. This fact received the academic attention, I was approached by another directeur de these at CNAM, one of the best universities in Europe and the best one in business ethics. They were willing to meet me during my next visit to Paris. On the day of the meeting at 8.30 AM, guess what? There were no metros available, I waited for half an hour to no avail, no taxis as well. I thought that I live in a "déjà vu", that it was impossible that history would turn against me twice the same way in the same city on the same topic. I phoned the professor telling him of the problem and getting his permission to be late. Finally, I found a taxi, arrived an hour late, but luckily there was a perfect chemistry with this professor who became my directeur de these. He thought highly of me, my books and my experience, I wrote once again a new dissertation based on the corporate scandals of Enron, etc. and on my two academic books. My dissertation was received warmly by my directeur de these and by the Jury comprising of five prominent professors, I got finally my PhD at the age of 60 (it is never too late and four years after scheduled), started my academic career, wrote many other books, taught thousands of student, and invented myself newly. Thinking that all that would not have occurred because I was late to a meeting and late again to another meeting at another university a few years later... So, maybe after all the fact that I am so punctual has affected very favorably my career, and one should do his utmost never to be late!

3.3 VISA PROBLEMS IN CANADA AND PERU

I worked for a Canadian company and managed an M&A agreement that took more than a year to conclude, I sold a simulator system to Peru and went there on business several times. In those two countries I had problems with my working visas, but from opposite angles. In Canada I came for the first times on a tourist visa, as my employers didn't tell me that I needed a working visa. Only after I was asked by the Canadian official what is the purpose of my frequent visits I told him that I come on business for a Canadian company. I was held for several hours at the airport until the company paid a large amount of money to "release" me. Nevertheless, I had a fantastic experience in Canada, sensing that it is indeed a model country, like Australia and New Zealand, so beautiful, with lovely sceneries, the lakes, the Niagara Falls, Victoria, Vancouver, with such friendly people. It is indeed a pity that some Canadians have an inferiority complex towards their big brother the US, but they should be proud of their country – its political and economic model, aiming primarily to improve its citizens' welfare – in education, health, safety, clean air, equality, culture, indeed a model country. They even have overcome the linguistic problem with the French Canadians, and study (God forbids...) two languages, amazing!

In Peru, the problem was exactly opposite. I had a working visa although I came to sell and was not employed by the Peruvians. When I was about to leave Lima's airport, on Friday night with my colleague, to spend a weekend in Rio for the first time, my friend went ahead of me, and the official asked me why I didn't have a certificate that I had concluded business. I answered that the negotiations are still in process, but the official insisted that he needs a certificate. My friend, who was already on the other side, gesticulated and showed me to put money for the official. But this was against my principles, so I had to return to the hotel, stayed in Lima for the weekend, and on Monday I got the certificate. I didn't dance samba in Rio, but my conscience remained clear. And what if I would have been arrested for bribing officials? Well, a clear conscience is something quite subjective, as the worst economic and political criminals, the most wicked gangsters, have also a clear conscience, as the skeptic Mark Twain used to say: "A clear conscience is the sure sign of a bad memory." Nevertheless, I have managed to sail on the troubled water of business with a clear conscience and a good memory...

But this visa problem was insignificant in comparison to the loveliness of the Peruvian country, the friendliness of the Peruvians, the wonderful time that I had at Iquitos, cruising the Amazon and trekking the jungle, inventing stories for my children and grandchildren about Indians named funny names as Gigimushu, Chichibamba and Gagaraga, animals named even funnier names based on Ladino words – such as the lion Hastrapula, the giraffe Siskerina, and the monkey Sholobolo. Those stories made the delight of the children and I wrote with the assistance of my daughter Shirley and grandson Ido, who were the most addicted to the stories, a children book "Ijiko and his grandparents in the jungle" illustrated by a friend painter Elena Gat. But I wrote other children books as "The Rain Fairy", dedicated to my wife Ruthy - my fairy, illustrated by my son Joseph, and told captivating stories invented or based on books such as the Odyssey and Ulysses, Alice in the wonderland, etc., to my children Joseph, Amir and Shirley, and then to my grandchildren Tomer, Doron, Ophir, Noga, Itai, Noam David, Ido and Yaeli. I made very short visits in transit from business in Venezuela – to visit my wife's family, Argentina that looked so European, and Brazil, where I extremely enjoyed Rio and visited my family in Sao Paulo. I love Latin/South America and plan to visit it for a few months, though not as a muchilero. I feel there at home (minus the bribing, in this respect I am Danish), the songs move me to tears, I like the people who are happy and friendly in spite of the poverty, but I am aware to what I hear from my Venezuelan and Brazilian families, that besides the folklore there is much crime and theft, that fortunately I have not experienced.

3.4 CHILDHOOD IN EGYPT, JEWISH AND ARAB REFUGEES, BUSINESS IN AFRICA

I was born in Cairo in Africa, and lived there for 9 years. I remember visiting the Pyramids, the Museum of Cairo with all its mummies & glorious past, seeing at least 3 films per week with my parents, most of them in open-air cinemas, staying every year about a month in Alexandria and going to the beach. The desert, the Nile, the sea, my family, my friends, the poverty of the local people, the cosmopolitan environment with Arabs, Copts, Greeks, Italians, Jews, French, English, Armenians. I studied at the French school - the Lycee from the age of 5 in the second grade, as my mother Pauline taught me to read and write from the age of 3, and suffered a lot from being the smallest kid in class. I (aged 7-9) had a traumatic experience from the revolution in 1952, the burning of Cairo by the Shabab, the fear of the Jews from the Arabs... As a matter of fact, the fact that I was born in Cairo is purely incidental, as it didn't affect me in any way, as for example my life in Israel, my Sephardic origins, my European affinities, my business trips all over the world. I know many people that were born in China or Kazakhstan, as their parents fled the Nazis in Europe and relocated as far as they could from the war in Europe. They were born in China but it didn't make them Chinese or Kazaks in any way, especially if they remained there only for a few years, as I did in Cairo until the age of 9. Furthermore, the Chinese or the Kazakhs were not their enemies as the Egyptians, who were the enemies of the Jews after Israel was founded in 1948, and we had to fear them even more as my father was a Zionist, and after Cairo was burned by the Shabab and the revolution took place in 1952. This does not mean that I deprecate in any way the Egyptians, the Arabs or the Africans. There were Jews who lived for generations in Egypt and were part of the social texture of the country, but even my parents lived in Egypt for 31-43 years, as we were of Sephardic/Spanish and Portuguese origin, and my family lived in Greece, Turkey, Italy for most of the time after 1492, and in the 20th century received an education in English (my father), in French (my mother, my brother and me), in Hebrew (me).

Many compatriots, Jews who like me left Egypt at the age of 9 or 10, have a vivid and positive memory of Egypt and have written books glorifying those days. I personally was very glad to leave Egypt as we lived there in fear, and I never returned to visit the country as many friends have done. By the way, most of them were very saddened to see that nothing remains from the sites that they left, as Alexandria and Cairo were European cities when we lived there and now have become very poor, Judenrein and Europeanrein, with huge Egyptian populations and without Jews or Europeans, as in all the Arab states except Morocco. One of the sagas that Jews in Arab countries lived peacefully with the Arabs is completely false, with pogroms in Syria and Iraq, persecutions in Egypt and Yemen, so Jews had to flee in order not to be murdered. Martin Gilbert wrote in 2010: In Ishmael's House: A History of the Jews in Muslim Lands, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, ISBN 978-0-300-16715-3. This book challenges the commonly view that Jews in Muslim lands were treated well most of the time, more often they were regarded as second class citizens, dhimmi, and were subject to physical attacks and harassment. In Egypt the situation was relatively better due to the British soldiers, but after they were evacuated and even sooner the Egyptians killed, wounded and imprisoned all those that were suspect of "treason".

This precarious situation worsened extremely with the creation of the State of Israel in 1948 and after the Israeli army has vanquished all the Arab armies who tried to kill all the Jews and complete what Hitler has not succeeded to do when his army has lost the battle of El Alamein. The position of the Jews became rapidly intolerable with the only solution of mass migration, while leaving behind all of their possessions. Today, there are only a few thousands Jews left in all the Muslim lands. And one symptomatic story – after the Egyptian revolution in 1952 the new nationalistic government has forbidden the Jews to mention in the Haggadah at Passover that the Egyptian army of the Pharaohs has drowned in the sea by Jehova who rescued the Jewish slaves. This mention was pejorative against the glory and heroism of the Egyptian Army from the times of the Pharaohs until 1953. My father who was a Zionist was shocked by this and asked the Chief Rabbi how can the new regime interfere even in the prayers. The Chief Rabbi smiled and answered him: "My son, whatever they ask us to do, you and me know exactly what is the truth!"

Those of us who are interested in the story of Egyptian Jews who fled and were expelled from Egypt can read about a dozen books in English and French and much more in Hebrew, according to the following list. The first two books have succeeded very much in the US and were written by very good friends of mine – Gormezano Goren and Bar-Av who arrived with us from Egypt to a small village in Israel Kfar Ata. I have read some of those books, and according to the reviews they are all excellent and worth reading. My play takes place in Israel, but the protagonists are also Sephardic Jews - Greeks and Egyptians - who live still in the past. And read also the masterpiece by Lawrence Durrell about cosmopolitan Egypt – The Alexandria Quartet.

The Palestinians have succeeded in brainwashing the Western World with the refugees' problem. 500,000 to 700,000 refugees have left Palestine, most of them induced to do so by their leaders who have promised them to return within a few weeks after the Arabs would annihilate the Jews in Israel, half a million against a hundred million Arabs. From those refugees only 50,000 are still alive, 67 years after they left, while the so-called 5 million refugees wanting the right of return were not born in Palestine and the Arab states have preferred to finance with their billions petrodollars wars and terrorist attacks instead of solving once and for all the refugees problem in their countries where they are only a very small minority. The Jews from the Arab states who were expelled and fled after 1948 were 900,000, 50% more than the Palestinian refugees. Their assets that were confiscated were much more than the assets of the Palestinians. All of them were integrated in Israel, France, Brazil, US, UK, Australia, Canada, etc, in one or two years without the assistance of the UN of tens of billions dollars. They have succeeded very much in business, academics, liberal professions (the books that I've mentioned are only a small example) and none of them is a terrorist. The Palestinian refugees will return to Israel and Palestine when the German refugees will return to Koenigsberg in Russia, Stettin in Poland, the Sudetenland in Czechoslovakia. Oh, but the Germans have lost the war and must bear the consequences. Well, the Arabs who attacked Israel have also lost the war and must bear the consequences. Why nobody asks for the right of return of the Greeks from Smyrna and Asia Minor (Erdogan would be delighted) and Turks from the Balkans, Poles, Ukrainians, Africans, Americans, Asians, the Serbs, Croats, Bosnians - in Republika Sprska, Croatia, Bosnian Federation, Cyprus, Pakistan and India - where 14 millions moved to the other side and up to half a million were murdered...

Nobody has helped the Egyptian Jews and me, and some of them have written books and will continue to live again the past in books and dreams, as this is the only way to solve the problem of the refugees. What upsets me is the effective brainwashing of the Palestinians that convinces many Americans and Europeans who have adopted the anti-Semitic and racist precepts of BDS, who advocate the right of return, thus the end of Israel. When the forefathers of the Palestinians lived in Palestine it was a very poor country, as many Arab states are today. The Arab states could have kept the Jewish and Christian populations, trying to prosper jointly in a multi-cultural state, like Canada and Australia. They opted for a policy of expulsion, as in Algeria and Egypt. They had their reasons of course, as they thought that the European populations prevented the Muslims to succeed and exploited the poor Arabs. But the result was that their countries are now very poor, even poorer than when the Europeans lived there. Herzl had a vision in Altneuland that the Jews and the Arabs will build together an exemplary state. Unfortunately, this did not happen, and the Jews and Arabs blame each other for that. Most of the attempts of economic collaboration have failed (I witnessed one of them while teaching at the Palestinian-Israeli MBA in the University of Haifa). It is impossible to prosper when the Jews are depicted as Nazis by the Palestinians who launch a Nazi-like propaganda against Israel and the Jews. Herzl had many merits – he had a vision, he was a gifted writer, he was a good politician - but he was not an orientalist and believed that the Arabs would welcome the Jews trying to build together an exemplary state. If he would have lived 20 years more (he died at the age of 44...) he would have witnessed the collapse of the multi-national Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Arab riots against the Jews in Palestine in 1921, and the independence of Ireland, as people prefer to be poorer but free in an independent entity, than richer in a two-nationalities state. Even the exemplary Scandinavians did not succeed to have a united kingdom in Norway, Sweden and Denmark. And so, the Scots want to get independence, as well as the Catalans, Basques, etc.

A two-nationalities state does not exist in most of the countries of the world – not anymore in Czechoslovakia, in Rwanda, Burundi, in India, Pakistan, in Romania, Poland, Ukraine, in Turkey, Greece, and in Yugoslavia. It still exists in Belgium, but the Flemish want independence, and anyhow they are now the majority, the same applies to Switzerland where the Swiss Germans are the majority, there is a lot of resentment from the French speaking Quebec in Canada, and Canada is now much more an emigration melting pot, as Australia and the United States are. I am very skeptic about what will happen in South Africa, it did not work in North and South Rodesia, but there are millions of Europeans in South Africa, who are the richest and hold top positions, however many of them are emigrating to other countries, as the crime rates and economic crises have become unbarerable to large segments of them. I often wonder why so many African and Asian countries have not opted to take from the European/American model what is essential to succeed, and adapt it to the local heritage. Singapore, South Korea, Japan, Taiwan, Botswana, and many other countries have done it, without inferiority complexes and thrive, having grown to the forefront of progress. Why most of the Muslim states have not opted to adopt the European/American model (except Ata Turk's Turkey, at least prior to becoming more and more a fundamentalist state)? Is it a question of pride (Japan was a much prouder nation), of complexes, of fundamentalism? Nothing prevents the Muslim states to reach the forefront of progress like Japan or Taiwan, more so the petrodollars rich countries, to become democratic, with a respect to human rights, with gender equality, with a humane capitalism country. Muslim states were at the forefront of progress in the Middle Ages, Lebanon was before the civil war broke out, Iran would have become so before the Ayatollas took over, Turkey was so for a long period. But the civil wars, the totalitarian governments, corruption, gender inequality, trampling of human rights, extreme fundamentalism prevented them to become first world countries, not "genetic" problems as the Arabs and Muslims are intelligent and competent at least as the Jews and Christians, not lack of funds as with the petrodollars all the economic and social problems (including the refugees) would have been solved within a few years, if they would distribute the riches of petroleum like Norway and not kept the riches for a few families.

The Jews and Arabs in Israel, like the Chinese, Malays and Indians in Singapore have made the two underdeveloped countries to first world countries at the forefront of progress. Israel has become a High Tech country, with an ultramodern agriculture and industry, water desalination, petrochemical and pharmaceutical industries. Israel is the only democratic country in the Middle East, while in most of the neighboring countries - Syria, Yemen, Iraq, Afghanistan, Algeria, Sudan, Lebanon, there are/were civil wars with hundreds of thousands of casualties, millions in an aggregate account, while in all the Palestinian conflicts there were "only" thousands of casualties on both sides. When one or four Palestinian children are killed because rockets were launched by the Hamas and Israel retaliated against the launching sites that were set by the Hamas in populated areas - all the world is outraged, the press, humanitarian organizations, students, but when hundreds of Israeli children in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem are killed by terrorists nobody even winces, as also is the case when hundreds of thousands of civilians are killed in civil wars. In the other Arab countries there is extreme poverty as in Egypt, or plutocracies in the oil-rich countries, where most of the wealth belongs to a few families. Most of Israeli population has turned into hawks because of the extreme hypocrisy of the UN and many countries, that condemn all the time Israel while not condemning the most savage regimes, because of the Nazi propaganda and terrorist attacks of the Palestinians and the aggression of Hamas/Gaza and Hizballah/Lebanon after we have withdrawn. We do not believe anymore the mantra that the occupation brings about terror, as terror increases after we have withdrawn from all the territories in Gaza, Lebanon and most of the West Bank in 2000, as we saw that a Dovish behavior has only brought worse reactions, as happened with the pacifist behavior of France and UK towards Germany (militarisation, Munich, Anschluss...) before World War II.

But the sympathizers of BDS will learn the hard way with whom they are dealing, when dozens of attacks as 9/11 will occur by the soldiers of ISIS who infiltrate in Europe with the refugees and are installed among the Muslim populations in Europe and America. The politically correct attitude of Europe in the name of free speech is suicidal as they let extreme Muslim fundamentalists preach in some of the Madrasas against the countries that are hospitable to them, give them work and social benefits. The majority of the Arabs and the Muslims want to live in peace and integrate in Israel or in Europe, but their extreme fundamentalist leaders, financed by nuclear Iran and by petrodollars (and the West continues to court those countries), do whatever they can to annihilate the Christian and Jewish states in order to revive the Islamic State/Empire, as can be seen in the map of ISIS that encompasses southern Europe (but Scandinavia, Germany, France, UK, Benelux will come next...), half of Africa and a great part of Asia. Israel is not the stronghold of Apartheid, as the Arabs who live with us have the best living conditions in the Arab world and are excellent doctors, students, farmers, contractors... Israel is a European stronghold in the Middle East, it is the avant-garde of progress, democracy and freedom, that is assisting to prevent the right of return to the Middle Ages in the retrograde Islamic State.

I made only one business trip to Africa in 1972, trying to sell them Israeli air conditioners, for a few days in every country – Kenya, Mozambique, South Africa, Zaire, Nigeria, Ghana, Ivory Coast and Senegal. I remember the exotic scenery, the slow motion of living in comparison to the hectic pace in the US, the poverty. I met family (who lived before in Egypt) in Zaire and Israeli friends in Ivory Coast and Nigeria, who made me aware of much crime and theft. My friends in Nigeria traveled to visit their next door neighbor only by car as it was dangerous to go by foot even a few meters. I asked my friends what were the automotive carcasses by the dozens that were lying by the highway between Lagos and Ibadan and was told that these were the cars that broke and within minutes came locals from the bushes, murdered the passengers and robbed everything. So, I asked them, how could they live in such conditions and they told me that they earned a lot of money and within a few years they can save enough money to buy a house in Israel. In Ivory Coast I remembered that at the end of the programs on TV I heard the national hymn that started with the words – soyez beni Houphouet-Boigny – be blessed Houphouet-Boigny, the leader of the country. He was commonly known as the Sage of Africa, who however moved the country's capital from Abidjan to his hometown of Yamoussoukro where he built the world's largest church – at a cost of US$300 million..., but Ivory Coast was much safer than Nigeria or Zaire. In Ghana, I saw the plane that had to take me to Ivory Coast flying over the airport without landing as it was already full, and I had to wait for another day at Accra.

In Kenya I took a safari and visited a Maasai village, in Senegal I was amazed that the business hours were only from nine to noon, as it was too hot to work in the afternoon. Lourenco Marques (Maputo) was one of the loveliest towns that I have ever seen, but I heard that the situation changed drastically after the Portuguese left, and I was impressed by Pretoria and Johannesburg, much less by the extreme poverty of the population in comparison to the wealth of the white people, that reminded me of Cairo. Communist, fascist, and colonial regimes are very bad for their population, but when they are overthrown by the population it can change the situation for the better or worse. Poland and the Czech Republic have managed extremely well in comparison to Russia and Belarus. Israel and Singapore are among the richest countries in the world after they became independent, starting from zero, Botswana is in a much better situation than Zimbabwe. In many countries in Africa the local dictators or the civil wars deteriorated the situation of the population much more than before. After the French and the English left their colonies, in most of the Arab states there are civil wars or dictatorships and none of them has become democratic or has achieved a high standard of living (except for some segments of the population in the oil rich countries). Yet, Jordan, Morocco and the Gulf states are in a much better situation than Yemen, Iraq or Syria. But before condemning the populations of African and Arab countries who suffer most and are the victims of their regimes, we should bear in mind that while the poor people in the Western neoliberal countries are in a much better situation than the poor in Africa or the Arab countries, the inequality in those countries is sometimes equivalent, the gaps between rich and poor have reached unprecedented levels, and racism has sometimes increased. Although Milton Friedman boasts that there is freedom and democracy in the neoliberal countries how come that they are effectively plutocracies, with the highest levels of incarceration, and where the top 1% or 0.01 percent have most of the assets of the country?

I didn't make any business in Africa and have not visited the continent since this trip, although I am aware that some of the best tourist sites are in Africa, most of the Africans and the Egyptians are very friendly, Egypt has to offer some of the World's wonders. I haven't visited either the Arab countries since the peace agreements, as there is a lot of animosity towards Israelis tourists and endless demonstrations against Israel, there is almost no economic cooperation, the diplomatic corps is ostracised, and Jews are treated like devils in cartoons and at schools, with no criticism on the atrocities all over the world and in the Arab countries. I understand the allegations against Israel that we don't want to assimilate into the Middle East, but I wonder with which models we should assimilate – the model of civil wars, dictatorship, and suicide bombing in Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Yemen, Sudan, Algeria, or Libya, the economic and political model of extremely poor Egypt, the model of gender inequality that doesn't allow women to drive and kill young girls who want to go to school, the fundamentalist model of Iran, or the model of Europe and Scandinavia. Is Israel a European enclave in the Middle East, should it be like its neighbors? Nevertheless, Israelis should learn Arabic and be fluent in the language, should know Arab history and folklore, music and heritage. I think that Arabs as Jews should be assimilated by the American/European/Humanist economic, democratic, tolerant, and political model, while keeping of course their own language, cultural and folkloric heritage. The Asians and Africans who did it succeeded very much, and most of all Japan, South Korea, Botswana and Singapore.

Israel is accused of Apartheid when the Arabs are fully integrated in the Israeli economy, the police forces, and the universities. They excel at the hospitals, as nurses, doctors and managers with an equal treatment to Jewish and Arab patients. It is true that there is more poverty among the Arabs and their salaries are lower than those of the Jews, and this should be treated without delay, but if their situation is so bad how come that almost none of them has relocated to Palestine? I am convinced that there should be peaceful relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors and especially the Palestinians, I had excellent relations with my Arab students who received high grades and participated enthusiastically in my classes, at the Haifa University International MBA which comprised 50% Arabs from the West Bank, 25% Israeli Arabs and 25% Israeli Jews, when my students gave me the best feedbacks. I have made a joint venture with Arabs - The Christian Heritage backed by the Arab Mayor of Nazareth and with the participation of Arab partners, which unfortunately didn't take off because of the Intifada. I live in Haifa, the most integrated city in Israel, comprising of a high percentage of Arabs – Moslems and Christians, Hassidic/Orthodox Jews and Russian secular new immigrants, who live in harmony, including in the neighborhood where I grew up in midtown, in the same streets and the same houses. I wrote in my books about business ethics in the Quran, and after reading large parts of it in English, started to read it in Arabic as well. I am convinced that the best way to overcome the antagonism between the two peoples is by economic cooperation and cultural exchange. In one of my visits to Switzerland, I was on the Mont Blanc, and met a Swiss woman who marveled at the exotic places that I have visited, Cairo where I was born, Nigeria, Zaire, Ghana... She said that those are the places she intended to visit, as Switzerland is so boring, so clean, so perfect, so ethical and honest... I was amazed that you can be bored by perfection, but respected her choices and wished her luck, as I haven't got the answers to those questions yet, still baffled– how can we find a right balance between European progress and Oriental heritage.

3.5 TURKEY– TRAVEL, SEPHARDIC HERITAGE, SAYINGS: IN TURKISH/ENGLISH

I went for two visits to Turkey – one to Istanbul where I also met my cousin and one to Club Med in Bodrum. On the way back from Bodrum a bus took all the Club Med tourists to Bodrum's airport for their different destinations all over Europe. It was late at night, most of the people were tired or sleeping, but I noticed that the bus travels for more than a quarter of an hour, and this didn't make sense. So, I went to the bus driver and asked him why it takes so long to get to the airport. The driver answered that he was told to get us to Izmir's airport. I said that it is a mistake and they are already late for the flights in Bodrum. But the driver didn't agree to return to Bodrum, and he continued to drive towards Izmir. He barely spoke English and I thought that maybe it is "Mektoub" that I have to visit at last the city where my father was born, but I preferred to fly back to Israel. Only, after I organized a tumult, awaking all the sleeping beauties, and after the driver threatened that he will take all of us to the police, and after we phoned Club Med, the driver consented to take us to Bodrum's airport. Luckily, the planes were late, and we got back to Israel on the same night. We'll not draw any conclusions on Israeli/Jewish suspicious characters always on the alert, European trustful characters that if the bus is planned to get them to Bodrum's airport it will take them there, as they can't figure that the driver received a wrong direction, and of course this was an exception to the otherwise perfect and warmful hospitality of the Turks during my visits, the unforgettable beauty of Istanbul, its cultural and architectural richness, and all the other sites that Ruthy and me visited.

The Turkish people are an ancient people, with a fabulous history and culture, who has suffered throughout the years of misconception from the Europeans. The Sephardic Jews will never forget how from all the people in the world the Turks were the only ones to welcome hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants, as they figured that it will do well for both sides. Indeed, history has proved that those relations proved beneficial to all, and the Jews lived in harmony with their Turkish hosts for hundreds of years, which was not the case in many European and Arab countries, where the Jews suffered from pogroms and anti-Semitism – in Spain, Portugal, Germany, Poland, Russia, Syria, Iraq, etc. We bring here some Turkish sayings with their equivalents in English and literal translation, proving the commonalities in popular wisdom.

Güneşte yanmayan gölgenin kıymetini bilmez.

Translation: Who has never been burned in the sun won't know the value of shadow.

English equivalent: He knows good best who has experienced evil.

Sabır acıdır, meyvesi tatlıdır.

Translation: Patience is bitter, but its fruit is sweet.

Dost kara günde belli olur.

Translation: A friend is known on black (i. e bad days).

English equivalent: A friend is known in adversity, like gold is known in fire.

Çıkmayan candan umit kesilmez.

Translation: Hope won't be cut from the soul that has not expired.

English equivalent: As long as there is life, there is hope.

Zorla güzellik olmaz.

Translation: Forced beauty won't do.

E Havlayan köpek ısırılmaz.

Translation: A barking dog doesn't bite.

English equivalent: Barking dogs seldom bite.

Meaning: "People who make the most or the loudest threats are the least likely to take action."

Gözden uzak olan gönülden de uzak olur.

Translation: Who is far from the eye will also be far from the heart.

English equivalent: Out of sight, out of mind.

Babası oğluna bir bağ bağışlamış, oğul babaya bir salkım üzüm vermemiş.

Translation: The father donated a vineyard to his son, the son didn't give a single bunch of grapes to the father.

Note: Used when a person does something ungrateful and selfish to another person who made good deeds for him.

English equivalent: Ingratitude is the world's reward

Ateş olmayan yerden duman çıkmaz.

Translation: No smoke will come out from a place where there is no fire.

English equivalent: Where there is smoke, there is fire.

Meaning: "There is no effect without some cause. or It is supposed that if there is a rumour, there must be some truth behind it."

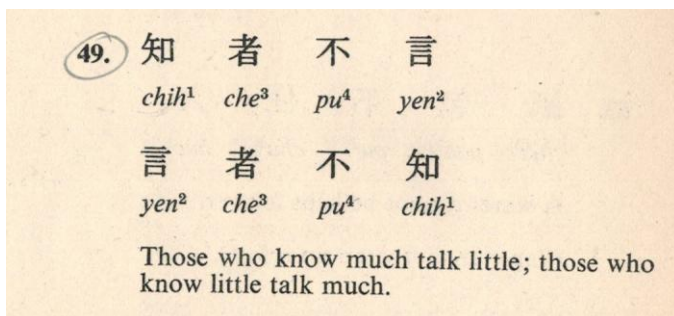

3.6 CHINESE – BUSINESS IN TAIWAN, SAYINGS IN MANDARIN AND ENGLISH

It was a pleasure conducting business with Chinese, in Taiwan and Singapore. In 1979, a few days after the birth of my youngest daughter, I conducted business negotiations in Taiwan for six long weeks on a huge contract. The Chinese decided to submit this European (actually African/Asian) businessman to Chinese torture in attrition tactics that succeeded in most of the cases. They held for a long week negotiations on the penalties clause, made long breaks, and were convinced that this young businessman will not be able to stay for such a long period in Taipei, which was not very "international" in those days. I knew that the building for the simulator system could not be ready on time and that my company would suffer from it as we wouldn't receive full payment for the delivery which was after acceptance tests. So, I tried to put in the contract a clause of reciprocity that as my company would have to pay penalties if we were late on deliveries, the Taiwanese would pay penalties if they would be late in erecting the building for the simulator. My counterparts were offended, "You don't trust us? We are never late!". I answered that if they don't fear that they would be late they shouldn't mind putting a clause of reciprocity. "But, that is a question of principle, we never can admit that we'll not fulfill our promises" they said, and I answered them "Likewise, we are also offended that you suspect us for not delivering on time". "But it is not comparable, you are the seller and we are the buyer, and we have never heard that the buyer pays to the seller penalties!" they said.

This negotiation took place for a week, and the Chinese were sure that I will break and return to my family with a minimal profit and no reciprocity. But I didn't give up and gave my counterparts the feeling that I was enjoying my stay in Taipei. Every morning I came with a new saying of Confucius which I learned in my Chinese courses and told them how I enjoyed Chinese Opera. Until, one day, after weeks of negotiations, I said: "Don't you think that if you are late in the delivery of the building we need to have at least compensation?" My counterparts smiled and answered: "Compensation - yes, but Penalties – no!". And so I got the essence of reciprocity that I wanted, without the offending terminology, but with the same amounts of compensation. The Chinese saved face and I went back to my baby Shirly, with the most profitable contract my company ever received, and with a tie result between Chinese and Jews.

As a final touch we'll bring here a Chinese saying from my book of Chinese, which I quoted in Chinese to my Taiwanese colleagues, when they complained, in one of the 20 courses meals that I was invited to, that I didn't drink and didn't talk much, as other Europeans do:

We bring here a selected collection of sayings of Chinese Sages. The Chinese are one of the wisest people, with an ancient and glorious history, philosophy and culture, recovering only now their due place in the world. For those who are not fluent in Mandarin, we bring the English counterparts and literal translation, as after all, there are many commonalities between Eastern & Western civilizations, culture, ethical precepts, sayings, proverbs. Ultimately, we are all alike.

3.7 SINGAPORE – ONE OF THE MOST ETHICAL COUNTRIES IN THE WORLD

I made short stays in Hong Kong and Japan, and was much impressed by the megatowns of Hong Kong – so lively and interesting, and Tokyo where I saw a Kabuki performance. I took the opportunity to visit Thailand with Ruthy, as I had a vacation of 10 days for the Chinese New Year, while I was teaching a semester at Insead Singapore. Thailand is a touristic treasure, so exotic, with friendly people, with too much poverty, at very affordable prices that attract European and Asian tourists, and especially Israeli youngsters who think that it is a must to stay weeks and months at the beaches, including my daughter Shirly. Personally, I prefer by far Singapore, as for me the best countries to visit are ethical, clean, safe, even if they are less beautiful or exotic than others. Well, you can travel to Switzerland which has all the merits, but Singapore has also its special beauty, its people are much friendlier than the Swiss, and a European or Japanese can feel himself at home there, very safe, and not estranged by extreme poverty, filth and diseases. You had the feeling that the government there cared for the citizens.

I was amazed by my visit to Singapore in 2006. I had visited the country before, but I marvelled to see what a beautiful, friendly, clean, rich, ethical, and hospitable country it had become.

Everything was so efficient, so sophisticated, so honest, better than in most European countries. No wonder that businessmen from the richest countries felt at home there, in spite of the harsh weather. I enjoyed less shopping, but I was aware of the perfection and good bargains that they had achieved there. The cultural achievements were also extraordinary, museums, concerts, universities. Singapore changed from third world to first, and ranks among the best countries in the world on most parameters, because of its ethical conduct and the ethical leadership of its late leader Lee Kuan Yew, and did not start to behave ethically after becoming one of the richest countries in the world, but quite the opposite. Among the ten most ethical countries, Singapore is an exception, located right near the Equator, a former UK colony with a deep British influence, with a majority of Chinese and minorities of Malaysians and Indians, and with a common language – English. However, China is ranked no. 100 in Transparency International – TI's index, Malaysia – no. 50, and India – no. 85. The reason of Singapore's lack of corruption is therefore primarily because of the leadership of its founder Lee Kuan Yew, who lead and influenced Singapore since its inception, which could prove that ethical leadership is a very important indicator of ethics. Analyzing the indicators of the most ethical countries, we find that Luxembourg has a huge external debt of $2,935B, Netherlands - $2,347B, Switzerland - $1,544B and Singapore - $1,174B. But, bearing in mind that the four ethical countries, small as they are, are also financial superpowers with large banks and a very high level of financial activities, we shouldn't be surprised of those figures. But then, we put them in proportion to the gross and net government debt in % of GDP, and we find that Singapore has a gross government debt of 111%, but a net government debt of...0! So, those figures just show the level of financial activities but Singapore is a very sound economy with a AAA credit rating. I was aware that Singapore learned a lot from Israel in its early days and now it can be an example to Israel.

3.8 THE ULTIMATE TRIP TO AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

My most enjoyable vacation was a trip for one whole month to Australia and New Zealand in 1999, which I took with my daughter Shirly, after she finished her military service, to compensate her that I abandoned her for the negotiations in Taiwan when she was a baby. The trip was planned to the minute, and luckily enough, all went exactly like planned. In Australia we took one day or half a day organized tours and made the reservations for the hotels, commuting on our own from site to site. No Australian tour was so extensive to take us during a couple of weeks to all the sites in Sydney, Melbourne, Cairns, Darwin, Ayers Rock, etc. But in New Zealand we took a two-week organized tour that took care of everything without the headache of organizing the tour. Both tours went well, luckily. I am a very organized and efficient person, condensing to the maximum my work and my trips (also in Provence, the Balkans, Spain, Germany, US, Scandinavia...), my readings and my hobbies. In the one month tour we took 21 flights, with a consecutive flight from Tel Aviv (after driving from Haifa) to Athens, to Bangkok, to Sydney and to Melbourne. We had to do it in "one" day (a very long day indeed), as in the morning after – we had our first tour to Great Ocean Road. We commuted in flights to every site: from Melbourne to Darwin, via Adelaide, from Darwin to Cairns via Gove, from Cairns to Ayers Rock, via Alice Springs, from Ayers Rock to Sydney, from Sydney to Auckland in New Zealand, from Wellington to Christchurch, from Christchurch to Mount Cook, from Christchurch to Sydney and all the way back to Tel Aviv, via Bangkok and Athens. We took flights on balloon in Cairns, with Cessna in Ayers Rock to King Canyon, with helicopter from Franz Josef Glacier, Fox Glacier to the top of Mount Cook. We took also 12 cruises in the Yellow Waters of Kakadu, Dainty River in Cape Tribulation, Pamaigiri in Cairns with an Army Duck, from Cairns to Barrier Reef to Green Island, with a Glass Boat in the island, in Waitomo Glowworm Caves in New Zealand, Milford Sound – fjord cruise, Lake Wakitipu (a 80 years old steamboat, but completely safe), Shotover Jet in Queenstown also completely safe, Showboat and Captain Cook riverboats in Sydney Harbour, Gondolas in Christchurch. Well, you get the message, Shirley was 20 but I, who wanted to visit as much as possible, was 55...

But this was only the preamble. We went to 12 tours in Australia – Melbourne City Tour, Phillip Island penguins and farms, Great Ocean Road – a whole day very hard trip just after landing in Melbourne and having a few hours sleep, we didn't have the time for a jetlag. Darwin City Tour, Kakadu National Park, Green Island forests and beaches, Cape Tribulation National Park which was also very safe, as everything else in Australia and New Zealand – jungles, deserts, caves, balloons, helicopter to the top of a snowy mountain, Cessna flight in a very narrow Canyon, Pamaigiri and Koala Parks (also the Koalas are very safe, the Kangaroos, etc.). Then we visited Ayers Rock – sunrise and sunset, Olgas, Sydney Tour and Koala Park, Blue Mountains Kangaroos. The trip was under the sign of 12 – in New Zealand also: Auckland, Mount Eden, Waitomo Caves, Rotorua, Wakarewa, Rainbow Springs, Huka Falls, Lake Taupo, Mount Tongerino, Volcanoes – Mounts Ruapalu and Ngawake (the New Zealanders live in harmony with the Maoris, the Australians try to do so with the Aborigines). Wellington, Mount Cook National Park, Mountains and lakes from Mount Cook to Queenstown, Queenstown, Fiordland National Park (every National Park is kept like a pharmacy), West Coast Haast Pass from Queenstown to Fox, Franz Josef Glacier to Greymouth, Tranzalpine Express, Christchurch.

There were also 12 shows, plays, etc. Sweeny Todd in Wellington, Turandot at Sydney Opera House (the first time Shirley got to the opera and she enjoyed it very much), Fame in Casino Sydney, A letter of resignation in Sydney, Maori and Aborigin shows, Agrodome – sheep in Rotorua, Walter Peaks – animals in Queenstown, etc. There were also 7 cable cars, 7 special dinners in the most exotic places, and finally 7 hikes just to keep in shape in Mount Cook – very high mountains, Blue Mountains – mountains and hills, Lakes and Falls – lakes and rivers, Ayers Rock – desert, bush, Snow and Glaciers, Beaches and Jungles in Kakadu and Tribulation. Well, this entire trip lasted less than a month, including two days flights in each direction. On the last day I had scheduled a tour to Canberra from Sydney - four hours in each direction just to see the capital of Australia. As I looked already green, and Shirley was afraid that I will have a heart attack on the flight back, she cancelled on her own the tour and instead we had an "easy" day in Sydney, visiting the aquarium, a harbor cruise with the showboat, some shopping, presents to the friends and family, and theater at night. One last remark – we had a fantastic group in New Zealand, but on the first morning a couple of the tourists, a priest and his wife, asked Shirley and me very carefully what were the relations between us. Shirley and me told them that we were father and daughter, but we didn't understand the question. So, the priest told us that a few minutes before he approached another couple – a woman of 70 and a man of 30 - and told them that he was very moved how a mother took her son to a trip even at her age. But the old lady was offended, and told him that they were husband and wife and they were on their honeymoon. Shirley made friends with everybody and enjoyed being the tour "queen". She admitted that this month was much more enjoyable than the other trips that her friends made to Goa in India, Thailand Beaches, Patagonia, or Vietnam. And her father was indeed a Mensch!

This book will not describe the tours, business trips and study of me and my family in Europe. The intermediate number of countries visited is 34 (abovementioned). So, as it would take at least 100 pages to tell the story of the touring visits to Europe, and as most of the time the family spent abroad was in Europe (well, the US can count as Europe also), I studied there for my MBA and PhD, worked there for most of the time that I spent outside Israel, went to hundreds of plays and concerts over the years (some of them are mentioned in this book), we'll skip the saga of the European visits, except the Balkans, and leave the impression that I am not a Europocentrist, as I had a lot of experience in other parts of the world from Africa to Thailand, and my European experience is present all over the book anyhow, with anecdotes and stories by the dozens.

3.9 A TRIP TO THE BALKANS IN 2015

We just made with an excellent guide and good friends a fantastic trip to the Balkans. To be exact – 8 countries (or 9...) in 16 days, an average of two days for each country, to those who would condemn me for dilettantism I would say – that I have visited dozens of times Paris, the United States, and still want to visit them more, but I thought that 16 days would be enough to find the gist of the Balkans, that's why we call the trip Tastes of the Balkans. I took out Greece, that I have visited several times and am willing to visit it even more – as very few countries can offer such culture, music, scenery, lovely and friendly people, and... lousy economics! Without Greece and Slovenia which we visited a few years ago – we visited all the Balkans (last time we visited for a week the National Parks of Croatia, and this time we were only a day in Dubrovnik). We decided not to visit Kosovo, because frankly we couldn't find any interesting sites to visit. So, we visited for the first time – Serbia, Bosnia Herzegovina, Montenegro, Albania, Macedonia, Bulgaria and Romania. If we add to it Croatia (Dubrovnik) and Republika Srpska, it amounts to 9 countries, and if we add to it Greece and European Turkey that we visited before – it means that we visited all the countries in the Balkans (Kosovo is not yet recognized by the UN). Now, 99% of the readers would ask: what is Republika Srpska, is it Serbia, a renegade state or what?

To tell the truth, I didn't know either until I started to plan the trip to the Balkans. I knew that there is Serbia (Republika Srbija), which was once the core of Yugoslavia with its capital Belgrade, and now – sic transit gloria mundi – after conducting civil wars against Bosnia, Croatia and Kosovo, had to divest itself from all the republics of Yugoslavia, including Montenegro, Macedonia and Slovenia, and also from Kosovo, which was an integral part of the republic of Serbia. So, what is this republic which has an almost identical name to Serbia? Can we visit it, do we need visas, has it international borders, a different language (to Serbian, Croatian, Montenegrin, Macedonian, Slovenian and Bosnian?). Well, apparently the panacea of Bosnia Herzegovina is no more than a panacea, comprising of two so called autonomous regions but actually different and independent states: the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina which comprises completely autonomous Croatian and Bosnian cantons, and Republika Srpska spread on no less than half of Bosnia! This is a Serb nation bordering Serbia, that was recognized as a separate entity, and a so-called joined ruling of the country of Bosnia and Herzegovina. After the war between Bosnia and Serbia, 50% of the houses in the Federation were damaged, while in the Serbian region only 25% were damaged. Two million people, about half of former Bosnia's population was displaced, 435,346 Serbian refugees came to Republika Srpska and 197,925 have gone to Serbia. Ethnic cleansing has considerably reduced the number of other groups.

According to Wikipedia: "Serb police, soldiers, and irregulars attacked Muslims and Croats, and burned and looted their homes. Some were killed on the spot, others were rounded up and killed elsewhere, or forced to flee." So, now, the territory of Republika Srpska is 24,857 sq km, about half of the country. The population of 1,326,991 is divided as follows: Serbs: 97%, Bosniaks 2%, Croats 1%. According to its constitution, Republika Srpska has its own president, parliament, executive government with a prime minister and several ministries, its own police force, supreme court and lower courts, customs service, and a postal service. It also has its symbols, including coat of arms, flag – a variant of the Serbian flag, and national anthem. East Sarajevo is the capital of Republika Srpska, but Banja Luka is the headquarters of most of the institutions of government, including the parliament, and is therefore the de facto capital. Bosnia and Herzegovina has a bicameral legislature and a three-member Presidency composed of a member of each major ethnic group – Serbs, Croats and Bosniaks. The central government's power is highly limited, as the country is largely decentralized and comprises two autonomous entities: the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Republika Srpska, with a third region, the Brcko District, governed under local government. The Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina is itself complex and consists of 10 federal units – cantons: Croats and Bosniaks. In short, the artificial structure of Bosnia and Herzegovina is a panacea, and Republika Srpska acts de facto as an independent state, populated fully by Serbs, and paying only a lip service to the united Bosnia.

When you speak with locals, they tell you that this artificial structure will not continue forever. To a foreigner like me I cannot understand the reasons for the civil war in former Yugoslavia, the languages are almost identical, they look alike, the folklore is very similar, and they would have gained much more from a unified economy and country than from a divided country comprising 6 to 10 states (it depends if you include Kosovo, Republika Srpska, Brcko District, and the autonomous Croat cantons in Bosnia). But, so are baffled foreigners when they come to the Middle East as they don't understand the reasons of the conflicts. Well, we know of course what are the causes of the tensions in the Balkans as in the Middle East – if we think that Croats are the same as Serbs and Bosniaks this is not at all how they perceive themselves – completely different ethnically and religiously – Croats and Slovenians are Catholics, Serbians, Montenegrins and Macedonians are Christian Orthodox, Bosniaks and Albanian Kosovars are Muslims. If we examine the whole of the Balkans, we find of course the Greeks who are not Slavs as most of the former Yugoslavians, and the Turks who differ from all the others. The same is in the Middle East – Jews and Arabs feel that they are completely different ethnically, religiously and mentally, Sunnis and Shiites feel that they are completely different religiously, and of course Kurds, Druzes, and other minorities differ totally from the Arabs and Jews. Only after wars of attrition like in Yugoslavia and the Middle East will terminate, the situation might improve like it did in Europe where the people perceive much more what unites them and they don't mind at all ethnic and religious differences, having reached at last the peace equilibrium. The people of former Yugoslavia should not count on UN or NATO forces, it didn't help the Muslims in the Srebrenica massacre where the UN peacekeepers could not prevent the town's capture by the Serbs and the subsequent massacre. We, in the Middle East know too well, what is the effect of demilitarisation as proposed for Palestine, what had the UN forces done in Lebanon before the Second Lebanon War, in Sinai before the Six Day War, in the Golan Heights... The UN forces act like the old Romanian proverb – the shirt is close to the body but the skin is even closer, why should they risk their lives for Bosniaks, Serbs, Jews or Arabs?

The origins of Ruthy and me are mainly from the Balkans – Greece, Romania and Turkey (European Turkey is part of the Balkans and Smyrna was mainly European with Greeks settling in all the West Coast of Anatolia), and many of the Israelis originate from the Balkans or countries with a similar culture and Slavic language as Bulgaria and the countries of former Yugoslavia, like Poland and Russia. The Balkans has its feet in the East and its head in the West, the religion, language, and folklore are mainly from Eastern Europe, but the aspirations were always to be Western, in the case of Greece – they gave the Western world a large portion of its culture – theater, literature, democracy, philosophy, mythology. Even, when it was conquered by the Muslim Turks, the people didn't assimilate and kept their European culture and religion, and so did the Jews who continued to speak Ladino and didn't assimilate in the Turkish population. Most of the Jews who came from Arabic countries had a European culture (in the Maghreb, Egypt, Syria and Lebanon – French, in Iraq – English, and in Lybia – Italian), so Israel, like the Balkans, has a European culture and European aspirations. Part of the Balkans is already member of the EU (Slovenia, Croatia, Bulgaria and Romania) and the other countries would like very much to join the EU (Montenegro for example has set the Euro as its currency, Serbia and Bosnia's EU aspiration has contributed to their peace agreements). So, because of the affinities with the Balkans, it was very interesting for Ruthy and me to visit the Balkans, and we found many analogies between the countries, their animosities, and their mentality and folklore.

The trip to the Balkans was organized like my other trips to Provence, Australia, Spain, the US, to ten countries in Europe in the family's first trip in 1978, etc., very tightly with maximum coverage, no time for shopping, imponderable, or leisure, trying to see as much as possible in the shortest time. In the evenings we saw folklore shows or visited the towns and cities by night. However, I was completely mistaken in my planning of travel time – I thought that a distance of 100 or 200 kms between two main cities would take one to two hours, but I learned in the hard way that it took twice or thrice as much because of the condition of the roads and highways, border checks (we had 24 border checks...) and travel problems. When traveling from Mostar in Bosnia to Dubrovnik in Croatia, we had 6 border checks, as Bosnia has an enclave to the sea in the middle of the highway to Dubrovnik, every country checks all the passports, and sometimes the driver had to pay small amounts in order to speed up matters (we learned that afterwards), in one instance we didn't receive back two of the passports, in another case the policeman (who was not dressed in uniforms) told our driver that he didn't stop at a stop signal and didn't fasten his seatbelt, so the fine would be 240 Euros and he would have to go to the police station to pay, but he was ready to settle this matter if he would pay him 120 Euros. We learned that also a posteriori, and that presented to us (or to me at least) an ethical dilemma, to complain, to whom, to lose time, there were no proofs and the driver would not want to complain, the bribe was not paid by us, possibly the policemen who were waiting in their cars outside the border station cooperated with the guy who took the bribe... Ruthy and me decided not to visit anymore this country, but why should we penalize a whole country for the misdeeds of one corrupt person?

Anyhow, the driver was so shocked that he decided to return home and we had to find a local bus and guides, who were by the way excellent. I noticed throughout the trip that the drivers were extremely polite and in roads where we climbed to steep mountains where there was only one lane (for both directions) one of the drivers had to return back sometimes a whole kilometer until we found a way to continue our trip. In other countries that I know, drivers would have cursed and refuse to give way or argue who should give way first, but in the Balkans the drivers of buses, private cars or trucks behave so politely, that I couldn't believe how a few years ago their countrymen killed thousands of civilians without pity, and their politeness was only superficial or applied only to unimportant matters. I don't want that one should get the impression that we didn't enjoy our trip, on the contrary – the trip was very successful, even if we travelled more than scheduled we had enough time to visit all the sites that we planned and were very much impressed by the beauty of those countries, all of them – Albania (visiting beautiful Tirana and the mosque, that was built from 1789 to 1821 – one of the most turbulent periods in Europe, is a perfect answer to the racists who think that all Muslims are extremists, the country was totally European, men and women dressed like in the Christian countries, it was amazing how a few years ago this country was ruled by a retrograde regime and how it returned to "normal" so fast), Montenegro (one of the few countries that didn't suffer from the civil war, we enjoyed much Kotor Bay), Macedonia (where the Cyrillic script was developed by Cyril and Methodius, we enjoyed very much Ohrid), Croatia (Dubrovnik is one of the most beautiful towns in the world), Serbia (we enjoyed much Novi Sad and strolling along the Danube), Bosnia and Herzegovina (Sarajevo and Mostar are two jems worth visiting), Bulgaria (Veliko Turnovo has one of the most beautiful fortresses that I have ever seen), and Romania (where Ruthy was born and she visited it for the first time since she was 3, Bucharest – not quite Paris, but a nice try, the extravagant parliament palace, beautiful Brasov, and Dracula's palace that is not so frightening).

In Republika Srpska we visited the ethno village Stanisici, near Bijeljina, the second largest city in the Republika Srpska, a few kilometers from the border with Serbia. The complex contains the Saint father Nicola monastery, old original barn houses, restaurants, etc. After we visited the village and took pictures with the black and white swans we lunched there and continued to Sarajevo. Back home, I looked on the Internet what happened in Bijeljina. The city was invaded by the Serbs in April 1992, non-Serbs were killed or expelled. Those who want to learn what happened during the war in the region can search it on Wikipedia. We saw in Serbia, Bosnia, Republika Srpska and a few years ago in Croatia the terrible signs of the war, buildings in ruin, bullets holes in the walls of buildings, the tunnel of hope in Sarajevo. It is incredible to see what damages the war has done to the towns, but of course it is much worse to see what has happened to the population. Now, it is summer, the sun shines, tourists are visiting, except the signs kept on purpose, all would be forgotten, but the wounds are still apparent. The Middle East and the Balkans, sites of interminable wars over the centuries, suffering of millions of peoples, but is the suffering different than what has happened during the recent wars in Poland, Russia, France, Germany, Netherlands, Ukraine, China, Japan, Vietnam, Cambodia, all over Africa? The most tragic is that those wars could have been prevented, but I cannot say if the way to prevent them would have been hawkish or dovish – we saw what the result of the dovish attitude of France and England towards Germany in 1938 was, we saw what the result of the hawkish attitude of Germany prior and during World War II was, especially to the Russian, the Jews and ultimately the Germans too. How should we behave to countries like Iran, Afghanistan, North Korea, towards organizations as Daesh, Al-Qaeda, Hamas... Who is to blame for the tragedy of the Balkans, how has Tito managed to keep a prosperous and peaceful country over dozens of years, and why have his successors failed, is the problem – in leadership, undoubtedly, but it is not the unique problem. Anyhow the trip to the Balkans was most instructing and unforgettable.

Finally, we would like to check what was the Transparency International's rating of Ethics and Lack of Corruption for the Balkans countries. We see that their ethical ranking varies between quite ethical to corrupt countries and most of them rank between 60 to 80 (1 is the most ethical country and 174 is the most corrupt country), so the Balkans countries are ranked on the average at the lower ranks of the first half of the countries. Slovenia is an exception as it is quite ethical with the rank of 39, one of the four most ethical countries among the former communist countries, with Estonia, Poland and Lithuania. All of them are members of the EU, together with more corrupt countries: Croatia (61), Bulgaria, Greece and Romania – all three are ranked 69. Macedonia is ranked 64 with Turkey, Montenegro – 76, Serbia – 78, Bosnia and Herzegovina – 80. The most corrupt countries of the Balkans are – Albania and Kosovo – 110. Yet, they are not the most corrupt countries in Europe, as Belarus, Russia and Ukraine are much more corrupt.

3.10 PLANS TO VISIT ADDITIONAL COUNTRIES

What about the plans to visit additional countries? At 70 you start to visit all the places that you hadn't time to visit when you were younger. You have the time, you have sufficient money, and health is not catastrophic, anyhow if you don't travel now health will be worse in a decade. The easiest way to travel at this age is with cruises and the ultimate cruise is the double Around The World Cruises of Oceania during six months each. In every cruise you visit about fifty countries, many of them tiny islands, and even if you visit a large country as China you visit only Shanghai, Hong Kong and possibly Beijing. This is the ideal way to travel if you don't want to suffer from the poverty and filth and you make a short visit until evening, returning to the ship soon enough to have your dinner with no stomach aches, to watch the night show, possibly with one of the local groups, and go to sleep in your clean bed. This is not exactly a muchileros trip, but it is enough to give you an idea of what you have lost by not visiting those countries when you were younger. In this way you can visit the following ports in the northern part of the globe in the cruise leaving Miami in July, as you can visit in the most convenient conditions such frozen countries as Greenland and Iceland, exotic countries as Israel, Jordan and the Persian Gulf states, Singapore, Hong Kong, and some countries in Asia and Africa that some are afraid to visit on their own. As a bonus you visit Eastern Canada, Western Europe, Southern Europe and exotic islands as Seychelles and Caribbean islands: Miami, Port Canaveral, Norfolk, New York, Boston, Bar Harbor, Saint John, Halifax, Sydney, Charlottetown, Saguenay, Quebec City, Montreal, Trois-Rivieres, Corner Brook, Nuuk, Paamiut, Qaqortoq, Isafjordur, Reykjavik, Torshavn, Bergen, Kristiansand, Oslo, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Bruges, London, Bordeaux, Biarritz, Gijon, La Coruna, Oporto, Lisbon, Seville, Barcelona, Florence, Rome, Amalfi, Taormina, Valletta, Rhodes, Limassol, Jerusalem, Aqaba, Salalah, Muscat, Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Fujairah, Mumbai, Goa, Mangalore, Cochin, Colombo, Rangoon, Phuket, Singapore, Ko Samui, Sihanoukville, Bangkok, Saigon, Hue, Hanoi, Hong Kong, Manila, Kota Kinabalu, Muara, Kuching, Penang, Male, Mahe, La Digue, Mombasa, Zanzibar, Dar Es Salaam, Nosy Be, Maputo, Richards Bay, Durban, East London, Cape Town, Luderitz, Walvis Bay, Luanda, Sao Tome, Bom Bom Island, Lome, Sekondi-Takoradi, Abidjan, Banjul, Dakar, Mindelo, Bridgetown, Fort de France, Pointe a Pitre, St. George's, Willemstad, Key West, Miami.

In the "true" around the world trip leaving Miami in January you visit also about 50 countries, but this time in the southern part of the globe, many of them tiny islands in the Caribbean and the Pacific, you visit again Singapore, some countries in Asia and Africa, but this time you visit richer countries as China – Xiamen, Shanghai and Beijing, South Korea Seoul, Japan – Hiroshima, Kyoto and Okinawa, you visit Australia and New Zealand, and also Mexico, Central America, Brazil, etc. In those cruises you don't visit most of South America - Peru, Argentina, Chile...: Miami, Oranjestad, Willemstad, Kralendijk, St. George's, Castries, Fort de France, Bridgetown, Scarborough, Devil's Island, Belem, Fortaleza, Natal, Recife, Lome, Cotonou, Sao Tome, Luanda, Walvis Bay, Luderitz, Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, East London, Durban, Richards Bay, Maputo, Nosy Be, Dar Es Salaam, Zanzibar, Mombasa, Mahe, Male, Mangalore, Cochin, Rangoon, Penang, Kuala Lumpur, Singapore, Ko Samui, Bangkok, Sihanoukville, Saigon, Hanoi, Sanya, Hong Kong, Xiamen, Shanghai, Beijing, Seoul, Hiroshima, Kyoto, Okinawa, Manila, Boracay Island, Kota Kinabalu, Muara, Kuching, Bali, Komodo, Darwin, Cooktown, Cairns, Townsville, Newcastle, Sydney, Hobart, Picton, Napier, Rotorua, Auckland, Apia, Pago Pago, Raiatea, Bora Bora, Papeete, Huahine, Rangiroa, Nuku Hiva, Hilo, Honolulu, Lahaina, Nawiliwili, Los Angeles, San Diego, Cabo San Lucas, Acapulco, Puerto Quetzal, Corinto, Puntarenas, Cartagena, Key West, Miami. This is all fine, provided that you have the time to be away from your country and your family, for six months and possibly a year, that you have 200,000 Euros to pay for a couple in the cheapest staterooms, that you don't work at all, and your health is good enough for such a trip.

Many more countries are waiting for our visits, and first of all South America. I feel myself at home in Latin America because of the mutual culture and mentality (but not the corruption and crime – in this respect I feel more Scandinavian, Swiss and Singaporean). I devised two trips of 25 days each, one to mid South America and one to south South America, with cruises and flights, folkloric shows and trekking. The first trip is to Peru – Lima, Paracas, Nazca Lines, Ballestas Islands, Cusco, Machu Picchu, Sacred Valley of the Incas, Lake Titicaca, Puno, Uros Islands, Taquile Island. Then to Bolivia – Tiwanaku, La Paz, Salar de Uyuni and Sucre. The Amazon – Brazil – Manaus, Rio Negro, Rio Solimoes, Colombia– Leticia in a jungle lodge with trekking and canoeing, Indian villages, flora and fauna. Finally to Ecuador – Quito, Quilotoa Crater Lake, the Equator Monument, Panamerica Highway, Galapagos Islands. The second trip is to Chile and Argentina – Santiago, Valparaiso, Bariloche, Parque Nacional Vicente Perez Rosales, Cordillera de los Andes, Puerto Montt, Puerto Natales, Punta Arenas, Torres del Paine National Park, Lagos Pehoe and Grey, glaciers, Bernardo O'Higgins National Park, Lago Argentino, Parque Nacional Los Glaciares, Ushuaia, one day flight to Antarctica, Buenos Aires. In Uruguay – visit Montevideo, Colonia and in Paraguay – Itaipu Dam and Ciudad del Este. In Brazil – Iguazu Falls, Ecological Jungle Train, Devil's Throat Canyon. Salvador de Bahia, Peninsula d'Itapagipe, Cachoeira, Rio Paraguacu, Rio de Janeiro, Petropolis, The Carnival.

What other countries and sites it is worthwhile to visit? Canadian Rocky Mountains, Nashville Dixieland, Memphis, Orlando, Cape Carnaveral, Epcot, Yellowstone, Death Valley, Lake Tahoe, Grand Teton National Park, other parks in the US and Canada, Alaska cruise, in-depth visit to Central America – Mexico, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Panama, and Caribbean cruise to Jamaica, Barbados, Virgin Islands. Mississippi River Cruise from New Orleans to Saint Paul with stopovers in St. Louis, Memphis, etc. A Danube Cruise from Germany to the Danube Delta in Romania. Russia – in a cruise, with the Trans Siberian, or by bus – Moscow, Volga, Astrakhan, Kazan, Rostov, Siberia. Visit to Ireland, northern Spain, west coast of France, Madeira, Canary Islands, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Ukraine, Crimea, Odessa, San Marino, Lichtenstein, France – Alsace, Lorraine, Bourgogne, cruises. Greece – Larissa, Olympus, monasteries, Peleponese. China, Korea, Mongolia, Tibet, Manchuria, Japan, Tasmania, Australia, Singapore, Club Med... And of course cultural visits to Paris, London, Berlin, New York, San Francisco, Madrid, Rome, Milano, Saint Petersburg, Moscow, Vienna, Prague, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Barcelone, etc. I have attended every year in the last years the Haifa Film Festival, and occasionally the film festivals in London and Vancouver, occasionally theater festivals in Israel, Edimburgh and Avignon, classical music festivals in Israel. I have seen hundreds of plays, mainly in Paris, London and New York, and of course in Israel, and I intend to see even more in the future. But my ideal trips would be to attend the film festivals in Cannes, Berlin, Venezia, etc., the theater, opera and classical music festivals all over the world, but especially in France, UK, US, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, etc. in the best rows and with the ability to hear well everything.

3.11 EUROPE: GEOGRAPHY, POPULATION, CULTURE, LANGUAGES, RELIGIONS, etc.

Since this book is focused in many aspects on Europe the continent I know most, its culture, literature, films, art, theater, visits... I'll bring in this chapter details on the geography of Europe, its population, culture, languages, religions, etc. Europe is a continent that comprises the westernmost part of Eurasia. Europe is bordered by the Arctic Ocean to the north, the Atlantic Ocean to the west, and the Mediterranean Sea to the south. To the east and southeast, Europe is generally considered as separated from Asia by the watershed divides of the Ural and Caucasus Mountains, the Ural River, the Caspian and Black Seas, and the waterways of the Turkish Straits. Yet the borders of Europe—a concept dating back to classical antiquity—are arbitrary, as the primarily physiographic term "continent" also incorporates cultural and political elements. Europe is the world's second-smallest continent by surface area, covering about 10,180,000 square kilometres (3,930,000 sq mi) or 2% of the Earth's surface and about 6.8% of its land area. Of Europe's approximately 50 countries, Russia is by far the largest by both area and population, taking up 40% of the continent (although the country has territory in both Europe and Asia), while Vatican City is the smallest. Europe is the third-most populous continent after Asia and Africa, with a population of 739–743 million or about 11% of the world's population.^[6] Europe has a climate heavily affected by warm Atlantic currents, tempering winters and enabling warm summers on most of the continent, even on latitudes that have severe climates in North America and Asia. Further from the Atlantic, seasonal differences increase, but the mildness of the climate remains. Europe, in particular ancient Greece, is the birthplace of Western culture. The fall of the Western Roman Empire, during the migration period, marked the end of ancient history and the beginning of an era known as the "middle ages". The Renaissance humanism, exploration, art, and science led the "old continent", and eventually the rest of the world, to the modern era. From this period onwards, Europe played a predominant role in global affairs. Between the 16th and 20th centuries, European nations controlled at various times the Americas, most of Africa, Oceania, and the majority of Asia.

The Industrial Revolution, which began in the United Kingdom around the end of the 18th century, gave rise to radical economic, cultural, and social change in Western Europe, and eventually the wider world. Demographic growth meant that, by 1900, Europe's share of the world's population was 25%. Both world wars were largely focused upon Europe, greatly contributing to a decline in Western European dominance in world affairs by the mid-20th century as the United States and Soviet Union took prominence. During the Cold War, Europe was divided along the Iron Curtain between NATO in the west and the Warsaw Pact in the east, until the revolutions of 1989 and fall of the Berlin Wall. European integration led to the formation of the European Union, a political entity that lies between a confederation and a federation. The EU originated in Western Europe but has been expanding eastward since the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991. The currency of the European Union, the Euro, is the most commonly used among Europeans and the EU's Schengen Area abolishes border and immigration controls among most of its member states. The use of the term "Europe" has developed gradually throughout history. In antiquity, the Greek historian Herodotus mentioned that the world had been divided by unknown persons into three parts, Europe, Asia, and Libya (Africa), with the Nile and the River Phasis forming their boundaries—though he also states that some considered the River Don, rather than the Phasis, as the boundary between Europe and Asia. Europe's eastern frontier was defined in the 1st century by geographer Strabo at the River Don. The Book of Jubilees described the continents as the lands given by Noah to his three sons; Europe was defined as stretching from the Pillars of Hercules at the Strait of Gibraltar, separating it from North Africa, to the Don, separating it from Asia.

As a continent, the economy of Europe is currently the largest on Earth and it is the richest region as measured by assets under management with over $32.7 trillion compared to North America's $27.1 trillion in 2008. In 2009 Europe remained the wealthiest region. Its $37.1 trillion in assets under management represented one-third of the world's wealth. It was one of several regions where wealth surpassed its precrisis year-end peak. As with other continents, Europe has a large variation of wealth among its countries. The richer states tend to be in the West; some of the Central and Eastern European economies are still emerging from the collapse of the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. The European Union, a political entity composed of 28 European states, comprises the largest single economic area in the world. 18 EU countries share the euro as a common currency. Five European countries rank in the top ten of the world's largest national economies in GDP \(PPP\). This includes (ranks according to the CIA): Germany (5), the UK (6), Russia (7), France (8), and Italy (10). There is huge disparity between many European countries in terms of their income. The richest in terms of GDP per capita is Monaco with its US$172,676 per capita (2009) and the poorest is Moldova with its GDP per capita of US$1,631 (2010). Monaco is the richest country in terms of GDP per capita in the world according to the World Bank report.

Most languages of Europe belong to the Indo-European language family. This family is divided into a number of branches, including Romance, Germanic, Baltic, Slavic, Albanian, Celtic, Armenian, Iranian, and Hellenic (Greek). The Uralic languages, which include Hungarian, Finnish, and Estonian, also have a significant presence in Europe. The Turkic and Mongolic families also have several European members, while the North Caucasian and Kartvelian families are important in the southeastern extremity of geographical Europe. The Basque language of the western Pyrenees is an isolate unrelated to any other group, while Maltese, which is descended from Sicilian Arabic, is the only Semitic language in Europe with national language status.

Languages of Europe: The Indo-European language family descended from Proto-Indo-European, believed to have been spoken thousands of years ago. Indo-European languages are spoken throughout Europe. Albanian has two major dialects, Tosk Albanian and Gheg Albanian. It is spoken in Albania and Kosovo, where it has official status, and is also spoken in neighboring Macedonia, Serbia and Montenegro. Armenian has two major dialects, Western Armenian and Eastern Armenian. It is spoken in Armenia, where it has sole official status, and is also spoken in neighboring Georgia, Iran, and Azerbaijan (mainly in Nagorno-Karabakh Republic). It is also spoken in Turkey by a very small minority (Western Armenian and Homshetsi), and by small minorities in many other countries where members of the widely dispersed Armenian diaspora reside. The Baltic languages are spoken in Lithuania (Lithuanian, Samogitian) and Latvia (Latvian, Latgalian). Samogitian and Latgalian are usually considered to be dialects of Lithuanian and Latvian respectively. There are also several extinct Baltic languages, including: Galindian, Curonian, Old Prussian, Selonian, Semigallian and Sudovian. There are about six living Celtic languages, spoken in areas of northwestern Europe dubbed the "Celtic nations". All six are members of the Insular Celtic family, which in turn is divided into: Brythonic family: Welsh (Wales), Cornish (Cornwall) and Breton (Brittany). Goidelic family: Irish (Ireland), Scottish Gaelic (Scotland), and Manx (Isle of Man). Continental Celtic languages had previously been spoken across Europe from Iberia and Gaul to Asia Minor, but became extinct in the first millennium AD.

The present-day distribution of the Germanic languages in Europe:
North Germanic languages - Icelandic, Faroese, Norwegian, Swedish, Danish.

West Germanic languages - Scots, English, Frisian, Dutch, Low German, German.

Dots indicate areas where multilingualism is common. The Germanic languages make up the predominant language family in northwestern Europe, reaching from Iceland to Sweden and from parts of the United Kingdom and Ireland to Austria. There are two extant major subdivisions: West Germanic and North Germanic. A third group, East Germanic, is now extinct; the only known surviving East Germanic texts are written in the Gothic language. There are three major groupings of West Germanic languages: Anglo-Frisian, Low Franconian (now primarily modern Dutch) and High German. The Anglo-Frisian language family has two major groups: The English languages are descended from the Old English language of the Anglo-Saxons and include: English, the main language of the United Kingdom, also used in English-speaking Europe. Modern Scots, spoken in Scotland and Ulster. The Frisian languages are spoken by about 500,000 Frisians, who live on the southern coast of the North Sea in the Netherlands and Germany. These languages include West Frisian, Saterlandic, and North Frisian. German is spoken throughout Germany, Austria, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, the East Cantons of Belgium, much of Switzerland (including the northeast areas bordering on Germany and Austria) and northern Italy (South Tyrol).

There are several groups of German dialects: High German include several dialect families: Standard German, Central German dialects, spoken in central Germany and include Luxembourgish, High Franconian, a family of transitional dialects between Central and Upper High German, Upper German, including Austro-Bavarian and Swiss German. Low German is a separate language group from High German, but is still considered a dialect. It is spoken in various regions throughout Northern Germany, but has no official status, as the official language is Standard German. Low German, Low Saxon, East Low German. Dutch is spoken throughout the Netherlands, northern Belgium, as well as the Nord-Pas de Calais region of France, and around Düsseldorf in Germany. In Belgian and French contexts, Dutch is sometimes referred to as Flemish. Dutch dialects are varied and cut across national borders. In Germany it is called East Bergish. Afrikaans is spoken by South African emigrant communities in Europe, most notably in the Netherlands, Belgium, and the United Kingdom. The North Germanic languages are spoken in Scandinavian countries and include Danish (Denmark, Greenland and the Faroe Islands), Norwegian (Norway), Swedish (Sweden and parts of Finland), Elfdalian or Övdalian (in a small part of central Sweden), Faroese (Faroe Islands), and Icelandic (Iceland).

Greek is the official language of Greece and Cyprus, and there are Greek-speaking enclaves in Albania, Bulgaria, Italy, the Republic of Macedonia, Romania, Georgia, Ukraine, Lebanon, Egypt, Israel, Jordan and Turkey, and in Greek communities around the world. Dialects of modern Greek that originate from Attic Greek (through Koine and then Medieval Greek) are Cappadocian, Pontic, Cretan, Cypriot, Katharevousa, and Yevanic. Griko is, debatably, a Doric dialect of Greek. It is spoken in the lower Calabria region and in the Salento region of Southern Italy. Tsakonian is a Doric dialect of the Greek language spoken in the lower Arcadia region of the Peloponnese around the village of Leonidio. The Indo-Aryan languages have one major representation, it being Romani. The Iranian languages in Europe include Kurdish, Persian (incl. Tat Persian), and Ossetian.

The Romance languages descended from the Vulgar Latin spoken across most of the lands of the Roman Empire. Some of the Romance languages are official in the European Union and the Latin Union and the more prominent ones are studied in many educational institutions worldwide. The list below is a summary of Romance languages commonly encountered in Europe:

- Aragonese is recognized, but not official, in Aragon (Spain).
- Asturian is recognized, but not official, in the Spanish region of Asturias.
- Catalan is official in Andorra; co-official in the Spanish regions of Catalonia, Valencian Community (as Valencian) and Balearic Islands; and recognized, but not official, in La Franja of Aragon. It is also natively spoken in Northern Catalonia, France, in the Languedoc-Roussillon region (Llengadoc-Rosselló) and in the city of Alghero, Sardinia, Italy (as Alguerese).
- Corsican is spoken on the French island of Corsica and in the extreme north of Sardinia. Traditionally split up into three different dialects pertaining to the northern and southern halves of Corsica, in addition to the Sardinian subregion of Gallura, the origins of the language date back to the Middle Ages and are closely related to Tuscan. Its prospects of survival are better than most other French minority languages, but it still suffers from the lack of promotion.
- Emiliano-Romagnolo is a Gallo-Italic language. Its two dialects are Emilian and Romagnol, which are spoken in the Northern Italian region of Emilia-Romagna, parts of Lombardy, Marche, Liguria and Tuscany, and San Marino.

- Franco-Provençal, sometimes called "Arpitan", protected by statutes in the Aosta Valley Autonomous Region of Italy, also spoken alpine valleys of the province of Turin, two communities in province of Foggia, Romandy region of western Switzerland, and in east central France (i.e., between standard French and Occitan domains). It is in serious danger of extinction.
- French is official in France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Monaco, Switzerland and the Channel Islands. It is also official in Canada, in many African countries and in overseas departments and territories of France.
- Friulian is spoken in the Italian province of Udine, including the area of the Carnia Alps, and widely throughout the province of Pordenone, in half of the province of Gorizia, and in the eastern part of the province of Venice.
- Galician, akin to Portuguese, is co-official in Galicia, Spain. It is also spoken by Galician diaspora.
- Italian is official in Italy, San Marino, Switzerland, Vatican City and Istria (in Croatia and Slovenia). It is also widely spoken in Malta and Monaco.
- Ladin is spoken in the northern Italian provinces of South Tyrol, Trentino and Belluno. It is an officially recognized language in Trentino and South Tyrol by provincial and national law.
- Latin is usually classified as an Italic language of which the Romance languages are a subgroup. It is extinct as a spoken language, but it is widely used as a liturgical language by the Roman Catholic Church and studied in many educational institutions. It is also the official language of the Holy See (but not of the Vatican City State). Latin was the main language of literature, sciences, and arts for many centuries and greatly influenced all European languages.
- Leonese is recognized in Spain's autonomous Castile and León region
- Mirandese is officially recognized by the Portuguese Parliament.
- Norman has been debatedly referred to as a language in its own right or a dialect of standard French with its own regional character. Its use is recognized in the Channel Islands, remnants of the historical Duchy of Normandy, and since 2008 it is among the regional languages recognised in the French constitution.
- Occitan is spoken principally in France, but is only officially recognized in Spain as one of the three official languages of Catalonia (termed there Aranese), and in Italy as a minority language. Its use was severely reduced due to the once de jure and currently de facto promotion of French.
- Picard is spoken in two regions in the far north of France – Nord-Pas-de-Calais and Picardy – and in parts of the Belgian region of Wallonia. Belgium's French Community gave full official recognition to Picard as a regional language.
- Piedmontese is a language spoken by over 1 million people in Piedmont, northwest Italy. It is geographically and linguistically included in the Northern Italian group (with Lombard, Emiliano-Romagnolo, Ligurian, and Venetian). It is part of the wider western group of Romance languages, including French, Occitan, and Catalan. It has a certain official status recognized by the Piedmont regional government, but not by the national government.
- Portuguese is official in Portugal. It is also official in several former Portuguese colonies in Africa, Eastern Asia as well as in America (see Geographic distribution of Portuguese and Community of Portuguese Language Countries).
- Romanian is official in Romania, Moldova (as Moldovan), and Vojvodina (Serbia).
- Romansh is an official language of Switzerland.
- Sardinian is a language spoken on the Italian island of Sardinia. Traditionally subdivided into two main dialectal varieties, it is considered to be one of the most conservative languages in terms of phonology, when compared to other Romance languages. Sardinian enjoys the same dignity and standing of Italian by the regional law, in spite of the fact that, in practice, it still suffers from a lack of promotion at institutional level and is put under heavy pressure by Italian.

- Sicilian is a language spoken on the island of Sicily and its satellite islands. It is also spoken in southern and central Calabria (where it is called Southern Calabro), in the southern parts of Apulia, the Salento (where it is known as Salentino), and Campania, on the Italian peninsula, where it is called Cilentano.
- Spanish (also termed "Castilian") is official in Spain. It is also official in most Latin American countries with the exception of Brazil, French Guyana and Haiti.
- Vlach is an Eastern Romance dialect spoken in Serbia (around 50,000 speakers). Aromanian variant is spoken in Albania, Greece and Macedonia, whereas Vlachs of Istria and Dalmatia have a more distinct dialect.
- Neapolitan is a language spoken in most of the southern Italy.

Slavic languages are spoken in large areas of Central Europe, Southern Europe and Eastern Europe including Russia. East Slavic languages include Russian, Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Rusyn. West Slavic languages include Czech, Polish, Slovak, Lower Sorbian, Upper Sorbian and Kashubian. South Slavic languages are divided into Southeast Slavic and Southwest Slavic groups. Southwest Slavic languages include Bosnian, Croatian, Montenegrin, Serbian and Slovene. The first four of these are basically one language and are sometimes grouped into single Serbo-Croatian. Southeast Slavic languages include Bulgarian, Macedonian and Old Church Slavonic (a liturgical language).

The Basque language (or Euskara) is a language isolate and the ancestral language of the Basque people who inhabit the Basque Country, a region in the western Pyrenees mountains mostly in northeastern Spain and partly in southwestern France of about 3 million inhabitants, where it is spoken fluently by about 750,000 and understood by more than 1.5 million people. Basque is directly related to ancient Aquitanian, and it is likely that an early form of the Basque language was present in Western Europe before the arrival of the Indo-European languages in the area. The language may have been spoken since Paleolithic times. Basque is also spoken by immigrants in Australia, Costa Rica, Mexico, the Philippines and the United States, especially in the states of Nevada, Idaho, and California. The Kartvelian language family consists of Georgian and the related languages of Svan, Mingrelian, and Laz. Proto-Kartvelian is believed to be a common ancestor language of all Kartvelian languages, with the earliest split occurring in the second millennium BC or earlier when Svan was separated. Megrelian and Laz split from Georgian roughly a thousand years later, roughly at the beginning of the first millennium BC (e.g., Klimov, T. Gamkrelidze, G. Machavariani). The group is considered as isolated, and although for simplicity it is at times grouped with North Caucasian languages, no linguistic relationship exists between the two language families.

North Caucasian languages (sometimes called simply "Caucasic", as opposed to Kartvelian, and to avoid confusion with the concept of the "Caucasian race") is a blanket term for two language families spoken chiefly in the north Caucasus and Turkey—the Northwest Caucasian family (including Abkhaz, spoken in Abkhazia, and Circassian) and the Northeast Caucasian family, spoken mainly in the border area of the southern Russian Federation (including Dagestan, Chechnya, and Ingushetia). Many linguists, notably Sergei Starostin and Sergei Nikolayev, believe that the two groups sprang from a common ancestor about 5,000 years ago.^[4] However this view is difficult to evaluate, and remains controversial. Europe has a number of Uralic languages and language families, including Estonian, Finnish, and Hungarian. Turkic languages:

Oghuz languages in Europe include Turkish, which is spoken in Turkey, Northern Cyprus and Kosovo; Azerbaijani, which is spoken in Azerbaijan and Dagestan; and Gagauz, which is spoken in Gagauzia. Kypchak languages in Europe include Crimean Tatar, which is spoken in Crimea; Tatar, which is spoken in Tatarstan; Bashkir, which is spoken in Bashkortostan; and Kazakh, which is spoken in Kazakhstan. Other Kypchak languages include Karaim, Krymchak and Kumyk language. Oghur languages were historically indigenous to much of Eastern Europe, however most of them are extinct today, with the exception of Chuvash, which is spoken in Chuvashia. The Mongolic languages originated in Asia, and most did not proliferate west to Europe. Kalmyk is spoken in the Republic of Kalmykia, part of the Russian Federation, and is thus the only native Mongolic language spoken in Europe.

Semitic languages: Cypriot Maronite Arabic (also known as Cypriot Arabic) is a variety of Arabic spoken by Maronites in Cyprus. Most speakers live in Nicosia, but others are in the communities of Kormakiti and Lemesos. Brought to the island by Maronites fleeing Lebanon over 700 years ago, this variety of Arabic has been influenced by Greek in both phonology and vocabulary, while retaining certain unusually archaic features in other respects. Hebrew has been written and spoken by the Jewish communities of all of Europe in liturgical, educational, and often conversational contexts since the entry of the Jews into Europe some time during the late antiquity. Its restoration as an official language of Israel has accelerated its secular use. It also has been used in educational and liturgical contexts by some segments of the Christian population. Hebrew has its own consonantal alphabet, in which the vowels may be marked by diacritical marks termed pointing in English and Niqqud in Hebrew. The Hebrew alphabet is also used to write Yiddish, a West Germanic language, and Ladino, a Romance language, formerly spoken by Jews in northern and southern Europe respectively, but now nearly extinct in Europe itself. Maltese is a Semitic language with Romance and Germanic influences, spoken in Malta. It is based on Sicilian Arabic, with influences from Italian (particularly Sicilian), French, and, more recently, English. It is unique in that it is the only Semitic language whose standard form is written in the Latin alphabet. It is also the smallest official language of the EU in terms of speakers, and the only official Semitic language within the EU.

Lingua Franca—past and present: Europe has had a number of languages that were considered linguae francae over some ranges for some periods according to some historians. Typically in the rise of a national language the new language becomes a lingua franca to peoples in the range of the future nation until the consolidation and unification phases. If the nation becomes internationally influential, its language may become a lingua franca among nations that speak their own national languages. Europe has had no lingua franca ranging over its entire territory spoken by all or most of its populations during any historical period. Some linguae francae of past and present over some of its regions for some of its populations are:

- Classical Greek and then Koine Greek in the Mediterranean Basin from the Athenian empire to the eastern Roman Empire, being replaced by Modern Greek.
- Koine Greek and Modern Greek, in the Eastern Roman or Byzantine Empire and other parts of the Balkans south of the Jireček Line.^[9]
- Vulgar Latin and Late Latin among the uneducated and educated populations respectively of the Roman empire and the states that followed it in the same range no later than 900 AD; medieval Latin and Renaissance Latin among the educated populations of western, northern, central and part of eastern Europe until the rise of the national languages in that range, beginning with the first language academy in Italy in 1582/83; new Latin written only in scholarly and scientific contexts by a small minority of the educated population at scattered locations over all of Europe; ecclesiastical Latin, in spoken and written contexts of liturgy and church administration only, over the range of the Roman Catholic Church.

- Lingua Franca or Sabir, the original of the name, an Italian-based pidgin language of mixed origins used by maritime commercial interests around the Mediterranean in the Middle Ages and early Modern Age.
- Old French in continental western European countries and in the Crusader states.
- Czech, mainly during the reign of Holy Roman Emperor Charles IV (14th century) but also during other periods of Bohemian control over the Holy Roman Empire.
- Middle Low German (14th–16th century, during the heyday of the Hanseatic League).
- Spanish as Castilian in Spain and New Spain from the times of the Catholic Monarchs and Columbus, c. 1492; that is, after the Reconquista, until established as a national language in the times of Louis XIV, c. 1648; subsequently multinational in all nations in or formerly in the Spanish Empire.
- Polish, due to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (16th-18th centuries).
- Italian due to the Renaissance, the opera, the Italian empire, the fashion industry and the influence of the Roman catholic church.
- French from the golden age under Cardinal Richelieu and Louis XIV c. 1648; i.e., after the Thirty Years' War, in France and the French colonial empire, until established as the national language during the French Revolution of 1789 and subsequently multinational in all nations in or formerly in the various French Empires.
- German in Northern, Central, and Eastern Europe.
- English in Great Britain until its consolidation as a national language in the Renaissance and the rise of Modern English; subsequently internationally under the various states in or formerly in the British Empire; globally since the victories of the predominantly English speaking countries (United States, United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and others) and their allies in the two world wars ending in 1918 (World War I) and 1945 (World War II) and the subsequent rise of the United States as a superpower and major cultural influence.
- Russian in Eastern Europe, Northern and Central Asia from the World War II to the break-up of the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact.

The following is a table displaying the number of speakers of a given European language in Europe only. There is a relatively high level of language endangerment in Europe; only 42 languages have more than 1 million speakers.

Europe is traditionally reckoned as one of seven continents. Physiographically, it is the northwestern peninsula of the larger landmass known as Eurasia (or the larger Afro-Eurasia); Asia occupies the eastern bulk of this continuous landmass and all share a common continental shelf. Europe's eastern frontier is delineated by the Ural Mountains in Russia. The southeast boundary with Asia is not universally defined, but the modern definition is generally the Ural River or, less commonly, the Emba River. The boundary continues to the Caspian Sea, the crest of the Caucasus Mountains (or, less commonly, the Kura River in the Caucasus), and on to the Black Sea. The Bosporus, the Sea of Marmara, and the Dardanelles conclude the Asian boundary. The Mediterranean Sea to the south separates Europe from Africa. The western boundary is the Atlantic Ocean. Iceland, though on the Mid-Atlantic Ridge and nearer to Greenland (North America) than mainland Europe, is generally included in Europe for cultural reasons and because it is over twice as close to mainland Europe than to mainland North America. There is ongoing debate on where the geographical centre of Europe falls. Some geographical texts refer to a Eurasian continent given that Europe is not surrounded by sea and its southeastern border has always been variously defined for centuries. In terms of shape, Europe is a collection of connected peninsulas and nearby islands. The two largest peninsulas are mainland Europe and Scandinavia to the north, divided from each other by the Baltic Sea. Three smaller peninsulas—Iberia, Italy and the Balkans—emerge from the southern margin of the mainland. The Balkan peninsula is separated from Asia by the Black and Aegean Seas. Italy is separated from the Balkans by the Adriatic Sea, and from Iberia by the Mediterranean Sea, which also separates Europe from Africa. Eastward, mainland Europe widens much like the mouth of a funnel, until the boundary with Asia is reached at the Ural Mountains and Ural River, the Caspian Sea, Caucasus Mountains.

Land relief in Europe shows great variation within relatively small areas. The southern regions are mountainous, while moving north the terrain descends from the high Alps, Pyrenees and Carpathians, through hilly uplands, into broad, low northern plains, which are vast in the east. An arc of uplands also exists along the northwestern seaboard, beginning in the western British Isles and continuing along the mountainous, fjord-cut spine of Norway. This description is simplified. Sub-regions such as Iberia and Italy contain their own complex features, as does mainland Europe itself, where the relief contains many plateaus, river valleys and basins that complicate the general trend. Iceland and the British Isles are special cases. The former is of North Atlantic volcanic formation, while the latter consists of upland areas once joined to the mainland until cut off by rising sea levels. Europe is sometimes called a "peninsula of peninsulas", to draw attention to the fact that Europe is a relatively small, elongated appendage to Asia, and that a large part of Europe is made up of peninsulas. Partial list of peninsulas of Europe: Absheron peninsula. Balkan peninsula: Istria, East Thrace/Gallipoli. Greece/Peloponnese/Messenian, Mani, Cape Malea, Argolid/Prevlaka. Cotentin Peninsula (Cherbourg peninsula). Crimea. Fennoscandia/Finland, Kola, Scandinavian Peninsula/Göteborg. Great Britain was a peninsula during the Ice Ages. Iberian Peninsula/Gibraltar. Italian Peninsula/Calabria, Gargano, Salento. Jutland Peninsula. Kanin Peninsula.

Europe's most significant geological feature is the dichotomy between the highlands and mountains of Southern Europe and a vast, partially underwater, northern plain ranging from the United Kingdom in the west to the Ural Mountains in the east. These two halves are separated by the mountain chains of the Pyrenees and the Alps/Carpathians. The northern plains are delimited in the west by the Scandinavian mountains and the mountainous parts of the British Isles. The major shallow water bodies submerging parts of the northern plains are the Celtic Sea, the North Sea, the Baltic Sea complex, and the Barents Sea. The northern plain contains the old geological continent of Baltica, and so may be regarded as the "main continent", while peripheral highlands and mountainous regions in south and west constitute fragments from various other geological continents. The geology of Europe is hugely varied and complex, and gives rise to the wide variety of landscapes found across the continent, from the Scottish Highlands to the rolling plains of Hungary.

Temperature and Precipitation: The high mountainous areas of Europe are colder and have higher precipitation than lower areas, as is true of mountainous areas in general. Europe has less precipitation in the east than in central and western Europe. The temperature difference between summer and winter gradually increases from coastal northwest Europe to southeast inland Europe, ranging from Ireland, with a temperature difference of only 10 °C from the warmest to the coldest month, to the area north of the Caspian Sea, with a temperature difference of 40 °C. January average range from 13 °C in southern Greece to -20 °C in the northeastern part of European Russia. Western Europe and parts of Central Europe generally fall into the temperate maritime climate (Cfb), the southern part is mostly a Mediterranean climate (mostly Csa, smaller area with Csb), the north-central part and east into central Russia is mostly a humid continental climate (Dfb) and the northern part of the continent is a subarctic climate (Dfc). In the extreme northern part (northernmost Russia; Svalbard), bordering the Arctic Ocean, is tundra climate (Et). Mountain ranges, such as the Alps and the Carpathian mountains, have a highland climate with large variations according to altitude and latitude.

Liechtenstein is doubly landlocked. Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Austria, Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary, Serbia, and Macedonia constitute a contiguous landlocked agglomeration of eight countries in Central Europe and the Balkans, stretching from Geneva all the way to Greece. All other landlocked countries (Luxembourg, Andorra, Vatican, San Marino, Belarus, Moldova, Azerbaijan, and Kazakhstan) are "standalone" landlocked countries, not bordering any other such European one (the emphasis is necessary, since Kazakhstan borders Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan, thus forming a vast landlocked expanse in Central Asia).

European Culture: The culture of Europe is rooted in the art, architecture, music, literature, and philosophy that originated from the European cultural region. European culture is largely rooted in what is often referred to as its "common cultural heritage". Due to the great number of perspectives which can be taken on the subject, it is impossible to form a single, all-embracing conception of European culture. Nonetheless, there are core elements which are generally agreed upon as forming the cultural foundation of modern Europe. One list of these elements given by K. Bochmann includes:

- A common cultural and spiritual heritage derived from Greco-Roman antiquity, Christianity, the Renaissance and its Humanism, the political thinking of the Enlightenment, and the French Revolution, and the developments of Modernity, including all types of socialism;
- A rich and dynamic material culture that has been extended to the other continents as the result of industrialization and colonialism during the "Great Divergence";
- A specific conception of the individual expressed by the existence of, and respect for, a legality that guarantees human rights and the liberty of the individual;
- A plurality of states with different political orders, which are condemned to live together in one way or another;
- Respect for peoples, states and nations outside Europe.

Berting says that these points fit with "Europe's most positive realisations". The concept of European culture is generally linked to the classical definition of the Western world. In this definition, Western culture is the set of literary, scientific, political, artistic and philosophical principles which set it apart from other civilizations. Much of this set of traditions and knowledge is collected in the Western canon.^[8] The term has come to apply to countries whose history has been strongly marked by European immigration or settlement during the 18th and 19th centuries, such as the Americas, and Australasia, and is not restricted to Europe.

Western painting: The oldest known cave paintings are at the El Castillo cave (Spain), older than 40,800 years. The history of Western painting represents a continuous, though disrupted, tradition from antiquity. Until the mid 19th century it was primarily concerned with representational and Classical modes of production, after which time more modern, abstract and conceptual forms gained favor. Developments in Western painting historically parallel those in Eastern painting, in general a few centuries later. The Renaissance (French for 'rebirth'), a cultural movement roughly spanning the 14th through the mid-17th century, heralded the study of classical sources, as well as advances in science which profoundly influenced European intellectual and artistic life. In Italy artists like Paolo Uccello, Fra Angelico, Masaccio, Piero della Francesca, Andrea Mantegna, Filippo Lippi, Giorgione, Tintoretto, Sandro Botticelli, Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo Buonarroti, Raphael, Giovanni Bellini and Titian took painting to a higher level through the use of perspective, the study of human anatomy and proportion, and through their development of an unprecedented refinement in drawing and painting techniques.

Flemish, Dutch and German painters of the Renaissance such as Hans Holbein the Younger, Albrecht Dürer, Lucas Cranach, Matthias Grünewald, Hieronymous Bosch, and Pieter Bruegel represent a different approach from their Italian colleagues, one that is more realistic and less idealized. Genre painting became a popular idiom amongst the Northern painters like Pieter Bruegel. The adoption of oil painting whose invention was traditionally, but erroneously, credited to Jan van Eyck, (an important transitional figure who bridges painting in the Middle Ages with painting of the early Renaissance), made possible a new verisimilitude in depicting reality. Unlike the Italians, whose work drew heavily from the art of Ancient Greece and Rome, the northerners retained a stylistic residue of the sculpture and illuminated manuscripts of the Middle Ages. Renaissance painting reflects the revolution of ideas and science (astronomy, geography) that occurred in this period, the Reformation, and the invention of the printing press. Dürer, considered one of the greatest of printmakers, states that painters are not mere artisans but thinkers as well. With the development of easel painting in the Renaissance, painting gained independence from architecture. Following centuries dominated by religious imagery, secular subject matter slowly returned to Western painting. Artists included visions of the world around them, or the products of their own imaginations in their paintings. Those who could afford the expense could become patrons and commission portraits of themselves or their family. In the 16th century, movable pictures which could be hung easily on walls, rather than paintings affixed to permanent structures, came into popular demand.

The High Renaissance gave rise to a stylized art known as Mannerism. In place of the balanced compositions and rational approach to perspective that characterized art at the dawn of the 16th century, the Mannerists sought instability, artifice, and doubt. The unperturbed faces and gestures of Piero della Francesca and the calm Virgins of Raphael are replaced by the troubled expressions of Pontormo and the emotional intensity of El Greco. Baroque painting is associated with the Baroque cultural movement, a movement often identified with Absolutism and the Counter Reformation or Catholic Revival; the existence of important Baroque painting in non-absolutist and Protestant states also, however, underscores its popularity, as the style spread throughout Western Europe. Baroque painting is characterized by great drama, rich, deep color, and intense light and dark shadows. Baroque art was meant to evoke emotion and passion instead of the calm rationality that had been prized during the Renaissance. During the period beginning around 1600 and continuing throughout the 17th century, painting is characterized as Baroque. Among the greatest painters of the Baroque are Caravaggio, Rembrandt, Frans Hals, Rubens, Velázquez, Poussin, and Johannes Vermeer. Caravaggio is an heir of the humanist painting of the High Renaissance. His realistic approach to the human figure, painted directly from life and dramatically spotlighted against a dark background, shocked his contemporaries and opened a new chapter in the history of painting. Baroque painting often dramatizes scenes using light effects; this can be seen in works by Rembrandt, Vermeer, Le Nain and La Tour. During the 18th century, Rococo followed as a lighter extension of Baroque, often frivolous and erotic. Rococo developed first in the decorative arts and interior design in France. Louis XV's succession brought a change in the court artists and general artistic fashion. The 1730s represented the height of Rococo development in France exemplified by the works of Antoine Watteau and François Boucher. Rococo still maintained the Baroque taste for complex forms and intricate patterns, but by this point, it had begun to integrate a variety of diverse characteristics, including a taste for Oriental designs and asymmetric compositions.

The Rococo style spread with French artists and engraved publications. It was readily received in the Catholic parts of Germany, Bohemia, and Austria, where it was merged with the lively German Baroque traditions. German Rococo was applied with enthusiasm to churches and palaces, particularly in the south, while Frederician Rococo developed in the Kingdom of Prussia. The French masters Watteau, Boucher and Fragonard represent the style, as do Giovanni Battista Tiepolo and Jean-Baptiste-Siméon Chardin who was considered by some as the best French painter of the 18th century – the Anti-Rococo. Portraiture was an important component of painting in all countries, but especially in England, where the leaders were William Hogarth, in a blunt realist style, and Francis Hayman, Angelica Kauffman (who was Swiss), Thomas Gainsborough and Joshua Reynolds in more flattering styles influenced by Anthony van Dyck. While in France during the Rococo era Jean-Baptiste Greuze (the favorite painter of Denis Diderot), Maurice Quentin de La Tour, and Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun were highly accomplished Portrait painters and History painters.

William Hogarth helped develop a theoretical foundation for Rococo beauty. Though not intentionally referencing the movement, he argued in his Analysis of Beauty (1753) that the undulating lines and S-curves prominent in Rococo were the basis for grace and beauty in art or nature (unlike the straight line or the circle in Classicism). The beginning of the end for Rococo came in the early 1760s as figures like Voltaire and Jacques-François Blondel began to voice their criticism of the superficiality and degeneracy of the art. Blondel decried the "ridiculous jumble of shells, dragons, reeds, palm-trees and plants" in contemporary interiors. By 1785, Rococo had passed out of fashion in France, replaced by the order and seriousness of Neoclassical artists like Jacques-Louis David. After Rococo there arose in the late 18th century, in architecture, and then in painting severe neo-classicism, best represented by such artists as David and his heir Ingres. Ingres' work already contains much of the sensuality, but none of the spontaneity, that was to characterize Romanticism. This movement turned its attention toward landscape and nature as well as the human figure and the supremacy of natural order above mankind's will. There is a pantheist philosophy (see Spinoza and Hegel) within this conception that opposes Enlightenment ideals by seeing mankind's destiny in a more tragic or pessimistic light. The idea that human beings are not above the forces of Nature is in contradiction to Ancient Greek and Renaissance ideals where mankind was above all things and owned his fate. This thinking led romantic artists to depict the sublime, ruined churches, shipwrecks, massacres and madness.

By the mid-19th century painters became liberated from the demands of their patronage to only depict scenes from religion, mythology, portraiture or history. The idea "art for art's sake" began to find expression in the work of painters like Francisco de Goya, John Constable, and J.M.W. Turner. Romantic painters turned landscape painting into a major genre, considered until then as a minor genre or as a decorative background for figure compositions. Some of the major painters of this period are Eugène Delacroix, Théodore Géricault, J. M. W. Turner, Caspar David Friedrich and John Constable. Francisco Goya's late work demonstrates the Romantic interest in the irrational, while the work of Arnold Böcklin evokes mystery and the paintings of Aesthetic movement artist James Abbott McNeill Whistler evoke both sophistication and decadence. In the United States the Romantic tradition of landscape painting was known as the Hudson River School: exponents include Thomas Cole, Frederic Edwin Church, Albert Bierstadt, Thomas Moran, and John Frederick Kensett. Luminism was a movement in American landscape painting related to the Hudson River School.

The leading Barbizon School painter Camille Corot painted in both a romantic and a realistic vein; his work prefigures Impressionism, as does the paintings of Eugène Boudin who was one of the first French landscape painters to paint outdoors. Boudin was also an important influence on the young Claude Monet, whom in 1857 he introduced to Plein air painting. A major force in the turn towards Realism at mid-century was Gustave Courbet. In the latter third of the century Impressionists like Édouard Manet, Claude Monet, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Camille Pissarro, Alfred Sisley, Berthe Morisot, Mary Cassatt, and Edgar Degas worked in a more direct approach than had previously been exhibited publicly. They eschewed allegory and narrative in favor of individualized responses to the modern world, sometimes painted with little or no preparatory study, relying on deftness of drawing and a highly chromatic palette. Manet, Degas, Renoir, Morisot, and Cassatt concentrated primarily on the human subject. Both Manet and Degas reinterpreted classical figurative canons within contemporary situations; in Manet's case the re-imaginings met with hostile public reception. Renoir, Morisot, and Cassatt turned to domestic life for inspiration, with Renoir focusing on the female nude. Monet, Pissarro, and Sisley used the landscape as their primary motif, the transience of light and weather playing a major role in their work. While Sisley most closely adhered to the original principals of the Impressionist perception of the landscape, Monet sought challenges in increasingly chromatic and changeable conditions, culminating in his series of monumental works of Water Lilies painted in Giverny.

Pissarro adopted some of the experiments of Post-Impressionism. Slightly younger Post-Impressionists like Vincent van Gogh, Paul Gauguin, and Georges-Pierre Seurat, along with Paul Cézanne led art to the edge of modernism; for Gauguin Impressionism gave way to a personal symbolism; Seurat transformed Impressionism's broken color into a scientific optical study, structured on frieze-like compositions; Van Gogh's turbulent method of paint application, coupled with a sonorous use of color, predicted Expressionism and Fauvism, and Cézanne, desiring to unite classical composition with a revolutionary abstraction of natural forms, would come to be seen as a precursor of 20th-century art. The spell of Impressionism was felt throughout the world, including in the United States, where it became integral to the painting of American Impressionists such as Childe Hassam, John Henry Twachtman, and Theodore Robinson. It also exerted influence on painters who were not primarily Impressionistic in theory, like the portrait and landscape painter John Singer Sargent. At the same time in America at the turn of the 20th century there existed a native and nearly insular realism, as richly embodied in the figurative work of Thomas Eakins, the Ashcan School, and the landscapes and seascapes of Winslow Homer, all of whose paintings were deeply invested in the solidity of natural forms. The visionary landscape, a motive largely dependent on the ambiguity of the nocturne, found its advocates in Albert Pinkham Ryder and Ralph Albert Blakelock.

In the late 19th century there also were several, rather dissimilar, groups of Symbolist painters whose works resonated with younger artists of the 20th century, especially with the Fauvists and the Surrealists. Among them were Gustave Moreau, Odilon Redon, Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, Henri Fantin-Latour, Arnold Böcklin, Edvard Munch, Félicien Rops, and Jan Toorop, and Gustav Klimt amongst others including the Russian Symbolists like Mikhail Vrubel.

Symbolist painters mined mythology and dream imagery for a visual language of the soul, seeking evocative paintings that brought to mind a static world of silence. The symbols used in Symbolism are not the familiar emblems of mainstream iconography but intensely personal, private, obscure and ambiguous references. More a philosophy than an actual style of art, the Symbolist painters influenced the contemporary Art Nouveau movement and Les Nabis. In their exploration of dreamlike subjects, symbolist painters are found across centuries and cultures, as they are still today; Bernard Delvaille has described René Magritte's surrealism as "Symbolism plus Freud". The heritage of painters like Van Gogh, Cézanne, Gauguin, and Seurat was essential for the development of modern art. At the beginning of the 20th century Henri Matisse and several other young artists including the pre-cubist Georges Braque, André Derain, Raoul Dufy and Maurice de Vlaminck revolutionized the Paris art world with "wild", multi-colored, expressive, landscapes and figure paintings that the critics called Fauvism (as seen in the gallery above). Henri Matisse's second version of The Dance signifies a key point in his career and in the development of modern painting.^[27] It reflects Matisse's incipient fascination with primitive art: the intense warm colors against the cool blue-green background and the rhythmical succession of dancing nudes convey the feelings of emotional liberation and hedonism. Pablo Picasso made his first cubist paintings based on Cézanne's idea that all depiction of nature can be reduced to three solids: cube, sphere and cone. With the painting Les Femmes d'Alger (O.J. no. 1) 1907, (see gallery) Picasso dramatically created a new and radical picture depicting a raw and primitive brothel scene with five prostitutes, violently painted women, reminiscent of African tribal masks and his own new Cubist inventions. Cubism (see gallery) was jointly developed by Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque, exemplified by Violin and Candlestick, Paris, (seen above) from about 1908 through 1912. The first clear manifestation of Cubism was practised by Braque, Picasso, Jean Metzinger, Albert Gleizes, Fernand Léger, Henri Le Fauconnier, and Robert Delaunay. Juan Gris, Marcel Duchamp, Alexander Archipenko, Joseph Csaky and others soon joined. Synthetic cubism, practiced by Braque and Picasso, is characterized by the introduction of different textures, surfaces, collage elements, papier collé and a large variety of merged subject matter.

The Salon d'Automne of 1905 brought notoriety and attention to the works of Henri Matisse and Fauvism. The group gained their name, after critic Louis Vauxcelles described their work with the phrase "Donatello chezes fauves" ("Donatello among the wild beasts"), contrasting the paintings with a Renaissance-type sculpture that shared the room with them. Henri Rousseau (1844–1910), an artist that Picasso knew and admired and who was not a Fauve, had his large jungle scene "The Hungry Lion Throws Itself on the Antelope" also hanging near the works by Matisse and which may have had an influence on the particular sarcastic term used in the press.^[31] Vauxcelles' comment was printed on 17 October 1905 in the daily newspaper Gil Blas, and passed into popular usage. Although the pictures were widely derided—"A pot of paint has been flung in the face of the public", declared the critic Camille Mauclair (1872–1945)—they also attracted some favorable attention. The painting that was singled out for the most attacks was Matisse's Woman with a Hat; the purchase of this work by Gertrude and Leo Stein had a very positive effect on Matisse, who was suffering demoralization from the bad reception of his work.^[30]

During the years between 1910 and the end of World War I and after the heyday of cubism, several movements emerged in Paris. Giorgio de Chirico moved to Paris in July 1911, where he joined his brother Andrea (the poet and painter known as Alberto Savinio). Through his brother he met Pierre Laprade a member of the jury at the Salon d'Automne, where he exhibited three of his dreamlike works: Enigma of the Oracle, Enigma of an Afternoon and Self-Portrait. During 1913 he exhibited his work at the Salon des Indépendants and Salon d'Automne, his work was noticed by Pablo Picasso and Guillaume Apollinaire and several others. His compelling and mysterious paintings are considered instrumental to the early beginnings of Surrealism. Song of Love 1914, is one of the most famous works by de Chirico and is an early example of the surrealist style, though it was painted ten years before the movement was "founded" by André Breton in 1924 (see gallery).

In the first two decades of the 20th century and after cubism, several other important movements emerged; Futurism (Balla), Abstract art (Kandinsky) Der Blaue Reiter (Wassily Kandinsky and Franz Marc), Bauhaus (Kandinsky and Klee), Orphism, (Delaunay and Kupka), Synchromism (Russell), De Stijl (van Doesburg and Mondrian), Suprematism (Malevich), Constructivism (Tatlin), Dadaism (Duchamp, Picabia and Arp), and Surrealism (de Chirico, André Breton, Miró, Magritte, Dalí and Ernst). Modern painting influenced all the visual arts, from Modernist architecture and design, to avant-garde film, theatre and modern dance and became an experimental laboratory for the expression of visual experience, from photography and concrete poetry to advertising art and fashion. Van Gogh's painting exerted great influence upon 20th-century Expressionism, as can be seen in the work of the Fauves, Die Brücke (a group led by German painter Ernst Kirchner), and the Expressionism of Edvard Munch, Egon Schiele, Marc Chagall, Amedeo Modigliani, Chaim Soutine and others. Wassily Kandinsky, a Russian painter, printmaker and art theorist, one of the most famous 20th-century artists is generally considered the first important painter of modern abstract art. As an early modernist, in search of new modes of visual expression, and spiritual expression, he theorized as did contemporary occultists and theosophists, that pure visual abstraction had corollary vibrations with sound and music. They posited that pure abstraction could express pure spirituality. His earliest abstractions were generally titled as the example in the (above gallery) Composition VII, making connection to the work of the composers of music. Kandinsky included many of his theories about abstract art in his book Concerning the Spiritual in Art. Piet Mondrian's art was also related to his spiritual and philosophical studies. In 1908 he became interested in the theosophical movement launched by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in the late 19th century. Blavatsky believed that it was possible to attain a knowledge of nature more profound than that provided by empirical means, and much of Mondrian's work for the rest of his life was inspired by his search for that spiritual knowledge. Other major pioneers of early abstraction include Swedish painter Hilma af Klint, Russian painter Kazimir Malevich, and Swiss painter Paul Klee. Robert Delaunay was a French artist who is associated with Orphism, (reminiscent of a link between pure abstraction and cubism). His later works were more abstract, reminiscent of Paul Klee. His key contributions to abstract painting refer to his bold use of color, and a clear love of experimentation of both depth and tone. At the invitation of Wassily Kandinsky, Delaunay and his wife the artist Sonia Delaunay, joined The Blue Rider (Der Blaue Reiter), a Munich-based group of abstract artists, in 1911, and his art took a turn to the abstract. Still other important pioneers of abstract painting include Czech painter, František Kupka and Synchromism, an art movement founded in 1912 by American artists Stanton MacDonald-Wright and Morgan Russell that closely resembles Orphism.

Les Fauves (French for The Wild Beasts) were early-20th-century painters, experimenting with freedom of expression through color. The name was given, humorously and not as a compliment, to the group by art critic Louis Vauxcelles. Fauvism was a short-lived and loose grouping of early 20th-century artists whose works emphasized painterly qualities, and the imaginative use of deep color over the representational values. Fauvists made the subject of the painting easy to read, exaggerated perspectives and an interesting prescient prediction of the Fauves was expressed in 1888 by Paul Gauguin to Paul Sérusier, "How do you see these trees? They are yellow. So, put in yellow; this shadow, rather blue, paint it with pure ultramarine; these red leaves? Put in vermilion." The leaders of the movement were Henri Matisse and André Derain – friendly rivals of a sort, each with his own followers. Ultimately Matisse became the yang to Picasso's yin in the 20th century. Fauvist painters included Albert Marquet, Charles Camoin, Maurice de Vlaminck, Raoul Dufy, Othon Friesz, the Dutch painter Kees van Dongen, and Picasso's partner in Cubism, Georges Braque amongst others. Fauvism, as a movement, had no concrete theories, and was short lived, beginning in 1905 and ending in 1907, they only had three exhibitions. Matisse was seen as the leader of the movement, due to his seniority in age and prior self-establishment in the academic art world. His 1905 portrait of Mme. Matisse The Green Line, (above), caused a sensation in Paris when it was first exhibited. He said he wanted to create art to delight; art as a decoration was his purpose and it can be said that his use of bright colors tries to maintain serenity of composition. In 1906 at the suggestion of his dealer Ambroise Vollard, André Derain went to London and produced a series of paintings like Charing Cross Bridge, London (above) in the Fauvist style, paraphrasing the famous series by the Impressionist painter Claude Monet. By 1907 Fauvism no longer was a shocking new movement, soon it was replaced by Cubism on the critics radar screen as the latest new development in Contemporary Art of the time. In 1907 Appolinaire, commenting about Matisse in an article published in La Falange, said, "We are not here in the presence of an extravagant or an extremist undertaking: Matisse's art is eminently reasonable." Der Blaue Reiter was a German movement lasting from 1911 to 1914, fundamental to Expressionism, along with Die Brücke, a group of German expressionist artists formed in Dresden in 1905. Founding members of Die Brücke were Fritz Bleyl, Erich Heckel, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner and Karl Schmidt-Rottluff. Later members included Max Pechstein, Otto Mueller and others. This was a seminal group, which in due course had a major impact on the evolution of modern art in the 20th century and created the style of Expressionism.

Wassily Kandinsky, Franz Marc, August Macke, Alexej von Jawlensky, whose psychically expressive painting of the Russian dancer Portrait of Alexander Sakharoff, 1909, is in the gallery above, Marianne von Werefkin, Lyonel Feininger and others founded the Der Blaue Reiter group in response to the rejection of Kandinsky's painting Last Judgement from an exhibition. Der Blaue Reiter lacked a central artistic manifesto, but was centered around Kandinsky and Marc. Artists Gabriele Münter and Paul Klee were also involved. The name of the movement comes from a painting by Kandinsky created in 1903 (see illustration). It is also claimed that the name could have derived from Marc's enthusiasm for horses and Kandinsky's love of the colour blue. For Kandinsky, blue is the colour of spirituality: the darker the blue, the more it awakens human desire for the eternal. Expressionism and Symbolism are broad rubrics that involve several important and related movements in 20th-century painting that dominated much of the avant-garde art being made in Western, Eastern and Northern Europe. Expressionist works were painted largely between World War I and World War II, mostly in France, Germany, Norway, Russia, Belgium, and Austria. Expressionist artists are related to both Surrealism and Symbolism and are each uniquely and somewhat eccentrically personal. Fauvism, Die Brücke, and Der Blaue Reiter are three of the best known groups of Expressionist and Symbolist painters. Artists as interesting and diverse as Marc Chagall, whose painting I and the Village, (above) tells an autobiographical story that examines the relationship between the artist and his origins, with a lexicon of artistic Symbolism. Gustav Klimt, Egon Schiele, Edvard Munch, Emil Nolde, Chaim Soutine, James Ensor, Oskar Kokoschka, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Max Beckmann, Franz Marc, Käthe Schmidt Kollwitz, Georges Rouault, Amedeo Modigliani and some of the Americans abroad like Marsden Hartley, and Stuart Davis, were considered influential expressionist painters. Although Alberto Giacometti is primarily thought of as an intense Surrealist sculptor, he made intense expressionist paintings as well.

In 1924 André Breton published the Surrealist Manifesto. The Surrealist movement in painting became synonymous with the avant-garde and which featured artists whose works varied from the abstract to the super-realist. With works on paper like Machine Turn Quickly, (above) Francis Picabia continued his involvement in the Dada movement through 1919 in Zürich and Paris, before breaking away from it after developing an interest in Surrealist art. Yves Tanguy, René Magritte and Salvador Dalí are particularly known for their realistic depictions of dream imagery and fantastic manifestations of the imagination. Joan Miró's The Tilled Field of 1923–1924 verges on abstraction, this early painting of a complex of objects and figures, and arrangements of sexually active characters; was Miró's first Surrealist masterpiece.^[42] The more abstract Joan Miró, Jean Arp, André Masson, and Max Ernst were very influential, especially in the United States during the 1940s. Throughout the 1930s, Surrealism continued to become more visible to the public at large. A Surrealist group developed in Britain and, according to Breton, their 1936 London International Surrealist Exhibition was a high-water mark of the period and became the model for international exhibitions. Surrealist groups in Japan, and especially in Latin America, the Caribbean and in Mexico produced innovative and original works. Dalí and Magritte created some of the most widely recognized images of the movement. The 1928/1929 painting This Is Not A Pipe, by Magritte is the subject of a Michel Foucault 1973 book, This is not a Pipe (English edition, 1991), that discusses the painting and its paradox. Dalí joined the group in 1929, and participated in the rapid establishment of the visual style between 1930 and 1935.

Surrealism as a visual movement had found a method: to expose psychological truth by stripping ordinary objects of their normal significance, in order to create a compelling image that was beyond ordinary formal organization, and perception, sometimes evoking empathy from the viewer, sometimes laughter and sometimes outrage and bewilderment. 1931 marked a year when several Surrealist painters produced works which marked turning points in their stylistic evolution: in one example (see gallery above) liquid shapes become the trademark of Dalí, particularly in his The Persistence of Memory, which features the image of watches that sag as if they are melting. Evocations of time and its compelling mystery and absurdity. The characteristics of this style – a combination of the depictive, the abstract, and the psychological – came to stand for the alienation which many people felt in the modernist period, combined with the sense of reaching more deeply into the psyche, to be "made whole with one's individuality." Max Ernst, whose 1920 painting Murdering Airplane (above), studied philosophy and psychology in Bonn and was interested in the alternative realities experienced by the insane. His paintings may have been inspired by the psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud's study of the delusions of a paranoiac, Daniel Paul Schreber. Freud identified Schreber's fantasy of becoming a woman as a castration complex. The central image of two pairs of legs refers to Schreber's hermaphroditic desires. Ernst's inscription on the back of the painting reads: The picture is curious because of its symmetry. The two sexes balance one another. During the 1920s André Masson's work was enormously influential in helping the young artist Joan Miró find his roots in the new Surrealist painting. Miró acknowledged in letters to his dealer Pierre Matisse the importance of Masson as an example to him in his early years in Paris.

Long after personal, political and professional tensions have fragmented the Surrealist group into thin air and ether, Magritte, Miró, Dalí and the other Surrealists continue to define a visual program in the arts. Other prominent surrealist artists include Giorgio de Chirico, Méret Oppenheim, Toyen, Grégoire Michonze, Roberto Matta, Kay Sage, Leonora Carrington, Dorothea Tanning, and Leonor Fini among others. During the 1920s and the 1930s and the Great Depression, the European art scene was characterized by Surrealism, late Cubism, the Bauhaus, De Stijl, Dada, Neue Sachlichkeit, and Expressionism; and was occupied by masterful modernist color painters like Henri Matisse and Pierre Bonnard. In Germany Neue Sachlichkeit ("New Objectivity") emerged as Max Beckmann, Otto Dix, George Grosz and others politicized their paintings. The work of these artists grew out of expressionism, and was a response to the political tensions of the Weimar Republic, and was often sharply satirical. During the 1930s radical leftist politics characterized many of the artists connected to Surrealism, including Pablo Picasso.^[45] On 26 April 1937, during the Spanish Civil War, the Basque town of Gernika was the scene of the "Bombing of Gernika" by the Condor Legion of Nazi Germany's Luftwaffe. The Germans were attacking to support the efforts of Francisco Franco to overthrow the Basque Government and the Spanish Republican government. The town was devastated, though the Biscayan assembly and the Oak of Gernika survived. Pablo Picasso painted his mural sized Guernica to commemorate the horrors of the bombing.

In its final form, Guernica is an immense black and white, 3.5 metre (11 ft) tall and 7.8 metre (23 ft) wide mural painted in oil. The mural presents a scene of death, violence, brutality, suffering, and helplessness without portraying their immediate causes. The choice to paint in black and white contrasts with the intensity of the scene depicted and invokes the immediacy of a newspaper photograph. Picasso painted the mural sized painting called Guernica in protest of the bombing. The painting was first exhibited in Paris in 1937, then Scandinavia, then London in 1938 and finally in 1939 at Picasso's request the painting was sent to the United States in an extended loan (for safekeeping) at MoMA. The painting went on a tour of museums throughout the USA until its final return to the Museum of Modern Art in New York City where it was exhibited for nearly thirty years. Finally in accord with Pablo Picasso's wish to give the painting to the people of Spain as a gift, it was sent to Spain in 1981.

Sculpture

The earliest European sculpture to date portrays a female form, and has been estimated at dating from 35,000 years ago. See Classical sculpture, Ancient Greek sculpture, Gothic art, Renaissance, Mannerist, Baroque, Neoclassicism, Modernism, Postminimalism, found art, Postmodern art, Conceptual art. Modern classicism contrasted in many ways with the classical sculpture of the 19th century which was characterized by commitments to naturalism (Antoine-Louis Barye)—the melodramatic (François Rude) sentimentality (Jean-Baptiste Carpeaux)-- or a kind of stately grandiosity (Lord Leighton). Several different directions in the classical tradition were taken as the century turned, but the study of the live model and the post-Renaissance tradition was still fundamental to them. Auguste Rodin was the most renowned European sculptor of the early 20th century. He is often considered a sculptural Impressionist, as are his students including Camille Claudel, and Hugo Rheinhold, attempting to model of a fleeting moment of ordinary life. Modern classicism showed a lesser interest in naturalism and a greater interest in formal stylization. Greater attention was paid to the rhythms of volumes and spaces—as well as greater attention to the contrasting qualities of surface (open, closed, planar, broken etc.) while less attention was paid to story-telling and convincing details of anatomy or costume. Greater attention was given to psychological effect than to physical realism, and influences from earlier styles worldwide were used.

Early masters of modern classicism included: Aristide Maillol, Alexander Matveyev, Joseph Bernard, Antoine Bourdelle, Georg Kolbe, Libero Andreotti, Gustav Vigeland, Jan Stursa, Constantin Brâncuși. As the century progressed, modern classicism was adopted as the national style of the two great European totalitarian empires: Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, who co-opted the work of earlier artists such as Kolbe and Wilhelm Lehmbruck in Germany and Matveyev in Russia. Over the 70 years of the USSR, new generations of sculptors were trained and chosen within their system, and a distinct style, socialist realism, developed, that returned to the 19th century's emphasis on melodrama and naturalism. Classical training was rooted out of art education in Western Europe (and the Americas) by 1970 and the classical variants of the 20th century were marginalized in the history of modernism. But classicism continued as the foundation of art education in the Soviet academies until 1990, providing a foundation for expressive figurative art throughout eastern Europe and parts of the Middle East. By the year 2000, the European classical tradition retains a wide appeal to the public but awaits an educational tradition to revive its contemporary development. Some of the modern classical became either more decorative/art deco (Paulanship, Jose de Creeft, Carl Milles) or more abstractly stylized or more expressive (and Gothic) (Anton Hanak, Wilhelm Lehmbruck, Ernst Barlach, Arturo Martini)—or turned more to the Renaissance (Giacomo Manzù, Venanzo Crocetti) or stayed the same (Charles Despiau, Marcel Gimond).

Modernist sculpture movements include Cubism, Geometric abstraction, De Stijl, Suprematism, Constructivism, Dadaism, Surrealism, Futurism, Formalism, Abstract expressionism, Pop-Art, Minimalism, Land art, and Installation art among others. In the early days of the 20th century, Pablo Picasso revolutionized the art of sculpture when he began creating his constructions fashioned by combining disparate objects and materials into one constructed piece of sculpture; the sculptural equivalent of the collage in two-dimensional art. The advent of Surrealism led to things occasionally being described as "sculpture" that would not have been so previously, such as "involuntary sculpture" in several senses, including coulage. In later years Picasso became a prolific potter, leading, with interest in historic pottery from around the world, to a revival of ceramic art, with figures such as George E. Ohr and subsequently Peter Voulkos, Kenneth Price, and Robert Arneson. Marcel Duchamp originated the use of the "found object" (French: objet trouvé) or readymade with pieces such as Fountain (1917). Similarly, the work of Constantin Brâncuși at the beginning of the century paved the way for later abstract sculpture. In revolt against the naturalism of Rodin and his late-19th-century contemporaries, Brâncuși distilled subjects down to their essences as illustrated by the elegantly refined forms of his Bird in Space series (1924). Brâncuși's impact, with his vocabulary of reduction and abstraction, is seen throughout the 1930s and 1940s, and exemplified by artists such as Gaston Lachaise, Sir Jacob Epstein, Henry Moore, Alberto Giacometti, Joan Miró, Julio González, Pablo Serrano, Jacques Lipchitz^[119] and by the 1940s abstract sculpture was impacted and expanded by Alexander Calder, Len Lye, Jean Tinguely, and Frederick Kiesler who were pioneers of Kinetic art.

Modernist sculptors largely missed out on the huge boom in public art resulting from the demand for war memorials for the two World Wars, but from the 1950s the public and commissioning bodies became more comfortable with Modernist sculpture and large public commissions both abstract and figurative became common. Picasso was commissioned to make a maquette for a huge 50-foot (15 m)-high public sculpture, the so-called Chicago Picasso (1967). His design was ambiguous and somewhat controversial, and what the figure represents is not clear; it could be a bird, a horse, a woman or a totally abstract shape. During the late 1950s and the 1960s abstract sculptors began experimenting with a wide array of new materials and different approaches to creating their work. Surrealist imagery, anthropomorphic abstraction, new materials and combinations of new energy sources and varied surfaces and objects became characteristic of much new modernist sculpture. Collaborative projects with landscape designers, architects, and landscape architects expanded the outdoor site and contextual integration. Artists such as Isamu Noguchi, David Smith, Alexander Calder, Jean Tinguely, Richard Lippold, George Rickey, Louise Bourgeois, and Louise Nevelson came to characterize the look of modern sculpture.

By the 1960s Abstract expressionism, Geometric abstraction and Minimalism, which reduces sculpture to its most essential and fundamental features, predominated. Some works of the period are: the Cubi works of David Smith, and the welded steel works of Sir Anthony Caro, as well as welded sculpture by a large variety of sculptors, the large-scale work of John Chamberlain, and environmental installation scale works by Mark di Suvero. Other Minimalists include Tony Smith, Donald Judd, Robert Morris, Anne Truitt, Giacomo Benevelli, Arnaldo Pomodoro, Richard Serra, Dan Flavin, Carl Andre, and John Safer who added motion and monumentality to the theme of purity of line. During the 60s/70s figurative sculpture by modernist artists in stylized forms was made by artists such as Leonard Baskin, Ernest Trova, George Segal, Marisol Escobar, Paul Thek, Robert Graham in a classic articulated style, and Fernando Botero bringing his painting's 'oversized figures' into monumental sculptures.

Music - Classical Music : Important classical composers from Europe include Hildegard von Bingen, J.S. Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Wagner, Richard Strauss, von Weber, Offenbach, Stockhausen, Mendelssohn (Germany), Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakov, Borodin, Tchaikovsky, Mussorgsky, Rachmaninov, Scriabin, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Shostakovich, (Russia), Schubert, Haydn, Mozart, Bruckner, Mahler, Schoenberg (Austria), Berlioz, Machaut, Pérotin, François Couperin, Lully, Rameau, Saint-Saëns, Bizet, Debussy, Ravel (France), Palestrina, Monteverdi, Vivaldi, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, Donizetti, Cavalli, Paganini, Bellini, Verdi, Puccini, Rossini (Italy), Tomás Luis de Victoria, Fallá, Granados, Albéniz, Rodrigo (Spain), Smetana, Dvořák, Janáček, Martinů (Czech Republic), Dufay, des Prez, Lassus (Belgium), Grieg (Norway), Liszt, Bartók (Hungary), Purcell, Elgar, Britten, Holst (UK), Nielsen (Denmark), Sibelius (Finland), Chopin, Penderecki (Poland), George Enescu, Sergiu Celibidache (Romania). Luciano Pavarotti was a contemporary popular opera singer. Orchestras such as the Berliner Philharmoniker, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra and the London Symphony Orchestra are considered to be amongst the finest ensembles in the world. The Salzburg Festival, the Bayreuth Festival, the Edinburgh International Festival and the BBC Proms are major European classical music festivals, and International Chopin Piano Competition is the world's oldest monographic music competition.

Folk Music : Europe has a wide and diverse range of indigenous music, sharing common features in rural, travelling or maritime communities. Folk music is embedded in an unwritten, aural tradition, but was increasingly transcribed from the nineteenth century onwards. Many classical composers used folk melodies, and folk has influenced some popular music in Europe.

Popular Music: Europe has also imported many different genres of music, mainly from the United States, ranging from Blues, Jazz, Soul, Pop, Rap, Hip-Hop, R'n'B and Dance. The UK has been most successful in re-exporting this type of music and also creating many of its own genres via notable movements including the British Invasion, the New Wave of British Heavy Metal (that has been compared to Beatlemania.^[15]) and Britpop. Some major UK acts include Tears for Fears, The Beatles, The Rolling Stones, Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, Queen, Elton John, David Bowie, Deep Purple, Sex Pistols, Eric Clapton, The Clash, Van Morrison, Dire Straits, The Police, Fleetwood Mac, Genesis, George Michael, Pet Shop Boys, Phil Collins, Rod Stewart, The Who, Eurythmics, Dusty Springfield, The Cure, Black Sabbath, Iron Maiden, Judas Priest, Def Leppard, Duran Duran, Oasis, Radiohead, Coldplay, Mumford & Sons, The Smiths, Muse, Gorillaz, Bonnie Tyler, Seal, Elvis Costello, Bee Gees, Spice Girls, Depeche Mode, The Kinks, The Animals, Motörhead, UB40, One Direction, Cheryl Cole, Adele, Amy Winehouse; Also very important European musicians are U2, Thin Lizzy, The Pogues, The Script, Sinéad O'Connor (Ireland), Kraftwerk, Can, Scorpions, Nina Hagen, Trio, Rammstein, Modern Talking, James Last, Paul Kalkbrenner (Germany), ABBA, The Cardigans, The Hives, Roxette, Swedish Architecture - Neolithic architecture : Born in the Levant, Neolithic architecture spread to Europe. The Mediterranean neolithic cultures of Malta worshiped in megalithic temples. In Europe, long houses built from wattle and daub were constructed. Elaborate tombs for the dead were also built. These tombs are particularly numerous in Ireland, where there are many thousand still in existence. Neolithic people built long barrows and chamber tombs for their dead and causewayed camps, henges flint mines and cursus monuments., Architecture of ancient Greece, Roman architecture, Medieval architecture, Renaissance architecture, Baroque architecture, Beaux-Arts architecture, Expressionist architecture, Stalinist architecture, Deconstructivism.

Architecture of Ancient Greece - The architecture and urbanism of the Greeks and Romans was very different from that of the Egyptians and Persians. Civic life gained importance for all members of the community. In the time of the ancients religious matters were only handled by the ruling class; by the time of the Greeks, religious mystery had skipped the confines of the temple-palace compounds and was the subject of the people or polis. Greek civic life was sustained by new, open spaces called the agora which were surrounded by public buildings, stores and temples. The agora embodied the newfound respect for social justice received through open debate rather than imperial mandate. Though divine wisdom still presided over human affairs, the living rituals of ancient civilizations had become inscribed in space, in the paths that wound towards the acropolis for example. Each place had its own nature, set within a world refracted through myth, thus temples were sited atop mountains all the better to touch the heavens.

Roman architecture - The Romans conquered the Greek cities in Italy around three hundred years BCE and much of the Western world after that. The Roman problem of rulership involved the unity of disparity — from Spanish to Greek, Macedonian to Carthaginian — Roman rule had extended itself across the breadth of the known world and the myriad pacified cultures forming this ecumene presented a new challenge for justice. One way to look at the unity of Roman architecture is through a new-found realization of theory derived from practice, and embodied spatially. Civically we find this happening in the Roman forum (sibling of the Greek agora), where public participation is increasingly removed from the concrete performance of rituals and represented in the decor of the architecture. Thus we finally see the beginnings of the contemporary public square in the Forum Iulium, begun by Julius Caesar, where the buildings present themselves through their facades as representations within the space. As the Romans chose representations of sanctity over actual sacred spaces to participate in society, the communicative nature of space was opened to human manipulation. None of which would have been possible without the advances of Roman engineering and construction or the newly found marble quarries which were the spoils of war; inventions like the arch and concrete gave a whole new form to Roman architecture, fluidly enclosing space in taut domes and colonnades, clothing the grounds for imperial rulership and civic order. This was also a response to the changing social climate which demanded new buildings of increasing complexity — the colosseum, the residential block, bigger hospitals and academies. General civil construction such as roads and bridges began to be built.

The Romans widely employed, and further developed, the arch, vault and dome (see the Roman Architectural Revolution), all of which were little used before, particularly in Europe.¹ Their innovative use of Roman concrete facilitated the building of the many public buildings of often unprecedented size throughout the empire. These include Roman temples, Roman baths, Roman bridges, Roman aqueducts, Roman harbours, triumphal arches, Roman amphitheatres, Roman circuses palaces, mausolea and in the late empire also churches. Roman domes permitted construction of vaulted ceilings and enabled huge covered public spaces such as the public baths like Baths of Diocletian or the monumental Pantheon in the city of Rome. Art historians such as Gottfried Richter in the 1920s identified the Roman architectural innovation as being the Triumphal Arch and it is poignant to see how this symbol of power on earth was transformed and utilized within the Christian basilicas when the Roman Empire of the West was on its last legs: The arch was set before the altar to symbolize the triumph of Christ and the after life. It is in their impressive aqueducts that we see the arch triumphant, especially in the many surviving examples, such as the Pont du Gard, the aqueduct at Segovia and the remains of the Aqueducts of Rome itself. Their survival is testimony to the durability of their materials and design.

Byzantine architecture- The Byzantine Empire gradually emerged as a distinct artistic and cultural entity from the Roman Empire after AD 330, when the Roman Emperor Constantine moved the capital of the Roman Empire east from Rome to Byzantium (later renamed Constantinople and now called Istanbul). The empire endured for more than a millennium, dramatically influencing Medieval and Renaissance-era architecture in Europe and, following the capture of Constantinople by the Ottoman Turks in 1453, leading directly to the architecture of the Ottoman Empire. Early Byzantine architecture was built as a continuation of Roman architecture. Stylistic drift, technological advancement, and political and territorial changes meant that a distinct style gradually emerged which imbued certain influences from the Near East and used the Greek cross plan in church architecture. Buildings increased in geometric complexity, brick and plaster were used in addition to stone in the decoration of important public structures, classical orders were used more freely, mosaics replaced carved decoration, complex domes rested upon massive piers, and windows filtered light through thin sheets of alabaster to softly illuminate interiors.

Medieval architecture - Surviving examples of medieval secular architecture mainly served for defense. Castles and fortified walls provide the most notable remaining non-religious examples of medieval architecture. Windows gained a cross-shape for more than decorative purposes: they provided a perfect fit for a crossbowman to safely shoot at invaders from inside. Crenellation walls (battlements) provided shelters for archers on the roofs to hide behind when not shooting. Pre-Romanesque art and architecture- Western European architecture in the Early Middle Ages may be divided into Early Christian and Pre-Romanesque, including Merovingian, Carolingian, Ottonian, and Asturian. While these terms are problematic, they nonetheless serve adequately as entries into the era. Considerations that enter into histories of each period include Trachtenberg's "historicising" and "modernising" elements, Italian versus northern, Spanish, and Byzantine elements, and especially the religious and political maneuverings between kings, popes, and various ecclesiastic officials. Romanesque architecture - Romanesque, prevalent in medieval Europe during the 11th and 12th centuries, was the first pan-European style since Roman Imperial architecture and examples are found in every part of the continent. The term was not contemporary with the art it describes, but rather, is an invention of modern scholarship based on its similarity to Roman architecture in forms and materials. Romanesque is characterized by a use of round or slightly pointed arches, barrel vaults, and cruciform piers supporting vaults.

Gothic architecture - The various elements of Gothic architecture emerged in a number of 11th- and 12th-century building projects, particularly in the Île de France area, but were first combined to form what we would now recognise as a distinctively Gothic style at the 12th century abbey church of Saint-Denis in Saint-Denis, near Paris. Verticality is emphasized in Gothic architecture, which features almost skeletal stone structures with great expanses of glass, pared-down wall surfaces supported by external flying buttresses, pointed arches using the ogive shape, ribbed stone vaults, clustered columns, pinnacles and sharply pointed spires. Windows contain beautiful stained glass, showing stories from the Bible and from lives of saints. Such advances in design allowed cathedrals to rise taller than ever, and it became something of an inter-regional contest to build a church as high as possible.

Renaissance architecture - The Renaissance often refers to the Italian Renaissance that began in the 14th century, but recent research has revealed the existence of similar movements around Europe before the 15th century; consequently, the term "Early Modern" has gained popularity in describing this cultural movement. This period of cultural rebirth is often credited with the restoration of scholarship in the Classical Antiquities and the absorption of new scientific and philosophical knowledge that fed the arts. The development from Medieval architecture concerned the way geometry mediated between the intangibility of light and the tangibility of the material as a way of relating divine creation to mortal existence. This relationship was changed in some measure by the invention of Perspective which brought a sense of infinity into the realm of human comprehension through the new representations of the horizon, evidenced in the expanses of space opened up in Renaissance painting, and helped shape new humanist thought. Perspective represented a new understanding of space as a universal, a priori fact, understood and controllable through human reason. Renaissance buildings therefore show a different sense of conceptual clarity, where spaces were designed to be understood in their entirety from a specific fixed viewpoint. The power of Perspective to universally represent reality was not limited to describing experiences, but also allowed it to anticipate experience itself by projecting the image back into reality. The Renaissance spread to France in the late 15th century, when Charles VIII returned in 1496 with several Italian artists from his conquest of Naples. Renaissance chateaux were built in the Loire Valley, the earliest example being the Château d'Amboise, and the style became dominant under Francis I (1515–47). (See Châteaux of the Loire Valley). The Château de Chambord is a combination of Gothic structure and Italianate ornament, a style which progressed under architects such as Sebastiano Serlio, who was engaged after 1540 in work at the Château de Fontainebleau. Architects such as Philibert Delorme, Androuet du Cerceau, Giacomo Vignola, and Pierre Lescot, were inspired by the new ideas. The southwest interior facade of the Cour Carree of the Louvre in Paris was designed by Lescot and covered with exterior carvings by Jean Goujon. Architecture continued to thrive in the reigns of Henri II and Henri III. In England the first great exponent of Renaissance architecture was Inigo Jones (1573–1652), who had studied architecture in Italy where the influence of Palladio was very strong. Jones returned to England full of enthusiasm for the new movement and immediately began to design such buildings as the Queen's House at Greenwich in 1616 and the Banqueting House at Whitehall three years later. These works with their clean lines and symmetry, were revolutionary in a country still enamored with mullion windows, crenellations, turrets.

Baroque architecture - The periods of Mannerism and the Baroque that followed the Renaissance signaled an increasing anxiety over meaning and representation. Important developments in science and philosophy had separated mathematical representations of reality from the rest of culture, fundamentally changing the way humans related to their world through architecture. It would reach its most extreme and embellished development under the decorative tastes of Rococo. Neoclassical architecture - In the late 17th and 18th centuries, the works and theories of Andrea Palladio (from 16th-century Venice) would again be interpreted and adopted in England, spread by the English translation of his I Quattro Libri dell'Architettura, and pattern books such as Vitruvius Britannicus by Colen Campbell. This Palladian architecture and continued classical imagery would in turn go on to influence Thomas Jefferson and other early architects of the United States in their search for a new national architecture. By the mid-18th century, there tended to be more restrained decoration and usage of authentic classical forms than in the Baroque, informed by increased visitation to classical ruins as part of the Grand Tour, coupled with the excavations of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Federal-style architecture is the name for the classicizing architecture built in North America between c. 1780 and 1830, and particularly from 1785 to 1815. This style shares its name with its era, the Federal Period. The term is also used in association with furniture design in the United States of the same time period. The style broadly corresponds to the middle-class classicism of Biedermeier style in the German-speaking lands, Regency style in Britain and to the French Empire style. Beaux-Arts architecture - Beaux-Arts architecture^[16] denotes the academic classical architectural style that was taught at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris. The style "Beaux-Arts" is above all the cumulative product of two and a half centuries of instruction under the authority, first of the Académie royale d'architecture, then, following the Revolution, of the Architecture section of the Académie des Beaux-Arts. The organization under the Ancien Régime of the competition for the Grand Prix de Rome in architecture, offering a chance to study in Rome, imprinted its codes and esthetic on the course of instruction, which culminated during the Second Empire (1850–1870) and the Third Republic that followed. The style of instruction that produced Beaux-Arts architecture continued without a major renovation until 1968. Art Nouveau - Around 1900 a number of architects around the world began developing new architectural solutions to integrate traditional precedents with new social demands and technological possibilities. The work of Victor Horta and Henry van de Velde in Brussels, Antoni Gaudí in Barcelona, Otto Wagner in Vienna and Charles Rennie Mackintosh in Glasgow, among many others, can be seen as a common struggle between old and new.

Modern architecture - Early Modern architecture began with a number of building styles with similar characteristics, primarily the simplification of form and the elimination of ornament, that first arose around 1900. By the 1940s these styles had largely consolidated and been identified as the International Style. The exact characteristics and origins of modern architecture are still open to interpretation and debate. An important trigger appears to have been the maxim credited to Louis Sullivan: "form follows function". Functionalism, in architecture, is the principle that architects should design a building based on the purpose of that building. This statement is less self-evident than it first appears, and is a matter of confusion and controversy within the profession, particularly in regard to modern architecture. Expressionist architecture - Expressionist architecture was an architectural movement that developed in Northern Europe during the first decades of the 20th century in parallel with the expressionist visual and performing arts. The style was characterized by an early-modernist adoption of novel materials, formal innovation, and very unusual massing, sometimes inspired by natural biomorphic forms, sometimes by the new technical possibilities offered by the mass production of brick, steel and especially glass. Many expressionist architects fought in World War I and their experiences, combined with the political turmoil and social upheaval that followed the German Revolution of 1919, resulted in a utopian outlook and a romantic socialist agenda.^[18] Economic conditions severely limited the number of built commissions between 1914 and the mid-1920s, resulting in many of the most important expressionist works remaining as projects on paper, such as Bruno Taut's Alpine Architecture and Hermann Finsterlin's Formspiels. Ephemeral exhibition buildings were numerous and highly significant during this period. Scenography for theatre and films provided another outlet for the expressionist imagination, and provided supplemental incomes for designers attempting to challenge conventions in a harsh economic climate. International style \(architecture\) -The International style was a major architectural trend of the 1920s and 1930s. The term usually refers to the buildings and architects of the formative decades of modernism, before World War II. The term had its origin from the name of a book by Henry-Russell Hitchcock and Philip Johnson which identified, categorised and expanded upon characteristics common to modernism across the world. As a result, the focus was more on the stylistic aspects of modernism. The basic design principles of the International Style thus constitute part of modernism. The ideas of Modernism were developed especially in what was taught at the German Bauhaus School in Weimar (from 1919), Dessau (between 1926–32) and finally Berlin between 1932–33, under the leadership first of its founder Walter Gropius, then Hannes Meyer, and finally Ludwig Mies van der Rohe. Modernist theory in architecture resided in the attempt to bypass the question of what style a building should be built in, a concern that had overshadowed 19th-century architecture, and the wish to reduce form to its most minimal expression of structure and function. In the USA, Philip Johnson and Henry-Russell Hitchcock treated this new phenomenon in 1931 as if it represented a new style - the International Style, thereby misrepresenting its primary mission as merely a matter of eliminating traditional ornament. The core effort to pursue Modern architecture as an abstract, scientific programme was more faithfully carried forward in Europe, but issues of style always overshadowed its stricter and more puritan goals, not least in the work of Le Corbusier. Modern architecture - Modern architecture is generally characterized by simplification of form and creation of ornament from the structure and theme of the building. It is a term applied to an overarching movement, with its exact definition and scope varying widely.^[21] Modern architecture has continued into the 21st century as a contemporary style, especially for corporate office buildings. In a broader sense, modern architecture began at the turn of the 20th century with efforts to reconcile the principles underlying architectural design with rapid technological advancement and the modernization of society. It would take the form of numerous movements, schools of design, and architectural styles, some in tension with one another, and often equally defying such classification.

History of science - CERN: The European Organization for Nuclear Research, is the birthplace of the World Wide Web and home of the world's largest machine : the Large Hadron Collider. It is the world's largest particle physics laboratory, situated in the northwest suburbs of Geneva on the Franco–Swiss border, established in 1954. In November 2010, the collisions obtained were able to generate the highest temperatures and densities ever produced in an experiment, creating a "mini-Big Bang" a million times hotter than the centre of the Sun. ESA : The European Space Agency's space flight program includes human spaceflight, mainly through the participation in the International Space Station program, the launch and operations of unmanned exploration missions to other planets and the Moon, Earth observations, science, telecommunication as well as maintaining a major spaceport, the Guiana Space Centre at Kourou, French Guiana and designing launch vehicles. The main European launch vehicle Ariane 5 is operated through Arianespace with ESA sharing in the costs of launching and further developing this launch vehicle. On 12 November 2014, ESA's Philae probe achieved the first-ever soft landing on a comet.

History of Western philosophy - European philosophy is a predominant strand of philosophy globally, and is central to philosophical enquiry in America and most other parts of the world which have fallen under its influence. The Greek schools of philosophy in antiquity provide the basis of philosophical discourse that extends to today. Christian thought had a huge influence on many fields of European philosophy (as European philosophy has been on Christian thought too), sometimes as a reaction. Perhaps one of the most important single philosophical periods since the classical era were the Renaissance, the Age of Reason and the Age of Enlightenment. There are many disputes as to its value and even its timescale. What is indisputable is that the tenets of reason and rational discourse owe much to René Descartes, John Locke and others working at the time. Other important European philosophical strands include: Analytic philosophy, Anarchism, Christian Democracy, Communism, Conservatism, Constructionism, Deconstructionism, Empiricism, Epicureanism, Existentialism, Fascism, Humanism, Idealism, Internationalism, Liberalism, Logical positivism, Marxism, Materialism, Monarchism, Nationalism, Perspectivism, Platonism, Positivism, Postmodernism, Protestantism, Rationalism, Relativism, Republicanism, Romanticism, Scepticism, Scholasticism, Social Democracy, Socialism, Stoicism, Structuralism, Thomism, Utilitarianism, Spenglerism.

Religion in Europe

Historically, religion in Europe has been a major influence on European art, culture, philosophy and law. The largest religion in Europe is Christianity, with 76.2% of Europeans considering themselves Christians, including Catholic, Eastern Orthodox and various Protestant denominations (especially historically state-supported European ones such as Lutheranism, Anglicanism and the Reformed faith). The notion of "Europe" and the "Western World" has been intimately connected with the concept of "Christianity and Christendom" many even attribute Christianity for being the link that created a unified European identity. The second most popular religion is Islam (6%) concentrated mainly in the Balkans and eastern Europe (Bosnia and Herzegovina, Albania, Kosovo, Kazakhstan, North Cyprus, Turkey, Azerbaijan, North Caucasus, and the Volga-Ural region). Other religions, including Judaism, Hinduism, and Buddhism are minority religions (though Tibetan Buddhism is the majority religion of Russia's Republic of Kalmykia). The 20th century saw the revival of Neopaganism through movements such as Wicca and Druidry. Europe has become a relatively secular continent, with an increasing number and proportion of irreligious, atheist and agnostic people which make up about 18.2% of Europeans population, actually the largest secular in the Western world. There are a particularly high number of self-described non-religious people in the Czech Republic, Estonia, Sweden, former East Germany, and France. Indo-European religions were: Uralic mythologies, Celtic polytheism, Germanic paganism, Ancient Greek religion, Etruscan religion, and Slavic mythology. The Eurobarometer Poll 2005 found that, on average, 52% of the citizens of EU member states state that they "believe in God", 27% believe there is some sort of spirit or life force while 18% do not believe there is any sort of spirit, God or life force. 3% declined to answer. According to new polls about Religiosity in the European Union in 2012 by Eurobarometer, Christianity is the largest religion in the European Union accounting 72% of EU citizens. Non believer/Agnostic account 16%, Atheist account's 7%, and Muslim 2%. Christianity has been the dominant religion shaping European culture for at least the last 1700 years. Modern philosophical thought has very much been influenced by Christian philosophers such as St Thomas Aquinas and Erasmus. And throughout most of its history, Europe has been nearly equivalent to Christian culture, The Christian culture was the predominant force in western civilization, guiding the course of philosophy, art, and science. The notion of "Europe" and the "Western World" has been intimately connected with the concept of "Christianity and Christendom" many even attribute Christianity for being the link that created a unified European identity. The most popular religions of Europe are the following (by dominant religion):

Christianity is the largest religion in Europe, with 76.2% of Europeans considering themselves Christian, Catholicism: Countries with significant Catholic populations are Portugal,^[32] Spain,^[33] Poland,^[34] France,^[35] Luxembourg,^[36] Belgium,^[34] Ireland,^[37] Northern Ireland \(UK\),^[38] Italy,^[39] Malta,^[40] Austria,^[41] Hungary,^[42] Slovenia,^[43] Croatia,^[44] Slovakia^[45] and Lithuania.^[46] There are significant Catholic minorities in the Netherlands,^[47] southern Germany,^[48] Switzerland, the Czech Republic,^[49] western and central Belarus, western Ukraine,^[50] Hungarian-speaking Romania, Albania, parts of Russia, the Latgale region of Latvia, The Netherlands, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, England \(UK\), Scotland \(UK\),^[51] and Wales \(UK\),^[52] and indeed small minorities in most of the other European countries. Eastern Orthodoxy: The countries with significant Orthodox populations are Albania,^[53] Belarus,^{[54][55]} Bosnia and Herzegovina,^[56] Bulgaria,^[57] Cyprus,^[58] Georgia,^[59] Greece,^{[60][61]} Macedonia,^[62] Moldova,^[63] Montenegro,^[37] Romania,^[64] Russia,^[65] Serbia,^[66] Ukraine.^[67] Protestantism: Countries with significant Protestant populations are Norway,^[68] Iceland,^[69] Sweden,^[70] Finland,^[71] Estonia,^[72] Latvia,^[73] the United Kingdom,^[74] Denmark,^[75] the Netherlands,^[76] Germany,^[77] and Switzerland.^[78] There are significant minorities in France, Czech Republic, Slovakia, Austria, Hungary,^[42] and indeed small minorities in most European countries.

Islam: Country with a majority Muslim population is Albania. The region of East Thrace (Turkey) and Serbian province of Kosovo and Metohija also have a majority Muslim population.

As of 2010, about 5.2% of European citizens identified themselves as Muslims,^[79] with many of them living in Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, France, Georgia, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and the UK. Bosnia and Herzegovina, Macedonia, Montenegro, Crimea, Serbia, and parts of European Russia also have significant Muslim minorities.^[80] Judaism - Jews, originally Judaeen Israelite tribes from the Levant in Western Asia,^{[1][2][3][4]} migrated to Europe just before the rise of the Roman Empire. A notable early event in the history of the Jews in the Roman Empire was Pompey's conquest of the East beginning in 63 BCE though Alexandrian Jews had migrated to Rome before this event. The pre-World War II population of the Jews of Europe is estimated at close to 9 million.^[5] Around 6 million Jews were killed^{[6][7][8]} during the Holocaust, which was followed by emigration of much of the surviving population. The current Jewish population of Europe is estimated at ca. 2 million (0.3%), composed of:

- Ashkenazi Jews (about 1.4 million, mainly in France, Germany, Russia, Ukraine, the United Kingdom, Hungary and Belgium)
- Sephardi Jews (about 0.4 million, mainly in France, Turkey, Greece, Bulgaria, and Bosnia and Herzegovina)
- Mizrahi Jews (about 0.3 million, mainly in France, Spain, Georgia, the United Kingdom and Azerbaijan)
- Turkish Jews (some 250,000, also known as Djudios Turkos, with minorities of some 20,000 Selaniklis and 25,000 Sephardics)
- Italian Jews (some 45,000, mostly Italian)
- Romaniotes (some 6,000, mostly Greek)
- Georgian Jews (some 8,500, mostly in Georgia, Russia and Belgium)
- Crimean Karaites (some 1,500, mainly in Ukraine, Lithuania and Poland)
- Krymchaks (Jews of Turkic descent in Crimea; some 2000, mainly in Ukraine, Georgia and Russia)
- Mountain Jews (Jews of the Caucasus)

European cuisine - The cuisines of Western countries are diverse by themselves, although there are common characteristics that distinguishes Western cooking from cuisines of Asian countries and others. Compared with traditional cooking of Asian countries, for example, meat is more prominent and substantial in serving-size. Steak in particular is a common dish across the West. Similarly to some Asian cuisines, Western cuisines also put substantial emphasis on sauces as condiments, seasonings, or accompaniments (in part due to the difficulty of seasonings penetrating the often larger pieces of meat used in Western cooking). Many dairy products are utilized in the cooking process, except in nouvelle cuisine. Wheat-flour bread has long been the most common sources of starch in this cuisine, along with pasta, dumplings and pastries, although the potato has become a major starch plant in the diet of Europeans and their diaspora since the European colonization of the Americas.

Sport in Europe - Europe's influence on sport is enormous. Indeed, it is difficult to think of a modern sport, apart from basketball and related sports, that does not have its origins in Europe. European sports include:

- Association football, which has contested origins between United Kingdom and Italy (where Benito Mussolini insisted the game be called by the name Calcio). What is uncontestable is that the oldest association is The Football Association of England (1863) and the first international match was between Scotland and England (1872). It is now the world's most popular sport and is played throughout Europe.
- Cricket has its origins in south eastern Britain. It's popular throughout England and Wales, and parts of Netherlands. It is also popular in other areas and also played in Northwest Europe. It is however very popular worldwide, especially in Africa, Australia, New Zealand and the Indian subcontinent.

- Cycling, which is immensely popular as a means of transport, has most of its sporting adherents in Europe, particularly Central Europe. Tour de France is the world's most watched live annual sporting event. The bicycle itself is probably from France (see History of the bicycle).
- The discus throw, javelin throw and shot put have their origins in ancient Greece. The Olympics, both ancient and modern, have their origins too in Europe.
- Field Hockey as a modern game, began in 18th Century Britain with Ireland having the oldest federation. It is popular in the British Isles, the Indian subcontinent, Australia and East Asia. Ice hockey, popular in Europe and North America may derive from this sport.
- Golf, one of the most popular sports in Europe, Asia and North America, has its origins in Scotland, with the oldest course being at Musselburgh.
- Handball, which is popular in Europe and elsewhere, has its origins in antiquity. The modern game is from Northern Europe with Germany having been involved in both the first women's and men's internationals.
- Rugby League and Rugby Union which both have similar origins to football. Rugby Union is the older of the two codes and has rules that date from 1845 (see articles: History of rugby league and History of rugby union). They acrimoniously split in the late 19th century over the treatment of injured players. Rugby league gradually changed its laws over the next century with the end result that today both sports have little in common, apart from the basics. They have both been carried abroad by colonization, particularly to many former British colonies. American Football and Canadian Football are derivatives of rugby.
- Tennis which originates from United Kingdom and related games such as Table Tennis derive from the game Real Tennis which is from France. It is popular in the world.

"Europe Day" is a celebration of Europe held annually on 5 and 9 May due to differences between the Council of Europe and the EU. 9 May 1950 was the date of the "Schuman Declaration", the proposal to pool the French and West German coal and steel industries. This is considered a founding moment for what is now the EU and was adopted as its flag day at the Milan European Council summit in 1985. The Council of Europe was founded on 5 May 1949 and hence chooses that date for its celebrations. It established this date in 1964 and, despite a preference for 9 May, it is still observed by some Europeans because of the Council of Europe's role in defending human rights, parliamentary democracy and the rule of law, whereas the Schuman declaration was merely proposing the pooling of French and German coal and steel. Furthermore, 9 May coincides with Victory Day, the end of World War II (celebrated on 8 May in western Europe), in the former Soviet Union states. The European anthem is based on the prelude to "The Ode to Joy", 4th movement of Ludwig van Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. Due to the large number of languages in Europe, it is an instrumental version only, with the original German lyrics having no official status. The anthem was announced on 19 January 1972 by the Council of Europe, after being arranged by conductor Herbert von Karajan. The anthem was launched via a major information campaign on Europe Day, 5 May 1972. It was adopted by European Community leaders in 1985. It does not replace national anthems, but is intended to celebrate their shared values. It is played on official occasions by both the Council of Europe and the European Union. Other scores associated with pan-Europeanism include the hymn of the European Broadcasting Union (the prelude of Marc-Antoine Charpentier's Te Deum; played e.g. before every Eurovision Song Contest) and the UEFA Champions League Anthem (an arrangement of George Frideric Handel's Zadok the Priest (one of his Coronation Anthems); played before UEFA Champions League television broadcast since 1992).

I have read many books on theater, playwrights, actors and directors, and have read hundreds of plays in many languages (see Plays above). I was a member of the Board of Directors of the Haifa Theater and prepared a strategic planning for the theater, that was rejected by the Mayor. I have written a play Nelly's Choice that was published in France and extracts of it in Hebrew can be seen on Cory's website. The full play is at the Haifa University library. Nelly Doron, the first full version of the play, was published in Cory's eBook Social, Economic and Governmental Justice: Essays, Articles, and the play Nelly Doron. The eBook can be downloaded free of charge from the libraries of the University of Haifa, Carmel Academic Center, from the websites of Ometz Ethical Organization, Transparency International Israel, and Cory's website. Review of the play by Joshua Sobol, one of the greatest world's playwrights, in Hebrew, French and English is on Cory's website. The play was performed at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on July 30, 2008. Every year I see about 20 plays, when abroad I go every night to the theater. The list of the plays seen in 2011-2013 is herebelow, and the list of videos of plays as well. I see also about 20 Lectures every year in Haifa and Tel Aviv on art, music, theater, films, poetry and literature, economics, business, social protest, politics, history, geography, philosophy, etc. For links to theater performances, plays and plays videos see the chapters: Plays, Cinema & Films.

4.1 COMMENTS ON PLAYS SEEN IN ISRAEL, LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK & BERLIN

Israel has become a paradise for theater lovers, with at least 10 theater groups and many fringe groups, but also dozens of theater halls all over the country where the repertory groups perform, performing plays of the ancient Greeks and Latins, classics, modern, avant-garde, Israeli, European, American and International playwrights. Joshua Sobol is an Israeli playwright and one of the best playwrights in the world. He is my friend, and I have read almost all his dozens plays and wrote a review on them, and of course saw all his plays performed in the last few years. Sobol also wrote a very favorable review of my play Nelly's Choice. The hub of all the theaters is Tel Aviv, one of the most cultural cities in the world, but Haifa has also a theater (I was a director in this theater for a number of years), showing its repertory but also hosting most of the other theaters. So, I saw during the period of 2011-2013 (it is just a sample) more than 60 plays in Haifa, but also in Tel Aviv and New York – an average of at least 20 plays a year. There were times when I saw much more plays, traveling for months to Europe and the US and going to the theater every night. I had for many years a subscription to at least two theaters for all my 5 family members with an extra seat for one of their friends, to a philharmonic orchestra – 10 concerts, to 10 folklore music performances, 10 chamber music subscription, to 20 lectures a year, watching at least 100 films a year at the cinematheque/cinemas and 50 films at the Haifa film festival, going also occasionally to jazz, fringe, ballet, opera, and of course watching TV.

I never see reality programs or TV series, almost never see the news, never watch programs with commercials, and when I am at home I see on cable TV two good films a night. During the years 2011-2013 I saw among others: The servant of two masters by Goldoni, Yerma by Lorca, A view from the bridge by Arthur Miller, Moris Shimel by Levin, Les fourberies de Scapin by Moliere, Ghetto by Sobol, The Caucasian chalk circle by Brecht, All my sons by Arthur Miller, Art by Yasmina Reza, An Ideal Husband – an adaptation by Sobol of Oscar Wilde, Revizor by Gogol, Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore by Pirandello, Ivona Princess of Burgundia by Witold Gombrowicz, Gott Mensch and Teufel by Gordin in Yiddish, L'ecole des femmes by Moliere, Caviar and lentils by Scarnicci and Tarabusi, Once there was a Hassid by Dan Almagor, Race by Mamet, Le prenom by Delaporte and de la Patteliere, The Lover by Pinter, A pigeon and a boy by Meir Shalev, Suitcase Packers by Levin, Makolet by Mittlepunkt, Richard II (I studied it at the university), Richard III by Shakespeare, Lend me a tenor by Ludwig, The merchant of Venice by Shakespeare, A doll's house by Ibsen, They shoot horses, don't they? By McCoy, Arsenic and old lace by Kesselring, Mirale Efrat by Gordin, Kazablan by Ygal Mossinsohn, The Good soldier Schweik by Hasek, and many other plays by classics and Israelis.

I have a problem with Broadway plays. In my many visits to the city in the past I went to the theater every night and paid reasonable prices for the best seats. I stayed at the best hotels and paid reasonable prices, a full breakfast cost in the eighties one dollar..., New York was affordable to theater lovers. However, in the last ten to fifteen years, tickets have reached the outrageous price of $500 for the best seats, a good hotel cost at least $600 per night, a visit to New York for a week or two may amount for a couple to $10,000 - $20,000, even if you don't reside in the best hotels and don't purchase the best theater seats. But, if you are resourceful, you can go to off Broadway shows at reasonable prices, and see excellent plays as I saw in 2011 - musicals on the life of Bessie Smith and Danny Kaye, Freud's Last Session by Marjorie Deane, went to a theater festival and saw Mo Lo Ra of the South Africa Theater and The Temple of the Golden Pavilion of the Japanese Theater, and saw on Broadway Rain, a Tribute to the Beatles.

To illustrate the plays that I have seen in the best theaters in London, Paris, New York and Berlin in the last few years we brought a few examples: In September 2006 in New York: The times they are a-changing – a musical on Bob Dylan's songs, The wedding singer, Losing Louie – on the assimilation of a Jewish family, Jewtopia – Jewish humor, WASPs in bed, The history boys, Arms and the Man by Shaw (in Seattle), and also La Boheme at the New York City Opera, and at Avery Fisher Hall – the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Lorin Mazel conducting, with Mahler's symphony no. 4 recorded live. In December 2014 we saw in New York very good plays, most of them on Off Broadway – Side Show, Disenchanted, Absolution, an excellent Wiesenthal, The Oldest Boy, a very good musical Motown, A Particle of Dread, A Delicate Balance by Edward Albee with Glenn Close. On the average there is a deterioration in the quality of plays and musicals that I see in New York, although I do not travel often to New York as I used to in the past, but every few years, so my impression is not an objective impression.

In June 2009 I saw in London excellent plays, as the London theaters exceed by far their cousins in New York: at Shakespeare's Globe Theater we saw an unforgettable Romeo and Juliet, at the National Theater we saw Phedre by Racine with Helen Mirren, directed by Nicholas Hytner, we saw Stoppard's Arcadia, Sondheim's A little night music, Harwood's Collaboration on the relations of Richard Strauss and Stephan Zweig his Jewish librettist, and Taking Sides on the denazification of Wilhelm Furtwangler. Sometimes you have excellent surprises as Duet for One, which we saw on the first row of Vaudeville Theatre with Juliet Stevenson and Henry Goodman. I enjoyed also light comedies such as England People very nice at the Olivier. 8 plays in a week, with such excellence, what a treat! I am sorry that I do not have the opportunity to see London plays as I used to in the past, but subjectively I can say that they are as good as before.

With all due respect to New York and London theaters, I enjoy the most going to the theater in Paris, as I see plays in my mother tongue and enjoy all kinds of theater. I have probably seen hundreds of plays over the years in Paris, sometimes seeing as much as three plays a night. I know practically almost all the important theaters, but go often to Fringe Theater in tiny places of 20 seats. In March 2010 for example I saw at the Theatre de Paris - Seznec, about a famous trial with my favorite director Robert Hossein – this time I didn't sit next to him as in Julius Caesar, but Hossein came after the play and talked to the audience, answering their questions. At La Pepiniere I saw two plays one after the other – Promenade de sante and a musical – Non, je ne danse pas. At the Comedie Francaise (how not) I saw one of the best comedies by Corneille – L'illusion comique, directed by Galin Stoev. Every time I go to the Comedie Francaise, I have a sense of elation. This is the theater where I feel the most in my element, everything is perfect there. Even if you can't hear well, the Comedie has special days where you can read the text in subtitles, and of course you have earphones, but even better – you pay for yourself and your companion tickets at half price in the best seats, because you are handicapped. And this isn't only at the Comedie, it is also at Chaillot Theater and all over France. There are endless stories that can be told on the theaters of Paris, the funniest is maybe, when I went to a musical on the songs of Mistinguett with Zizi Jeanmaire, one of the leading singers and dancers in France, I sat as usual at the best places and was very well dressed as I came directly from business meetings. Zizi sang the famous song – Je cherche un millionnaire – I am looking for a millionaire. And so, from all the spectators, she chose me, sat on my lap, and asked me if I were a millionaire, and if I wanted her. I was exhilarated, as it was quite a long way from my humble beginnings at the vocation school in Israel, a long time ago. I enjoy all kinds of theater – classic, modern, musicals, sometimes even kitsch, concerts, ballet, jazz, standup, in large and well-known theaters as the Comedie Francaise or Le Casino de Paris, but also in tiny theaters or small ones.

I went also in 2010 to the Casino de Paris, the largest Parisian musical to see Gala pour Haiti, a gala where the best French actors, musicians and singers came to raise money for Haiti. I saw at the Rond-Point des Champs Elysees, the closest theater from my hotel, where I used to come in the dozen times when I was in Paris in the last 20 years, at the Salle Renaud-Barrault (the same famous actors that I saw during the Students' Revolution of May 1968): a delightful comedy Les nouvelles breves du comptoir. At the Comedie des Champs Elysees (also near "home/hotel") I saw one of my favorite plays by one of my favorite playwrights – Colombe by Jean Anouilh, directed by Michel Fagadau, with the excellent actors – Anny Duperey, Sara Giraudeau and Rufus. At the Madeleine, all in a walking distance – I saw Ibsen's A Doll's House with the famous actor Audrey Tautou, which was a very moving Nora, and with Michel Fau who also directed. Nearby, at the Madeleine church although it was freezing and the church was not heated, I heard a beautiful concert with the fantastic Les violons de Paris – Vivaldi's the four seasons, Ave Maria by Schubert and Gounod, Aria by Bach, Canon by Pachelbel and Albinoni's Adagio. Finally, at the famous music hall Follies Bergere, I saw the musical Zorro by Clark and Edmundson, with music by The Gipsy Kings. In December 2014 I saw Un chapeau de paille d'Italie, a lovely comedy by Eugene Labiche at the Comedie Francaise, a tedious musical Mistinguett about the life of one of my most beloved singers Mistinguett with a mediocre actress and a mediocre show, an exhilarating review Ca swing chez Maxim's on Les freres Jacques, excellent plays as Le rois se meurt by Ionesco at the Theatre de Paris with Michel Bouquet, Moliere's Georges Dandin at the Comedie Francaise, La colere du tigre with Claude Brasseur and Michel Aumont at the Theatre Montparnasse, and mediocre plays although with excellent actors as Novecento with Andre Dussolier and Kinship with Isabelle Adjani. My impression is that the quality of the plays in Paris has remained as high as before since the days where I first saw plays in Paris in 1967, then occasionally in the seventies and eighties, every month or so during most of the nineties, and quite frequently in the beginning of the new century.

Ruthy and I spent a fantastic fortnight in Berlin, one of the most beautiful and attractive cities in the world. I liked very much the city, but haven't visited it after I studied there at the Goethe Institut in 1967. On the occasion of the Insead Alumni reunion in 2010 I visited the city once more. I liked the people, the architecture, the prices for hotels, food and culture were very reasonable. After the reunion we stayed for another 10 days, and every night we went to the theater. We wrote already about the excellent Brecht and Weill's Dreigroschenoper at the Berliner Ensemble, where we saw also Mutter Courage und ihre Kinder by Brecht. We saw also Der Besuch den alten Dame by Duerenmatt at the Maxim Gorki theater (most of the cultural life was at the old East Berlin, which was now the middle of the city). At the Deutsches Theater we saw 3 plays – Faust I, by Goethe, directed by Michael Thalheimer, Krankenzimmer Nr. 6, by Tchekhov, directed by Dimiter Gotscheff, and Der Schmerz by Marguerite Duras. We saw a ballet – Shut up and Dance! at the Staatsballet Berlin, a concert at the Staatsoper Unter den Linden with the Staatskapelle Berlin conducted by Daniel Barenboim – a concert of Schumann's works – the best concert I have ever seen, everything was perfect, the concert hall, the composer, the conductor and the orchestra. The concert held on June 1, 2010, was in celebration of Schumann's 200th birthday. Young German cellist Marie-Elisabeth Hecker performed the cello concerto, and the Staatskapelle Berlin performed the first and fourth symphonies. Schumann's cello concerto was played in the past by Jacqueline du Pre, also a young cellist. She was the wife of Barenboim, who conducted. Finally, we saw a comedy on Wilhelm Busch – Helena, Max & Co., and at Dresden Opera – Verdi's Macbeth. It was an unforgettable visit! The three European capitals of culture – Paris, London and Berlin – are unbeatable, and I enjoyed every moment.

4.5 THE UNBEARABLE LIGHTNESS OF SLANDERING ISRAEL IN THE THEATER

I would like to share a personal dilemma on reacting to slandering Israel in the theater. In 2014, I organized a tour to Provence with my friends. In the first five days of the tour, the group stayed in Avignon, and those who wanted attended the famous festival there. For decades, I wanted to attend this festival, and now at last I had the opportunity to do so. I ordered tickets for every night and chose plays in German, Spanish and French. The plays were under average, but I prefer not to blame the festival as perhaps I didn't choose the right plays. When I went to see the play in Spanish with young Chileans actors about the last day of Allende's life, I noticed that they did not treat too hard Pinochet, and I wondered why, because I was always a fierce opponent of Pinochet's regime, of the murder of thousands, torturing and incarcerating tens of thousands. Pinochet was the dictator of Chile from 1973 to 1990, ruling the country by terror, who introduced a neo liberal regime, implementing a la lettre all what Milton Friedman told him to do. Suddenly, before the last scene, the leading actor stops the play in Spanish and tells the audience in French that he wants to speak about the atrocities of Benjamin Netanyahu and Israel towards the Palestinians, stating bluntly that the Israeli prime minister enjoys killing Palestinian children (with the worse sexual allegations). I was astonished and couldn't believe this.

This actor does not speak about the atrocities in Chile during Pinochet's regime as this is the topic of the play, nor about Syria where hundreds of thousands of civilians were killed today, nor about the atrocities in Sudan, Iraq, Afghanistan, surely not about the atrocities that the terrorist Hamas regime does in Gaza to their own people. The actor prefers to speak about Israel (and implicitly the Jews) killing on purpose poor children. I had one of my worst dilemmas – what should I do? Stand up and refute those anti-Semite allegations, totally convinced that all the children killed in the war were not killed on purpose but because the Hamas launched thousands of rockets towards Israel trying to kill innocent civilians and Israel retaliated by firing back the sites of the launching, that Hamas has chosen to fight from civilian neighbourhoods, because they wanted to show the 'atrocities' of Israel, and of course not caring about their people's lives. To tell all that in the middle of the play in French or Spanish was impossible. I could leave the theater, but I wanted to see what would be the reaction of the public. The public didn't applaud and remained silent, but I remained in a state of outrage until the end of the play and far beyond. I wanted to complain to the management of the Festival, but didn't do it. I finally chose not to react, because it would only promote the mendacious propaganda against Israel.

And I thought of the Jews who started to hear such anti-Semitic remarks and lies in the theater, in films, on the radio, at school, at the universities, in the streets, from the officials, during the early years of the Nazi regime and couldn't react. I thought that probably the gangrene of anti-Semitism has become widespread, if in a friendly country like France, a Chilean actor coming from a friendly state to Israel, the most ethical country in Latin America, that has suffered from similar fascist lies and propagandas, dares to speak in such a manner about an Israeli prime minister elected democratically by the only democratic state in the Middle East (although I haven't voted for him but to the Labor party). Why this actor didn't speak about the atrocities of some Arab or Muslim regimes, was he afraid that his fate would be like the fate of Charlie Hebdo (a few months later), those people kill for a caricature and the democratic Israel does not react against slander, or has it become politically correct to tell lies about the Jews like the Nazis did a few decades ago. The "courageous" actor (it is interesting to learn how his parents reacted against Pinochet, were they silent as most of the Chileans, what kind of courage is needed to talk today against Pinochet, and even better against the Israelis) knew that it has become bon ton to speak so against the Jews and the Israelis, he knew that although he lies he wouldn't be sued and nothing would happen to him. He knew that the European journalists who covered the war in Gaza were afraid to tell the truth about the civilian shield of the Hamas because they would be murdered by this terrorist regime who ruled Gaza in a retrograde, fundamentalist and undemocratic regime, wanting to annihilate Israel, and investing the billions that they receive not in improving the welfare of their citizens but in a hopeless war against Israel. Hamas, the terrorist Islamic fundamentalists murdering civilians in Gaza and Israel and involved in terrorist attacks against Europeans are OK, but the democratic Europeans Israelis are murderers of children? And all this said at an international theater festival that pretends to promote humanistic ideals... I have not reacted, rightly or wrongly, have I acted cowardly, was I afraid that I would sound ridiculous, that it would only worsen the situation? What would you do in my place?

4.6 HISTORY OF EUROPEAN THEATER

Theatre probably arose as a performance of ritual activities that did not require initiation on the part of the spectator. This similarity of early theatre to ritual is negatively attested by Aristotle, who in his Poetics defined theatre in contrast to the performances of sacred mysteries: theatre did not require the spectator to fast, drink the kykeon, or march in a procession; however theatre did resemble the sacred mysteries in the sense that it brought purification and healing to the spectator by means of a vision, the theama. The physical location of such performances was accordingly named theatron (theater in Hebrew). According to the historians Oscar Brockett and Franklin Hildy, rituals typically include elements that entertain or give pleasure, such as costumes and masks as well as skilled performers. As societies grew more complex, these spectacular elements began to be acted out under non-ritualistic conditions. As this occurred, the first steps towards theatre as an autonomous activity were being taken. Greek theatre, most developed in Athens, is the root of the Western tradition; theatre is in origin a Greek word. It was part of a broader culture of theatricality and performance in classical Greece that included festivals, religious rituals, politics, law, athletics and gymnastics, music, poetry, weddings, funerals, and symposia. Participation in the city-state's many festivals—and attendance at the City Dionysia as an audience member (or even as a participant in the theatrical productions) in particular—was an important part of citizenship. Civic participation also involved the evaluation of the rhetoric of orators evidenced in performances in the law-court or political assembly, both of which were understood as analogous to the theatre and increasingly came to absorb its dramatic vocabulary. The theatre of ancient Greece consisted of three types of drama: tragedy, comedy, the satyr play.

Athenian tragedy—the oldest surviving form of tragedy—is a type of dance-drama that formed an important part of the theatrical culture of the city-state.^[9] Having emerged sometime during the 6th century BC, it flowered during the 5th century BC (from the end of which it began to spread throughout the Greek world) and continued to be popular until the beginning of the Hellenistic period.^[10] No tragedies from the 6th century and only 32 of the more than a thousand that were performed in during the 5th century have survived.^[11] We have complete texts extant by Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.^[12] The origins of tragedy remain obscure, though by the 5th century it was institutionalised in competitions (agon) held as part of festivities celebrating Dionysos (the god of wine and fertility).^[13] As contestants in the City Dionysia's competition (the most prestigious of the festivals to stage drama), playwrights were required to present a tetralogy of plays (though the individual works were not necessarily connected by story or theme), which usually consisted of three tragedies and one satyr play.^[14] The performance of tragedies at the City Dionysia may have begun as early as 534 BC; official records (didaskaliai) begin from 501 BC, when the satyr play was introduced.^[15] Most Athenian tragedies dramatise events from Greek mythology, though The Persians—which stages the Persian response to news of their military defeat at the Battle of Salamis in 480 BC—is the notable exception in the surviving drama.^[16] When Aeschylus won first prize for it at the City Dionysia in 472 BC, he had been writing tragedies for more than 25 years, yet its tragic treatment of recent history is the earliest example of drama to survive.^[17] More than 130 years later, the philosopher Aristotle analysed 5th-century Athenian tragedy in the oldest surviving work of dramatic theory—his Poetics (c. 335 BC). Athenian comedy is conventionally divided into three periods, "Old Comedy", "Middle Comedy", and "New Comedy". Old Comedy survives today largely in the form of the eleven surviving plays of Aristophanes, while Middle Comedy is largely lost (preserved only in relatively short fragments in authors such as Athenaeus of Naucratis). New Comedy is known primarily from the substantial papyrus fragments of plays by Menander. Aristotle defined comedy as a representation of laughable people that involves some kind of error or ugliness that does not cause pain or destruction.^[18]

Western theatre developed and expanded considerably under the Romans. The Roman historian Livy wrote that the Romans first experienced theatre in the 4th century BC, with a performance by Etruscan actors.^[19] Beacham argues that Romans had been familiar with "pre-theatrical practices" for some time before that recorded contact.^[20] The theatre of ancient Rome was a thriving and diverse art form, ranging from festival performances of street theatre, nude dancing, and acrobatics, to the staging of Plautus's broadly appealing situation comedies, to the high-style, verbally elaborate tragedies of Seneca. Although Rome had a native tradition of performance, the Hellenization of Roman culture in the 3rd century BC had a profound and energizing effect on Roman theatre and encouraged the development of Latin literature of the highest quality for the stage. Following the expansion of the Roman Republic (509–27 BC) into several Greek territories between 270–240 BC, Rome encountered Greek drama.^[21] From the later years of the republic and by means of the Roman Empire (27 BC–476 AD), theatre spread west across Europe, around the Mediterranean and reached England; Roman theatre was more varied, extensive and sophisticated than that of any culture before it.^[22] While Greek drama continued to be performed throughout the Roman period, the year 240 BC marks the beginning of regular Roman drama.^[23] From the beginning of the empire, however, interest in full-length drama declined in favour of a broader variety of theatrical entertainments.^[24]

The first important works of Roman literature were the tragedies and comedies that Livius Andronicus wrote from 240 BC.^[25] Five years later, Gnaeus Naevius also began to write drama.^[25] No plays from either writer have survived. While both dramatists composed in both genres, Andronicus was most appreciated for his tragedies and Naevius for his comedies; their successors tended to specialise in one or the other, which led to a separation of the subsequent development of each type of drama.^[25] By the beginning of the 2nd century BC, drama was firmly established in Rome and a guild of writers (collegium poetarum) had been formed. The Roman comedies that have survived are all fabula palliata (comedies based on Greek subjects) and come from two dramatists: Titus Maccius Plautus (Plautus) and Publius Terentius Afer (Terence).^[27] In re-working the Greek originals, the Roman comic dramatists abolished the role of the chorus in dividing the drama into episodes and introduced musical accompaniment to its dialogue (between one-third of the dialogue in the comedies of Plautus and two-thirds in those of Terence).^[28] The action of all scenes is set in the exterior location of a street and its complications often follow from eavesdropping.^[28] Plautus, the more popular of the two, wrote between 205 and 184 BC and twenty of his comedies survive, of which his farces are best known; he was admired for the wit of his dialogue and his use of a variety of poetic meters.^[29] All of the six comedies that Terence wrote between 166 and 160 BC have survived; the complexity of his plots, in which he often combined several Greek originals, was sometimes denounced, but his double-plots enabled a sophisticated presentation of contrasting human behaviour. No early Roman tragedy survives, though it was highly regarded in its day; historians know of three early tragedians—Quintus Ennius, Marcus Pacuvius and Lucius Accius. From the time of the empire, the work of 2 tragedians survives—I is an unknown author, while the other is the Stoic philosopher Seneca. 9 of Seneca's tragedies survive, all of which are fabula crepidata (tragedies adapted from Greek originals); his Phaedra, for example, was based on Euripides' Hippolytus. Historians do not know who wrote the only extant example of the fabula praetexta (tragedies based on Roman subjects), Octavia, but in former times it was mistakenly attributed to Seneca due to his appearance as a character in the tragedy.

As the Western Roman Empire fell into decay through the 4th and 5th centuries, the seat of Roman power shifted to Constantinople and the Eastern Roman Empire, today called the Byzantine Empire. While surviving evidence about Byzantine theatre is slight, existing records show that mime, pantomime, scenes or recitations from tragedies and comedies, dances, and other entertainments were very popular. Constantinople had two theatres that were in use as late as the 5th century.^[32] However, the true importance of the Byzantines in theatrical history is their preservation of many classical Greek texts and the compilation of a massive encyclopedia called the Suda, from which is derived a large amount of contemporary information on Greek theatre. From the 5th century, Western Europe was plunged into a period of general disorder that lasted (with a brief period of stability under the Carolingian Empire in the 9th century) until the 10th century. As such, most organized theatrical activities disappeared in Western Europe. While it seems that small nomadic bands traveled around Europe throughout the period, performing wherever they could find an audience, there is no evidence that they produced anything but crude scenes.^[33] These performers were denounced by the Church during the Dark Ages as they were viewed as dangerous and pagan.

By the Early Middle Ages, churches in Europe began staging dramatized versions of particular biblical events on specific days of the year. These dramatizations were included in order to vivify annual celebrations.^[34] Symbolic objects and actions – vestments, altars, censers, and pantomime performed by priests – recalled the events which Christian ritual celebrates. These were extensive sets of visual signs that could be used to communicate with a largely illiterate audience. These performances developed into liturgical dramas, the earliest of which is the Whom do you Seek (Quem-Quaeritis) Easter trope, dating from ca. 925.^[34] Liturgical drama was sung responsively by two groups and did not involve actors impersonating characters. However, sometime between 965 and 975, Æthelwold of Winchester composed the Regularis Concordia (Monastic Agreement) which contains a playlet complete with directions for performance. Hrosvitha (c. 935 – 973), a canoness in northern Germany, wrote six plays modeled on Terence's comedies but using religious subjects. These six plays – Abraham, Callimachus, Dulcitius, Gallicanus, Paphnutius, and Sapientia – are the first known plays composed by a female dramatist and the first identifiable Western dramatic works of the post-classical era.^[35] They were first published in 1501 and had considerable influence on religious and didactic plays of the sixteenth century. Hrosvitha was followed by Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179), a Benedictine abbess, who wrote a Latin musical drama called Ordo Virtutum in 1155.

As the Viking invasions ceased in the middle of the 11th century, liturgical drama had spread from Russia to Scandinavia to Italy. Only in Muslim-occupied Spain were liturgical dramas not presented at all. Despite the large number of liturgical dramas that have survived from the period, many churches would have only performed one or two per year and a larger number never performed any at all. The Feast of Fools was especially important in the development of comedy. The festival inverted the status of the lesser clergy and allowed them to ridicule their superiors and the routine of church life. Sometimes plays were staged as part of the occasion and a certain amount of burlesque and comedy crept into these performances. Although comic episodes had to truly wait until the separation of drama from the liturgy, the Feast of Fools undoubtedly had a profound effect on the development of comedy in both religious and secular plays. Performance of religious plays outside of the church began sometime in the 12th century through a traditionally accepted process of merging shorter liturgical dramas into longer plays which were then translated into vernacular and performed by laymen. The Mystery of Adam (1150) gives credence to this theory as its detailed stage direction suggest that it was staged outdoors. A number of other plays from the period survive, including La Seinte Resurrection (Norman), The Play of the Magi Kings (Spanish), and Sponsus (French).

The importance of the High Middle Ages in the development of theatre was the economic and political changes that led to the formation of guilds and the growth of towns. This would lead to significant changes in the Late Middle Ages. In the British Isles, plays were produced in some 127 different towns during the Middle Ages. These vernacular Mystery plays were written in cycles of a large number of plays: York (48 plays), Chester (24), Wakefield (32) and Unknown (42). A larger number of plays survive from France and Germany in this period and some type of religious dramas were performed in nearly every European country in the Late Middle Ages. Many of these plays contained comedy, devils, villains and clowns. The majority of actors in these plays were drawn from the local population. For example, at Valenciennes in 1547, more than 100 roles were assigned to 72 actors.^[39] Plays were staged on pageant wagon stages, which were platforms mounted on wheels used to move scenery. Often providing their own costumes, amateur performers in England were exclusively male, but other countries had female performers. The platform stage, which was an unidentified space and not a specific locale, allowed for abrupt changes in location. Morality plays emerged as a distinct dramatic form around 1400 and flourished until 1550. The most interesting morality play is The Castle of Perseverance which depicts mankind's progress from birth to death. However, the most famous morality play and perhaps best known medieval drama is Everyman. Everyman receives Death's summons, struggles to escape and finally resigns himself to necessity. Along the way, he is deserted by Kindred, Goods, and Fellowship – only Good Deeds goes with him to the grave.

There were also a number of secular performances staged in the Middle Ages, the earliest of which is The Play of the Greenwood by Adam de la Halle in 1276. It contains satirical scenes and folk material such as faeries and other supernatural occurrences. Farces also rose dramatically in popularity after the 13th century. The majority of these plays come from France and Germany and are similar in tone and form, emphasizing sex and bodily excretions.^[40] The best known playwright of farces is Hans Sachs (1494–1576) who wrote 198 dramatic works. In England, The Second Shepherds' Play of the Wakefield Cycle is the best known early farce. However, farce did not appear independently in England until the 16th century with the work of John Heywood (1497–1580). A significant forerunner of the development of Elizabethan drama was the Chambers of Rhetoric in the Low Countries.^[41] These societies were concerned with poetry, music and drama and held contests to see which society could compose the best drama in relation to a question posed. At the end of the Late Middle Ages, professional actors began to appear in England and Europe. Richard III and Henry VII both maintained small companies of professional actors. Their plays were performed in the Great Hall of a nobleman's residence, often with a raised platform at one end for the audience and a "screen" at the other for the actors. Also important were Mummers' plays, performed during the Christmas season, and court masques. These masques were especially popular during the reign of Henry VIII who had a House of Revels built and an Office of Revels established in 1545. The end of medieval drama came about due to a number of factors, including the weakening power of the Catholic Church, the Protestant Reformation and the banning of religious plays in many countries. Elizabeth I forbid all religious plays in 1558 and the great cycle plays had been silenced by the 1580s. Similarly, religious plays were banned in the Netherlands in 1539, the Papal States in 1547 and in Paris in 1548. The abandonment of these plays destroyed the international theatre that had thereto existed and forced each country to develop its own form of drama. It also allowed dramatists to turn to secular subjects and the reviving interest in Greek and Roman theatre provided them with the perfect opportunity.

Commedia dell'arte troupes performed lively improvisational playlets across Europe for centuries. It originated in Italy in the 1560s. Commedia dell'arte was an actor-centred theatre, requiring little scenery and very few props. Plays did not originate from written drama but from scenarios called lazzi, which were loose frameworks that provided the situations, complications, and outcome of the action, around which the actors would improvise. The plays utilised stock characters, which could be divided into three groups: the lovers, the masters, and the servants. The lovers had different names and characteristics in most plays and often were the children of the master. The role of master was normally based on one of three stereotypes: Pantalone, an elderly Venetian merchant; Dottore, Pantalone's friend or rival, a pedantic doctor or lawyer who acted far more intelligent than he really was; and Capitano, who was once a lover character, but evolved into a braggart who boasted of his exploits in love and war, but was often terrifically unskilled in both. He normally carried a sword and wore a cape and feathered headdress. The servant character (called zanni) had only one recurring role: Arlecchino (also called Harlequin). He was both cunning and ignorant, but an accomplished dancer and acrobat. He typically carried a wooden stick with a split in the middle so it made a loud noise when striking something. This "weapon" gave us the term "slapstick". A troupe typically consisted of 13 to 14 members. Most actors were paid by taking a share of the play's profits roughly equivalent to the size of their role. The style of theatre was in its peak from 1575 to 1650, but even after that time new scenarios were written and performed. The Venetian playwright Carlo Goldoni wrote a few scenarios starting in 1734, but since he considered the genre too vulgar, he refined the topics of his own to be more sophisticated. He also wrote several plays based on real events, in which he included commedia characters.

During its Golden Age, roughly from 1590 to 1681,^[43] Spain saw a monumental increase in the production of live theatre as well as the importance of theatre within Spanish society. It was an accessible art form for all participants in Renaissance Spain, being both highly sponsored by the aristocratic class and highly attended by the lower classes.^[44] The volume and variety of Spanish plays during the Golden Age was unprecedented in the history of world theatre, surpassing, for example, the dramatic production of the English Renaissance by a factor of at least four.^{[43][44][45]} Although this volume has been as much a source of criticism as praise for Spanish Golden Age theatre, for emphasizing quantity before quality,^[46] a large number of the 10,000^[44] to 30,000^[46] plays of this period are still considered masterpieces. Major artists of the period included Lope de Vega, a contemporary of Shakespeare, often, and contemporaneously, seen his parallel for the Spanish stage,^[49] and Calderon de la Barca, inventor of the zarzuela^[50] and Lope's successor as the preeminent Spanish dramatist.^[51] Gil Vicente, Lope de Rueda, and Juan del Encina helped to establish the foundations of Spanish theatre in the mid-sixteenth centuries,^{[52][53][54]} while Francisco de Rojas Zorrilla and Tirso de Molina made significant contributions in the later half of the Golden Age.^{[55][56]} Important performers included Lope de Rueda (previously mentioned among the playwrights) and later Juan Rana.^{[57][58]}

The sources of influence for the emerging national theatre of Spain were as diverse as the theatre that nation ended up producing. Storytelling traditions originating in Italian Commedia dell'arte^[59] and the uniquely Spanish expression of Western Europe's traveling minstrel entertainments^{[60][61]} contributed a populist influence on the narratives and the music, respectively, of early Spanish theatre. Neo-Aristotelian criticism and liturgical dramas, on the other hand, contributed literary and moralistic perspectives.^{[62][63]} In turn, Spanish Golden Age theatre has dramatically influenced the theatre of later generations in Europe and throughout the world. Spanish drama had an immediate and significant impact on the contemporary developments in English Renaissance theatre.^[47] It has also had a lasting impact on theatre throughout the Spanish speaking world.^[64] Additionally, a growing number of works are being translated, increasing the reach of Spanish Golden Age theatre and strengthening its reputation among critics and theatre patrons.^[65]

Renaissance theatre derived from several medieval theatre traditions, such as the mystery plays that formed a part of religious festivals in England and other parts of Europe during the Middle Ages. Other sources include the "morality plays" and the "University drama" that attempted to recreate Athenian tragedy. The Italian tradition of Commedia dell'arte, as well as the elaborate masques frequently presented at court, also contributed to the shaping of public theatre. Since before the reign of Elizabeth I, companies of players were attached to households of leading aristocrats and performed seasonally in various locations. These became the foundation for the professional players that performed on the Elizabethan stage. The tours of these players gradually replaced the performances of the mystery and morality plays by local players, and a 1572 law eliminated the remaining companies lacking formal patronage by labelling them vagabonds. The City of London authorities were generally hostile to public performances, but its hostility was overmatched by the Queen's taste for plays and the Privy Council's support. Theatres sprang up in suburbs, especially in the liberty of Southwark, accessible across the Thames to city dwellers but beyond the authority's control. The companies maintained the pretence that their public performances were mere rehearsals for the frequent performances before the Queen, but while the latter did grant prestige, the former were the real source of the income for the professional players. Along with the economics of the profession, the character of the drama changed toward the end of the period. Under Elizabeth, the drama was a unified expression as far as social class was concerned: the Court watched the same plays the commoners saw in the public playhouses. With the development of the private theatres, drama became more oriented toward the tastes and values of an upper-class audience. By the later part of the reign of Charles I, few new plays were being written for the public theatres, which sustained themselves on the accumulated works of the previous decades.^[66]

Puritan opposition to the stage (informed by the arguments of the early Church Fathers who had written screeds against the decadent and violent entertainments of the Romans) argued not only that the stage in general was pagan, but that any play that represented a religious figure was inherently idolatrous. In 1642, at the outbreak of the English Civil War, the Protestant authorities banned the performance of all plays within the city limits of London. A sweeping assault against the alleged immoralities of the theatre crushed whatever remained in England of the dramatic tradition. After public stage performances had been banned for 18 years by the Puritan regime, the re-opening of the theatres in 1660 signaled a renaissance of English drama. With the restoration of the monarch in 1660 came the restoration of the and the reopening of the theatre. English comedies written and performed in the Restoration period from 1660 to 1710 are collectively called "Restoration comedy". Restoration comedy is notorious for its sexual explicitness, a quality encouraged by Charles II (1660–1685) personally and by the rakish aristocratic ethos of his court. At this point in history, women were allowed to play the parts of women and not men as was the case. socially diverse audiences included both aristocrats, their servants and hangers-on, and a substantial middle-class segment. Restoration audiences liked to see good triumph in their tragedies and rightful government restored. In comedy they liked to see the love-lives of the young and fashionable, with a central couple bringing their courtship to a successful conclusion (often overcoming the opposition of the elders to do so). Heroines had to be chaste, but were independent-minded and outspoken; now that they were played by women, there was more mileage for the playwright in disguising them in men's clothes or giving them narrow escape from rape. These playgoers were attracted to the comedies by up-to-the-minute topical writing, by crowded and bustling plots, by the introduction of the first professional actresses, and by the rise of the first celebrity actors. To non-theatre-goers these comedies were widely seen as licentious and morally suspect, holding up the antics of a small, privileged, and decadent class for admiration. This same class dominated the audiences of the Restoration theatre. This period saw the first professional woman playwright, Aphra Behn. As a reaction to the decadence of Charles II era productions, sentimental comedy grew in popularity. This genre focused on encouraging virtuous behavior by showing middle class characters overcoming a series of moral trials. Playwrights like Colley Cibber and Richard Steele believed that humans were inherently good but capable of being led astray. Through plays such as The Conscious Lovers and Love's Last Shift they strove to appeal to an audience's noble sentiments in order that viewers could be reformed.^{[67][68]}

The Restoration spectacular, or elaborately staged "machine play", hit the London public stage in the late 17th-century Restoration period, enthralling audiences with action, music, dance, moveable scenery, baroque illusionistic painting, gorgeous costumes, and special effects such as trapdoor tricks, "flying" actors, and fireworks. These shows have always had a bad reputation as a vulgar and commercial threat to the witty, "legitimate" Restoration drama; however, they drew Londoners in unprecedented numbers and left them dazzled and delighted. Basically home-grown and with roots in the early 17th-century court masque, though never ashamed of borrowing ideas and stage technology from French opera, the spectaculars are sometimes called "English opera". However, the variety of them is so untidy that most theatre historians despair of defining them as a genre at all. Only a handful of works of this period are usually accorded the term "opera", as the musical dimension of most of them is subordinate to the visual. It was spectacle and scenery that drew in the crowds, as shown by many comments in the diary of the theatre-lover Samuel Pepys. The expense of mounting ever more elaborate scenic productions drove the two competing theatre companies into a dangerous spiral of huge expenditure and correspondingly huge losses or profits. A fiasco such as John Dryden's Albion and Albanus would leave a company in serious debt, while blockbusters like Thomas Shadwell's Psyche or Dryden's King Arthur would put it comfortably in the black for a long time. Neoclassicism was the dominant form of theatre in the 18th century. It demanded decorum and rigorous adherence to the classical unities. Neoclassical theatre as well as the time period is characterized by its grandiosity. The costumes and scenery were intricate and elaborate. The acting is characterized by large gestures and melodrama. Neoclassical theatre encompasses the Restoration, Augustan, and Johnstian Ages. In one sense, the neo-classical age directly follows the time of the Renaissance. Theatres of the early 18th century – sexual farces of the Restoration were superseded by politically satirical comedies, 1737 Parliament passed the Stage Licensing Act which introduced state censorship of public performances and limited the number of theatres in London to two.

Theatre in the 19th century is divided into two parts: early and late. The early period was dominated by melodrama and Romanticism. Beginning in France, melodrama became the most popular theatrical form. August von Kotzebue's Misanthropy and Repentance (1789) is often considered the first melodramatic play. The plays of Kotzebue and René Charles Guilbert de Pixérécourt established melodrama as the dominant dramatic form of the early 19th century.^[72] In Germany, there was a trend toward historic accuracy in costumes and settings, a revolution in theatre architecture, and the introduction of the theatrical form of German Romanticism. Influenced by trends in 19th-century philosophy and the visual arts, German writers were increasingly fascinated with their Teutonic past and had a growing sense of nationalism. The plays of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, and other Sturm und Drang playwrights, inspired a growing faith in feeling and instinct as guides to moral behavior.

In Britain, Percy Bysshe Shelley and Lord Byron were the most important dramatists of their time (although Shelley's plays were not performed until later in the century). In the minor theatres, burletta and melodrama were the most popular. Kotzebue's plays were translated into English and Thomas Holcroft's A Tale of Mystery was the first of many English melodramas. Pierce Egan, Douglas William Jerrold, Edward Fitzball, and John Baldwin Buckstone initiated a trend towards more contemporary and rural stories in preference to the usual historical or fantastical melodramas. James Sheridan Knowles and Edward George Bulwer-Lytton established a "gentlemanly" drama that began to re-establish the former prestige of the theatre with the aristocracy.^[73] The later period of the 19th century saw the rise of two conflicting types of drama: realism and non-realism, such as Symbolism and precursors of Expressionism. Realism began earlier in the 19th century in Russia than elsewhere in Europe and took a more uncompromising form.^[74] Beginning with the plays of Ivan Turgenev (who used "domestic detail to reveal inner turmoil"), Aleksandr Ostrovsky (who was Russia's first professional playwright), Aleksey Pisemsky (whose A Bitter Fate (1859) anticipated Naturalism), and Leo Tolstoy (whose The Power of Darkness (1886) is "one of the most effective of naturalistic plays"), a tradition of psychological realism in Russia culminated with the establishment of the Moscow Art Theatre by Konstantin Stanislavski and Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko.^[75]

The most important theatrical force in later 19th-century Germany was that of Georg II, Duke of Saxe-Meiningen and his Meiningen Ensemble, under the direction of Ludwig Chronegk. The Ensemble's productions are often considered the most historically accurate of the 19th century, although his primary goal was to serve the interests of the playwright. The Meiningen Ensemble stands at the beginning of the new movement toward unified production (or what Richard Wagner would call the Gesamtkunstwerk) and the rise of the director (at the expense of the actor) as the dominant artist in theatre-making.^[76] Naturalism, a theatrical movement born out of Charles Darwin's The Origin of Species (1859) and contemporary political and economic conditions, found its main proponent in Émile Zola. The realisation of Zola's ideas was hindered by a lack of capable dramatists writing naturalist drama. André Antoine emerged in the 1880s with his Théâtre Libre that was only open to members and therefore was exempt from censorship. He quickly won the approval of Zola and began to stage Naturalistic works and other foreign realistic pieces.^[77]

In Britain, melodramas, light comedies, operas, Shakespeare and classic English drama, Victorian burlesque, pantomimes, translations of French farces and, from the 1860s, French operettas, continued to be popular. So successful were the comic operas of Gilbert and Sullivan, such as H.M.S. Pinafore (1878) and The Mikado (1885), that they greatly expanded the audience for musical theatre.^[78] This, together with much improved street lighting and transportation in London and New York led to a late Victorian and Edwardian theatre building boom in the West End and on Broadway. Later, the work of Henry Arthur Jones and Arthur Wing Pinero initiated a new direction on the English stage. While their work paved the way, the development of more significant drama owes itself most to the playwright Henrik Ibsen. Ibsen was born in Norway in 1828. He wrote twenty-five plays, the most famous of which are A Doll's House (1879), Ghosts (1881), The Wild Duck (1884), and Hedda Gabler (1890). In addition, his works Rosmersholm (1886) and When We Dead Awaken (1899) evoke a sense of mysterious forces at work in human destiny, which was to be a major theme of symbolism and the so-called "Theatre of the Absurd". After Ibsen, British theatre experienced revitalization with the work of George Bernard Shaw, Oscar Wilde, John Galsworthy, William Butler Yeats, and Harley Granville Barker. Unlike most of the gloomy and intensely serious work of their contemporaries, Shaw and Wilde wrote primarily in the comic form. Edwardian musical comedies were extremely popular, appealing to the tastes of the middle class in the Gay Nineties^[79] and catering to the public's preference for escapist entertainment during World War I.

While much 20th-century theatre continued and extended the projects of realism and Naturalism, there was also a great deal of experimental theatre that rejected those conventions. These experiments form part of the modernist and postmodernist movements and included forms of political theatre as well as more aesthetically orientated work. Examples include: Epic theatre, the Theatre of Cruelty, and the so-called "Theatre of the Absurd". The term theatre practitioner came to be used to describe someone who both creates theatrical performances and who produces a theoretical discourse that informs their practical work.^[80] A theatre practitioner may be a director, a dramatist, an actor, or—characteristically—often a combination of these traditionally separate roles. "Theatre practice" describes the collective work that various theatre practitioners do.^[81] It is used to describe theatre praxis from Konstantin Stanislavski's development of his 'system', through Vsevolod Meyerhold's biomechanics, Bertolt Brecht's epic and Jerzy Grotowski's poor theatre, down to the present day, with contemporary theatre practitioners including Augusto Boal with his Theatre of the Oppressed, Dario Fo's popular theatre, Eugenio Barba's theatre anthropology and Anne Bogart's viewpoints.^[82] Other key figures of 20th-century theatre include: Antonin Artaud, August Strindberg, Anton Chekhov, Frank Wedekind, Maurice Maeterlinck, Federico García Lorca, Eugene O'Neill, Luigi Pirandello, George Bernard Shaw, Gertrude Stein, Ernst Toller, Vladimir Mayakovsky, Arthur Miller, Tennessee Williams, Jean Genet, Eugène Ionesco, Samuel Beckett, Harold Pinter, Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Heiner Müller, and Caryl Churchill. A number of aesthetic movements continued or emerged in the 20th century, including: Naturalism, Realism, Dadaism, Expressionism, Surrealism and the Theatre of Cruelty, Theatre of the Absurd, Postmodernism. After the great popularity of the British Edwardian musical comedies, the American musical theatre came to dominate the musical stage, beginning with the Princess Theatre musicals, followed by the works of the Gershwin brothers, Cole Porter, Jerome Kern, Rodgers and Hart, and later Rodgers and Hammerstein. This is the century I love most and I have expanded on this in my book, although I prefer to define the century of the modern theater from the last decades of the 19th century to the last decades of the 20th century, thus adding to this list Henrik Ibsen, Oscar Wilde, etc.

4.7 CORY'S FAMILY ON STAGE

Finally, in a much lighter tone a few words on the theatrical talents in our family. Although I enjoy most reading and seeing plays and films, and my first work was a five acts classical play, I never learned acting and never played professionally. I mentioned earlier that I didn't want to become a metalworker when I learned at the primary school. But at the end of the eighth year when we finished school I was given the leading role, not because I was very popular, being called a dissident and treated as in Soviet Union accordingly – I was not sent to Siberia but my relations with the teachers and pupils were frozen nevertheless, but because I could learn by heart all the role and not get confused with the hard words. However, the animosity was so great that a week before the premiere, they took from me the leading role and gave it to another pupil who, to say the least was not very erudite. He tried very hard to pronounce the words correctly but time and again when he had to say: "when I was a baby I sang so well that they thought that I'll be a tenor", he kept saying tanour instead of tenor. In Hebrew, if you don't write down the vowels you can say tanour instead of tenor, with two caveats – he never heard before the word tenor, and it goes without saying that he never heard an opera, and tanour means oven in Hebrew. So, they had quite a problem and on the opening night they gave me back my role in order to save the school being the laughter of all our village. The headmaster has invited the class of the "sabras"/Israeli borns of the other school to see our play, and it was the first time that I saw the guys (and dolls) who were to be my best friends in the two first years of high school. They invited us to watch their play – The Snow Queen, which was based on the music of Grieg and Peer Gynt. When I saw their play it was for me a revelation – it was the first time that I have ever heard classical music, furthermore, not counting the first play that I saw in Cairo – L'Aiglon by Rostand, I have never seen other plays not in Cairo nor in my Israeli village, and this time I saw a normal play (not the ridiculous caricature in which I played). I thought with envy that this was to be my future – hear classical music (which I started seriously to like only four years later) and going to the theater which I started to see only a couple of years later when we moved to Haifa. So, those were my first experiences in music, plays and musicals.

I have already mentioned that one of the plays I like the most is The Threepenny Opera, I have seen it several times on stage and in films (including Pabs' film of 1931 and the play in Berlin). In one of those times, we sat on the first row, as I like to be within a spitting distance of the actors. Before the show the actors came to me and asked me if I would like to be the priest who marries Polly Peachum to Mack the Knife. I agreed although my wife was afraid that I would do a "fadiha"/Arab word for blunder. The play begins and the actors say – "well, we have a problem, the priest has not come today and we have to marry Polly and Mack, otherwise we cannot continue with the play, who wants to be a volunteer?" They come to me and I agree, they give me a priest dress and I start to marry the actors, but I decided to make fun of them, so I asked them all kinds of personal questions, I asked for a bribe, I wanted to kiss first the bride and so on. The public was hilarious, they thought that it was part of the play, the actors were confused (they never experienced such a thing before with the other volunteers), Ruthy was flabbergasted. Finally I pitied them and returned to my place with an applause of several minutes. The actors were finally delighted and told me in the intermission that all the other priests stood there like dummies, and they asked me where have I studied acting. It was my first and last experience in acting, and luckily it was in one of the plays/musicals I love most.

I forgot to mention that until the age of fifty I had stage fright, never gave a lecture, and even when I had to greet an employee for his birthday in a reunion I was covered by cold sweat. When I organized for my wife a surprise party with a one hour show I had to ask a friend to be a conferencier as I was afraid to speak in public even before my friends. All that disappeared after 1994, after the traumatic experience of losing all my savings by a fraud conceived by my best friends. After they tried to intimidate me with threats on my life, flat tyres, detectives, tapping, etc., I lost all shame, had the courage to fight back all the crooks and the tycoons who stood behind them, wrote a play, a novel. I wrote a PhD dissertation, academic books, articles, giving courses at seven universities in Israel and abroad, elected as the best professor, giving lectures to the most sophisticated forums before audiences of more than a hundred persons, without one blunder, without stage fright, with a full confidence in my abilities, knowing exactly what I was going to say in Hebrew, English or French, enthusiasming my public, feeling perfectly well. I leave for the psychologists to explain how it happened, but it is a fact, and it changed my life from one end to the other, a positive change that made me a better man, so this "rabbegeld"/in Yiddish learning fee was worthwhile paying, as ultimately I earned three times more than what I have lost, accomplished in my life (in extremis) achievements that I never thought I was able to achieve, while keeping excellent ties with my family, wife and children, and starting new connections with excellent friends much better and loyal than the previous ones.

My children didn't suffer from any such inhibitions, Joseph addresses large audiences naturally and is known as one of the best professors and lecturers, Amir addresses throughout the US in English business audiences with perfect confidence, and Shirly teaches the technology in which she excels to professionals all over the country. It all started presumably when Joseph was the playwright and director for his high school final play and Amir did the same but also act in the leading role. Both plays were very successful and the Corys brothers got quite a renown in the school in which both of them studied for 12 years. Shirly had a problem as she was measured from the beginning according to the renown of her brothers and she had to pave for her her own path. She was an excellent student like her brothers and very active socially like them, but when she was about to finish school she didn't want to direct or write the final play. Another student did it quite successfully and Shirly choreographed and danced a dance of 15 minutes which was to conclude the evening. Mann tracht und Gott lach/I'homme propose et Dieu dispose – fate or God decided otherwise. The headmaster who heard that the play made laugh of him and the teachers wanted to see the script, the students refused to comply and so the play was not shown, to the scandal of all concerned, as it was the first time in the almost hundred years of the school that the students didn't stage a play. On the last moment the headmaster came to Shirly and asked her to perform her dance with her friends instead of the play. Shirly asked her friends and when they agreed she agreed also, and thus, the tradition was kept and the three Corys staged the final show of school. Shirly thought that she should persevere in dancing, trying to dance on Broadway, but luckily she chose to study computers, and she/her bank account don't regret it.

Although I am not an actor, the reader can learn from this book how I am an an eager reader of plays, of watching plays on stage, on TV, and on DVD, and especially how the first book that I have ever written was a play "Nelly Doron", written at the advanced age of 50+. If my aunt started to paint excellent impressionistic paintings at the age of 80+, I can say that in our family we surprise ourselves with talents that are discovered when we are old, like good wine that improves over the years. I despise the companies that fire employees at the age of 50 because they are "too old", while nowadays 50 is prime age, when I started to write academic books, a novel and a play, at the age of 60 I started a very rewarding teaching career at several universities, at the age of 70 my in-law received a Nobel Prize and since then he is travelling all over the world lecturing and meeting personalities, at the age of 80+ Shimon Peres was elected President of Israel and worked around the clock successfully, at the age of 90+ our former President Yitzhak Navon lectured and travelled, and even wrote an excellent autobiography, and finally at the age of 100+ my uncle (the husband of the "painter") had a fantastic memory and I consulted him often on the history of our family. So, we continue to play on the stage of life!

5.1 BEST SHOWS AND CONCERTS THAT I HAVE EVER SEEN, GRACIAS A LA VIDA

I have read dozens of books on music – classical, folk, jazz, opera, composers, etc., I have prepared an audio play comprising music and songs in 4 hours, 38 minutes, I have chosen music and songs of 1 hour and 30 minutes for my play "Nelly Doron", and have a collection of hundreds of records, tapes, CDs, and videos on music. I have watched concerts and shows worldwide. The most remarkable were as follows: on a winter night at a small community center in Haifa, with a public of a few dozens, I was moved to tears at the performance of the two best Israeli Folk singers – Shuli Natan and Nehama Hendel. It is amazing how people spend hundreds or even thousands of dollars to see extravagant singers in huge stadiums, while two folk singers achieved perfection, with a divine inspiration all around. It was like going to heaven – impeccable voices, best songs, moving lyrics and music, top performers, and so few people who really appreciated it. I like most folk music – country, fado, tango, sambas, mariachis, Russian folklore, Napolitan songs, rembetiko, flamenco, and of course Israeli folklore which was influenced by tens of countries, including its Arab neighbors. I have seen the heroine of my youth Joan Baez, by far the best singer, at Carnegie Hall in New York, with the best English and Spanish folk songs of the century. Years have passed by and she hasn't changed, still lovely and singing directly to the heart of her audience. A special place in my heart belongs to Sephardic music which has become very trendy, with the romances sung by the best folk singers. The best show was the Sephardic Romancero by Itzhak Navon, later to become the 5th Israeli president. <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nkUbaHbS9YA>. I was born in Egypt, but I have nothing in common with the local music, as I was raised with love to my Sephardic/Spanish heritage.

And beyond the Sephardic folklore, with songs like Adio, Arvoles, La ija de la vizina, Avram Avinu, etc., comes of course the Spanish folklore, the flamenco, the Greek folklore from the rembetiko to Yorgos Dalaras and Nana Mouskouri. I had the privilege to hear Dalaras, the best singer of Greece (my mother's origin) at the premier of his new show in the front row of a night club in Plaka, Athens, in 2000, where I was invited by my friend Georg Heine, a personal friend of Dalaras. This was one of the best performances I ever saw, for more than three hours, with the best audience one can think of, warm, enthusiastic, loving Dalaras and he loved them in return. I experienced a similar enthusiasm only in the seventies at a performance of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band from New Orleans in New York. Everybody danced in the aisles, the most sweeping performance of old people performing like teen agers. Other remarkable performances that I saw where Marlene Dietrich in Israel in 1960 at the Tamar Cinema in Haifa, just close to my home, an amazing experience for a young boy of 16. Gilbert Becaud and Charles Aznavour, the two best French performers, that I had the privilege to hear in the first rows, two legends, Becaud was Monsieur 100,000 volts and Aznavour was France's troubadour, still yong, touching my innermost soul. And there were many others – Haris Alexiou, Yehoram Gaon, Harry Belafonte, Georges Moustaki, Guy Beart, Yehuda Poliker, Arik Lavie, Yossi Banai, Moti Giladi, Hagashash Hahiver (the funniest trio I has ever seen), and the best of American Country music at Page in 1996, just after seeing the best site in the world – the Grand Canyon, in a concert with a public of 5 people, less than the number of artists, an excellent country group, a perfect performance, professional like only American performers can be, not being abashed by the ridiculous number of spectators, on the contrary being grateful that they came and giving them the best they had with all their heart.

And finally, the folk music I like most, the Latin American – Mexican, Peruvian, Argentinian, Brazilian, Paraguayan, and especially – Los Paraguayos with their moving performance of songs like Malagueña, Pepita, Paloma, el Condor, etc., and last but not least – the best of all – Mercedes Sosa, with her unforgettable song Gracias a la vida, my most favorite song, Violeta Parra's unique song. How a woman who had such a tragic life could write such an optimistic song, with such love to her beloved, who was everything to her – who was the purpose of her life, of her sight, her hearing, her ability to walk, her laughter and her longing... I even wrote a song to my wife, based on Parra's song, and adapting it to our life as a couple. I like simple and genuine songs and poetry, like the poems by Jacques Prevert, Paul Galdy, Zvi Aviel, I identify myself with Parra's song and my eyes too can perfectly distinguish black from white – perfecto distingo lo negro del blanco. In my world of ethics, there are the ethical people and the corrupted, and I deny that everything is in the grey area, as most of the corrupt maintain. They say that everybody has a price and nobody can claim that he behaved ethically throughout his entire career. Therefore, we are all corrupt, some people more and some people less, and there is no point in pursuing the corrupt, as the nature of man is bad. My point of view is completely opposite, even if occasionally people have behaved unethically what counts is how they behaved most of the time and what were the unethical deeds that they made. I tell my students, that a driver who drives 120 kms per hour, is breaking the law, but one thing is if he does it on the highway without any car in sight, and another thing is if he does it within the city's limit and kills an old woman. There is white and there is black, there is good and there is bad – cuando miro al bueno tan lejos del malo – and the distance between good and bad is immense, that is what comes out in my dozens of cases based on true events, that is what I have experienced in my career and my personal life, and the purpose of life should be to do good, to love not only your soulmate but your colleagues in academia and business, without cut throat competition, without street fighter mentality, with cooperation, collaboration, compassion, congeniality, congruity, and harmony.

I do not appreciate too much "academic" writing, where you restrict every sentence with ten footnotes, you base every thought on ten quotes, you are afraid to write what you think as you wouldn't sound "academic" enough, objective enough. You prefer to be precisely wrong than approximately right. I was very lucky to write my dissertation for a Jury who pardoned me for not being too academic, as I was most of my life a businessman and not a professor. They saw the intrinsic value of my ideas that were revolutionary, pioneering, the first dissertation on ethics to minority shareholders, based on experience and research, quoting my colleagues, but even more playwrights, novelists, poets, plays and films. I tried to write several times an academic paper, knowing that it takes sometimes a year or two to overcome all the hurdles of the professional academic publications. In twelve years I wrote ten books – academic books published by the best academic publishers in France, United States and Israel, a novel, a play... and when I saw that I have problems in publishing my ideas I published them in a self published eBook that was accepted by universities and organizations, I wrote dozens of articles that were published by news websites, organizations, and I gathered all of them on my website, where one could read in hundreds of hours my writings, hear my lectures, examine my courses, the lists of the films on business ethics, academic, political, historical, and personal material, and so on.

Gracias a La Vida (Thank you to Life)

Poem by Violeta Parra

English translation by William Morín

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.

Me dió dos luceros, que cuando los abro.

Perfecto distingo lo negro del blanco

Y en el alto cielo su fondo estrellado,

Y en las multitudes

el hombre que yo amo.

Thank you to life, which has given me so much.

It gave me two beams of light, that when opened,

Can perfectly distinguish black from white

And in the sky above, her starry backdrop,

And from within the multitude

The one that I love.

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.

Me ha dado el oído que en todo su ancho

Graba noche y día grillos y canarios

Martillos, turbinas, ladrillos, chubascos

Y la voz tan tierna de mi bien amado.

Thank you to life, which has given me so much.

It gave me an ear that, in all of its width

Records— night and day— crickets and canaries,

Hammers and turbines and bricks and storms,

And the tender voice of my beloved.

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.

Me ha dado el sonido y el abecedario.

Con él las palabras que pienso y declaro,

“Madre,” “amigo,” “hermano,” y luz alumbrando

La ruta del alma del que estoy amando.

Thank you to life, which has given me so much.

It gave me sound and the alphabet.

With them the words that I think and declare:

“Mother,” “Friend,” “Brother” and the light shining.

The route of the soul from which comes love.

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.

Me ha dado la marcha de mis pies cansados.

Con ellos anduve ciudades y charcos,

Valles y desiertos, montañas y llanos,

Y la casa tuya, tu calle y tu patio.

Thank you to life, which has given me so much.

It gave me the ability to walk with my tired feet.

With them I have traversed cities and puddles

Valleys and deserts, mountains and plains.

And your house, your street and your patio.

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.	Thank you to life, which has given me so much.
Me dió el corazón, que agita su marco.	It gave me a heart, that causes my frame to shudder,
Cuando miro el fruto del cerebro humano,	When I see the fruit of the human brain,
Cuando miro al bueno tan lejos del malo.	When I see good so far from bad,
Cuando miro el fondo de tus ojos claros.	When I see within the clarity of your eyes...

Gracias a la vida, que me ha dado tanto.	Thank you to life, which has given me so much.
Me ha dado la risa, me ha dado el llanto.	It gave me laughter and it gave me longing.
Así yo distingo dicha de quebranto,	With them I distinguish happiness and pain—
Los dos materiales que forman mi canto,	The two materials from which my songs are formed,
Y el canto de ustedes que es el mismo canto.	And your song, as well, which is the same song.
Y el canto de todos que es mi propio canto	And everyone's song, which is my very song.

5.2 CLASSICAL MUSIC – THE BEGINNING OF A BEAUTIFUL FRIENDSHIP

I love most plays and theater, this is an unconditional love, and the first literature that I have written was a five acts play in a classical format. My earliest memory was a performance of the 6 acts play L'Aiglon, and I read at home all the plays by Racine, Corneille and the classics. I came to love classical music through a rational choice, not through the heart as plays but through my head. I wrote in my Diary how I started hearing classical music and we can follow this process - I didn't hear at home classical music and never went to a concert until the age of 17. I read classical literature since an early childhood and at the age of 17 I felt the urge to hear only classical music – somehow, I thought that to complement my readings of Moliere, Lamartine, Musset, Racine, Cervantes, Shakespeare, and of course my favorite writers Zola, Hugo and Dumas, I should hear also classical music. I was sick and tired of the rock music of 1961 (!) with all the noise and shout, and possibly because I was disappointed by the fact that I was not invited to the rock parties and wanted to differentiate myself from my friends (always the conscious and unconscious reasons), I decided that from now on I would hear only classical music. As usual, I prepared myself thoroughly, reading everything about the 100 best composers, the 100 best operas, the 100 best concerts, symphonies, and so on and jumped into the cold water. After reading the 100 best operas book I made a quiz, guessing the names of the Operas' composers – the first time I knew 76, the second time – 97, and the third time – all of them. On the same day of the decision I read Moliere's Les femmes savantes, the best comedy that I have read (by then).

I started to go to concerts, to see films with ballets (The Royal Ballet with Swan Lake, The Firebird and Ondine), to hear on the radio classical music, and I started to like it, first of all with Beethoven Fifth, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Carmen and Mozart, and later on with Mahler symphonies, Debussy, Rigoletto, Brecht/Weill, Gounod, Beethoven's Ninth, and Bach. Friends and family who didn't know what to do with their old classical records gave them to me and I heard Yascha Heifetz, Arturo Toscanini, Rudolf Serkin, Eugene Ormandy, conducting Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, Beethoven's first, Spring Sonata, 1812 by Tchaikovsky, Saint Saens, etc. I even organized a trip with two friends to the Ein Gev Festival at Lake Tiberias where we saw Isaac Stern playing the Violin Concerti of Mendelssohn and Beethoven at the same concert. This was a revelation, until now I saw concerts with second rate musicians as I couldn't afford to go to the best concerts, and heard good conductors in very old records. For the first time in my life I saw the best violonist playing the best concerti with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. I felt elated, and didn't notice how the time flies in this 3 hour concert, by the Lake Tiberias.

There was only a slight problem, the concert ended at midnight, there were no more buses at this hour, and we couldn't afford to pay for a hotel. So, we got into the bus of the Philharmonic Orchestra (I wrote - "they were really unpleasant, they played cards all the time, smoke a lot, didn't open windows, this was a nightmare"). The bus brought us at 2.30 am to Tel Aviv, 100 kms from home in Haifa. But this was not the end of our ordeal, the bus driver noticed us when all the others left and threatened to take us to the police. I told him that this was a good idea as the police will take us home to Haifa and wouldn't arrest music loving youngsters who were invited by the musicians to join their bus. The bus driver took us to the Central Bus station, but as it was too early to take a bus to Haifa we hitch-hiked and arrived at home at six o'clock in the morning. I was tired as never before, but this was for me a founding experience. An everlasting pact was signed with the classical music, and from now on we would never part. Well, speaking of ordeals, I experienced another one – once at the Sorbonne's courtyard, when I was on visit to Paris for my PhD, I went to see a 3-hour modern play, and in the middle of the performance it started to rain – most of the students left, but I with a few others remained to the end, as I rationalized that if the actors got soaked I couldn't afford to leave them alone.

I love Jazz music and go to Jazz performances in Israel and abroad, I have many jazz records and like most New Orleans jazz and cool jazz. My favorite performers are/were: Louis Armstrong, Ella Fitzgerald, Ray Charles, Mahalia Jackson, Duke Ellington, Thelonious Monk, Chick Corea, Bessie Smith, B. B. King, Bennie Goodman, Dizzy Gillespie, Miles Davis, Sidney Bechet, Charlie Parker, Stan Getz, Kenny Clarke, Lionel Hampton, Charles Mingus, Jimi Hendrix, Count Basie... But in Jazz like in classical music, opera, history, poetry, philosophy, geography, travel, and art, I perceive myself as a dilettante, as my expertise is mainly in plays, films, linguistics, novels, biographies, ethics, folk songs, and in business – M&A, turnarounds, know-how transfer, business plans, international business, finance, strategic planning, sales, teaching and writing.

5.4 BEST CLASSICAL MUSIC/OPERA THAT I HAVE EVER WATCHED, HEARD, READ

I have to confess that I have seen a very limited number of operas in my whole life and my knowledge in this field derives mainly from reading, watching videos and TV, and hearing records. When I was a young officer in Tel Aviv in the sixties the opera which had a very limited audience opened its doors gratis to soldiers, and that is how I watched for the first time in my life operas. I see occasionally operas mainly in London, Paris and New York, and rarely in Israel, but due to the exorbitant prices I prefer to go to the theater which I enjoy more. So, the best operas are (with a V for the operas that I have seen on stage): The abduction from the Seraglio – Mozart - V, Aida – Verdi - V, Un ballo in maschera & Nabucco – Verdi, Il barbiere di Siviglia – Rossini - V, Die Fledermaus – Strauss - V, La Boheme – Puccini - V, Carmen – Bizet - V (my most preferred), Cavalleria Rusticana – Mascagni - V, Les contes d'Hoffmann – Offenbach - V, Così fan tutte – Mozart – V, Don Giovanni – Mozart – V, Eugene Onegin – Tchaikovsky, Falstaff – Verdi, Faust – Gounod – V, Fidelio – Beethoven, La forza del destino – Verdi, Guillaume Tell – Rossini, Hansel und Gretel – Humperdinck, Lakme – Delibes, Madama Butterfly – Puccini, The Magic flute/Die Zauberflöte – Mozart – V, The Marriage of Figaro/Le nozze di Figaro – Mozart – V, Otello – Verdi – V, Macbeth – Verdi – V, Pagliacci – Leoncavallo – V, Porgy and Bess – Gershwin – V, Rigoletto – Verdi – V (my most preferred), Romeo and Juliette – Gounod, Der Rosenkavalier – Strauss, Samson et Dalila – Saint Saens, Tosca – Puccini – V, La Traviata – Verdi – V, Tristan und Isolde – Wagner, Il Trovatore – Verdi – V, Turandot – Puccini – V. I don't think that I have seen on stage 72 or even 52 operas, compared to the hundreds or possibly more than a thousand plays that I have seen on stage in Israel, New York, Paris, London, and all over the world, thousands of films, and hundreds of classical concerts.

To this list of operas we can add operas that I have only read about them – L'africaine – Meyerbeer, Alceste – Gluck, Andrea Chenier – Giordano, Ariadne auf Naxos – Richard Strauss, The bartered bride – Smetana, Boris Godounoff – Moussorgsky, La cenerentola and Cinderella by Rossini, The clandestine marriage – Cimarosa, The consul – Menotti, Le coq d'or – Rimsky-Korsakoff, Dido and Aeneas – Purcell, Don Carlos – Verdi, Elektra – Richard Strauss, L'elisir d'amore and Don Pasquale – Donizetti, Ernani – Verdi, La fanciulla del West – Puccini, Operas by Wagner – Der Fliegende Hollander, Lohengrin, Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Parsifal, Tannhauser, The Ring of the Nibelung: Das Rheingold, Die Walkure, Siegfried, Die gotterdammerung. Der Freischutz – Weber, Gianni Schicchi – Puccini, La gioconda – Ponchielli, Giulio Cesare – Handel, L'heure espagnole – Ravel, Les Huguenots – Meyerbeer, Knyaz Igor – Borodin, The Love for Three Oranges – Prokofieff, Lucia di Lammermoor – Donizetti, Manon – Massenet, Manon Lescaut – Puccini, Martha – Flotow, The Medium – Menotti, Mefistofele – Boito, Mignon – Thomas, Norma – Bellini, Oberon – Weber, Orpheus and Eurydice – Gluck, Pelleas et Melisande – Debussy, Peter Grimes – Britten, I puritani – Bellini, Salome – Richard Strauss, Il segreto di Susanna – Wolf-Ferrari, La serva padrona – Pergolesi, Simon Bocanegra – Verdi, The Telephone – Menotti, Thais – Massenet, Les Troyens – Berlioz, Wozzeck – Berg.

The quite best and best composers and their best works are: Jean-Baptiste Lully – Miserere, Salve regina, Alceste, Armide. Marc-Antoine Charpentier – Te Deum, Assumpta est Maria, Miserere, Action, Medee. Johann Pachelbel – Magnificat, Christ lag in Todesabend, Chacon, Canon and Gigue. Henry Purcell – Dido & Eneas, Come ye sons of art, away, Hail, Bright Cecilia, Hymns, Chacon. Archangelo Corelli – Concerti Grossi opus 6, Violin Sonata opus 5, Trio Sonatas opus 1-4. Francois Couperin– Cembalo works, Concerti, The apotheose of Lully, Lecons des tenebres. Antonio Vivaldi – The Four Seasons, Gloria in re major, Concerto in mi major, L'estro armonico, Magnificat, Stabat Mater, Orlando. Tomaso Albinoni – Adagio in sol minor, 12 Concerti opus 5, Concerti opus 7 and 9, Cliomena. Johann Sebastian Bach – Brandenburg Concerti, Mateus Passion, Violin Concerti, Concerto for two violins, The well tempered clavier, Goldberg Variations, Missa in si minor, Johannes Passion, Magnificat, The Art of Fugue. George Frideric Handel: Messiah, Giulio Cesare, Tamerlano, Rodelinda, Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, Ode for the Birthday of Queen Anne, Acis and Galatea, Hercules, Semele, Water Music, Music for the Royal Fireworks, Concerti Grossi opus 3 and 6, Judas Maccabaeus. Georg Philipp Telemann – Tafelmusik, Violin Concerti, Overture – Suite in sol major, Burlesque Don Quijote, Paris quartets. Jean-Philippe Rameau – Castor et Pollux, Zoroastre, Platee, Nais, Les indes galantes. Domenico Scarlatti – Cembalo Sonates, Salve Regina, Stabat Mater, Tetide in Sciro. Christoph Willibald Gluck – Orpheo and Euridice, Alceste, Iphigenia in Aulis, Iphigenia in Tauris. Franz Joseph Haydn – Symphony no. 94 "Surprise", Symphony no 104 "London", The Creation, Symphonies no. 6, 7, 8, 49, 100, 101, 103. Trumpet Concerto, Cello Concerti, The Seasons, String quartets, "Nelson" mass. Luigi Boccherini – Cello Concerti in sol major and si bemol major, Symphonies in re minor, in la major, in bi bemol major, String quartets in la major, in sol major. Giacomo Meyerbeer – Les patineurs, Robert le diable, Le prophete, L'africaine. As a matter of fact Bach, Handel, and Haydn, are among the composers I like most, and the only reason that I included them in this category is that their music sounds "obsolete". I don't like so much Baroque music (Haydn is perceived more as a composer from the Classical period), but in this category I like most Bach – especially the Brandenburg concerti, the violin concerti, and I enjoyed a London performance of Mateus Passion. I acknowledge his greatness but I am not moved by his music, nor by the music of Handel, Haydn, and least of all the music of Rameau...

The best composers and their best works, which I like most, based on the monumental books The Milton Cross Encyclopedia of the Great Composers and their Music, are: Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart – Symphony no. 41 Jupiter, Don Giovanni, Symphonies no. 25, 29, 38, 39, 40. Piano Concerti no. 19, 20, 27. Sinfonia Concertante for violin and viola, String Quartets, Le nozze di Figaro, Così fan tutte, The Magic Flute, Requiem. The problem with Mozart is that he sounds too ornate, he has not the profoundness of Beethoven, my favorite composer. I love Mozart very much, mainly his symphonies, but after you hear them you forget them soon, they don't succeed in moving you. Mendelssohn is "accused" of being superficial, but for me Mozart is much more superficial. When I saw for the first time The Magic Flute at the Metropolitan Opera in New York (the prices were exorbitant, as we sat in the front rows) I fell asleep, as I found the opera too boring, I was also after a whole day of business meetings and I didn't have the opportunity to rest. However, the second time that I saw the opera, in the least glamorous stage of the Haifa Symphonic Orchestra, I enjoyed it much more, at least I didn't fall asleep, but I think that it cannot compare to operas like Aida, Rigoletto, or Faust, even Le nozze di Figaro and Così fan tutte are much better. Franz Schubert – Symphony no. 9, Die Winterreise, Symphonies no. 5 and 8, Trout quintet Die Forelle, String quartet Death and the Maiden, String quintet in D major, Impromptus, Piano Sonatas in A major & A minor, The beautiful miller's daughter, Songs. It is amazing how excellent composers died so young: Schubert at the age of 31, I like most his 9th Symphony, the Trout quintet Die Forelle – a masterpiece, his chamber music, Mozart at the age of 36, Bizet at the age of 37, Mendelssohn at the age of 38, Chopin at the age of 39...

Ludwig Van Beethoven – Symphony no. 9 in E minor, Appassionata sonata, Piano Concerto no. 5 The Emperor, Symphonies no. 3 Eroica, no. 5, no. 6 Pastoral, no. 7, all the other Symphonies. Piano Concerti no. 1, 2, 3 and 4. Violin Concerto. Violin Sonata no. 9 Kreutzer. String quartets no. 7 and 14. Piano trio The Archduke, Piano Sonata no. 14 Au clair de lune, and no. 32. Missa Solemnis. Beethoven is by far the composer I like most (and it was even before I turned deaf as him...), although I cannot enjoy now classical music because I hear the music distorted in concerts and at home. Beethoven is a genius, his music is divine, I like most Symphony no. 9, but also all his other symphonies and concerti. I like very much his chamber music – and most of all Kreutzer Sonata, that I heard first after reading Tolstoy's novel, his piano sonatas, as a matter of fact, all his works, which move me very much, and give me a sensation of unequalled elation. Niccolò Paganini – 24 Capricci opus 1, Violin Concerti no. 1 and 2, Danse des sorcières. Gioacchino Rossini – Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Overtures Tancredi, La scala di seta, Il signor Bruschino. Operas Guillaume Tell, L'italiana in Algeri, La cenerentola, Mose in Egitto, Semiramide. Felix Mendelssohn – Symphonies no. 4 Italian, no. 3 Scottish, no. 5 The Reformation, Elijah, The Hebrides, Violin Concerto in E minor, A midsummer night's dream, String Octet, Lieder ohne Worte, String Quartet no. 6, Piano Trio no. 1, Auf Flügeln des Gesanges/On wings of song. Hector Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, Harold in Italy, Benvenuto Cellini, Les Troyens, Grande Messe des Morts, La damnation de Faust, Romeo et Juliette. Rossini is excellent, especially Il Barbiere di Siviglia and L'italiana in Algeri, Mendelssohn is one of the composers I like most, especially his Violin Concerto, his Symphonies, chamber music. From Berlioz I like most his Symphonie Fantastique, La damnation de Faust, and Romeo et Juliette. I like most composers from the Romantic-era, especially with the Wikipedia definition, gathering in this category quite all the composers born from 1770 to 1879. Another definition of the musical eras is - Medieval: 476-1400, Renaissance: 1400-1600, Baroque: 1600-1760, Classical era: 1730-1820, Romantic era: 1815-1910, 20th century: 1900-2000, 21st century: since 2000. The composers I like most are German/Austrian, French, Italian, Russian, Spanish.

Charles Gounod – Faust, Mireille, Petite Symphonie, Romeo et Juliette, Ave Maria. What can be better than to watch in Paris a performance of Gounod's Faust, with the music that I know by heart? Méphistophélès appears, provides the crowd with wine, and sings a rousing, irreverent song about the Golden Calf (Le veau d'or). Méphistophélès maligns Marguerite, and Valentin tries to strike him with his sword, which shatters in the air. Valentin and friends use the cross-shaped hilts of their swords to fend off what they now know is an infernal power (chorus: De l'enfer). Marguerite enters, pondering her encounter with Faust at the city gates, and sings a melancholy ballad about the King of Thule (Il était un roi de Thulé). Marthe, Marguerite's neighbour, notices the jewellery and says it must be from an admirer. Marguerite tries on the jewels and is captivated by how they enhance her beauty, as she sings in the famous aria, the Jewel Song (Ah! je ris de me voir si belle en ce miroir). What a sheer delight to hear it on stage! Frederic Chopin – Piano Sonata no. 3, Piano Concerti in mi minor and fa minor, Preludes, Etudes, Balades, Valses, Mazurkas, Polonaises. Robert Schumann – Piano Concerto in la minor, Symphonies no. 1 and 4, Manfred, Cello Concerto, Violin Concerto, Piano Quartet, Piano Quintet, Carnival, Kreisleriana, Fantasia. Franz Liszt – Piano Sonata in si minor, Mazeppa, Rhapsodies hongroises, Rhapsodie espagnole, Valse-impromptu, Mephisto-valse, Liebestraume, Preludes, Lieder, Piano Concerti no. 1 & 2, Poemes Symphoniques, Dante & Faust Symphonies. The Piano Concerti of Chopin, Schumann and Liszt are among the best in all the classical repertoire, and I enjoy very much hearing them at the Concert Hall in Israel and Berlin, at a Schumann Cello Concerto and Symphony concert conducted brilliantly by Daniel Barenboim.

Johann Strauss - Waltzes, Polkas, Marches, Die Fledermaus, Der Zigeunerbaron. I enjoy most watching Strauss' operettas, which are so sparkling, so vivid, so beautiful. Much has been written about the Jewish origins of Mendelssohn, but few people know that Strauss' paternal great-grandfather was a Hungarian Jew – a fact which the Nazis, who lionised Strauss's music as "so German", later tried to conceal. And indeed it is so senseless to try and find clues of his Jewish ancestry in his music. I have written in this book about Jewish composers such as Gershwin and Berlin, who wrote the most American music, and so Mendelssohn was completely German and Strauss completely Austrian. Georges Bizet – Carmen, Symphony in do major, L'arlesienne suites no. 1 and 2, Jeux d'enfants, Les pecheurs de perles, La jolie fille de Perth. It is heartbreaking, and indeed Bizet died from a heart attack, to know that you are a genius, that your works are masterpieces, but the public ignores you totally. That was the fate of Van Gogh, of Bizet and of many others who did not succeed in life but in afterlife. The production of Bizet's final opera, Carmen, was delayed because of fears that its themes of betrayal and murder would offend audiences. After its premiere on 3 March 1875, Bizet was convinced that the work was a failure; he died of a heart attack three months later, unaware that it would prove a spectacular and enduring success. Johannes Brahms – Symphony no. 4, German Requiem, Symphonies no 1 and 3, Piano Concerti no. 1 and 2, Violin Concerto, Double Concerto for Violin and Cello, String Sextets no. 1 and 2, String Quartets no. 1, 2, and 3. Piano Quintet, Clarinet Quintet, Violin Sonatas no. 1-3, Lieder, Song of Destiny. Brahms also was "accused" of having Jewish Origins (Abrahms became Brahms), but Brahms wrote German music which is no less German than Wagner's. Brahms is one of my favorite composers, especially his symphonies and concerti.

Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky – Symphony no. 6 Pathétique, Sleeping Beauty, Symphonies no. 4 and 5, Piano Concerto no. 1, Violin Concerto, Nutcracker, Swans Lake, Romeo and Juliet, String Serenade, Eugene Onegin, Francesca da Rimini, Marche Slave op. 31, 1812 Overture. Giuseppe Verdi – Rigoletto, Otello, La Traviata, Un ballo in maschera, La forza del destino, Don Carlos, Falstaff, Requiem, Nabucco, Aida, Macbeth. Jacques Offenbach – La belle Helene, La vie parisienne, La Grande-Duchesse de Gerolstein, La Perichole, Les contes d'Hoffmann, Ba-ta-clan. The Bataclan is a theatre located at 50 Boulevard Voltaire in the 11th arrondissement of Paris, France. Designed in 1864 by the architect Charles Duval, its name refers to Ba-ta-clan, an operetta by Jacques Offenbach. Since the early 1970s, it has been a "legendary" venue for rock music. On 13 November 2015, 89 people were killed in a coordinated terrorist attack of ISIS in the theatre. Once again Islamic fundamentalists murderers slaughtered innocent people and Western culture. Offenbach, a Jew, one of the pillars of French and European culture was banned by the Nazis, and the theater formerly owned by Jews and named after Offenbach's operetta was chosen as the murder site of Nazis' followers – ISIS, foes of culture, France, Jews and Christians. Tchaikovsky, Verdi, and Offenbach are among my most favorite composers, I did not have the opportunity to watch Eugene Onegin in Saint Petersburg, but I am reading very slowly Pushkin's drama in Russian with an English translation. This is however for me the most difficult work of Tchaikovsky as all the others, and especially his piano and violin concerti, his ballet music, and his brilliant symphonies dissolve in my body as a balmy perfume. I have written in this book much about the operas by Verdi (Rigoletto, La Traviata, Aida, Il Trovatore) and Offenbach (La belle Helene, La vie parisienne), which are among the best I have ever seen and watched.

Camille Saint-Saens – Symphony no. 3, Piano Concerti no. 2 and no. 4, Cello Concerto no. 1, The Carnival of the Animals, Samson and Delilah. Saint-Saens had many merits, he was a Renaissance man, a brilliant composer, conductor and pianist, his piano and cello concerti are excellent, and so are his symphonies, I like very much Samson and Delilah, and of course the Carnival of the animals. One of the first classical music that I have ever heard was Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, which is probably the short music work that I enjoy most. Edvard Grieg – Piano Concerto in la minor, Peer Gynt Suites no. 1 and 2, Holberg Suite, Lyric Suite, Norwegian Melodies. Writing about first impressions from classical music, at the age of 13 I watched for the first time a play The Snow Queen based on Peer Gynt's music by Grieg. It was for me a revelation, all that I aspired was condensed in this marvelous play with this enchanting music performed by my future friends who were to study with me at High School. Since then, every time that I hear Grieg's music I am deeply moved, as for me it symbolizes hope and purity.

Antonin Dvorak – Symphony no. 9 From the New World, Symphonies no. 7 and 8, Cello Concerto, Violin Concerto, Slavonic Dances, String Serenade, String Quartet no. 12, Rusalka. Luckily, not all the best composers are Germans, French or Italian. Grieg is Norwegian, Dvorak is Czech, and Sibelius is Finn. The last symphonies by Dvorak are among the best ever, he has also excellent concerti, chamber music, and dances. Giacomo Puccini – Tosca, Manon Lescaut, La Boheme, Madame Butterfly, La fanciulla del West, Turandot. Puccini, like Verdi and Offenbach, are family to me, although I did not hear classical music in my family, I heard subsequently so much their operas that they became like family for me, like Napolitan and French songs that I heard so often in my family. My brother Haiim was Menelas in Offenbach's La belle Helene at the High School play, I played Rigoletto dozens of times to the young intellectual women whom I invited to my room, and I'll never forget how I watched Turandot at the Sydney Opera with my daughter Shirly. I feel quite estranged when I hear Mahler, Bach, or Brahms, they are definitely not family, although they are among the best composers ever. They don't touch my heart, my soul, as the operas by Offenbach or Verdi, and the music by Grieg and Beethoven. Gustav Mahler – Symphony no. 9, Symphonies no. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Das klagende Lied, Des Knaben Wunderhorn, Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, Das Lied von der Erde, Lieder und Gesänge. Claude Debussy – La mer, Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune, Images, Jeux, String Quartet, Preludes, Suite Bergamasque, Le coin des enfants, Pelleas et Melisande, Nocturnes, L'enfant prodigue, Children's Corner. Jean Sibelius – Symphony no. 5, Symphonies no. 2 and 7, Finlandia, Tapiola, Violin Concerto, String Quartet in re minor. Mahler's and Sibelius' symphonies are divine, the best of the best, so profound, so serious, so tragic, they are called late Romantic, but for me they are modern. Debussy is also modern, but from a different angle, he is impressionistic like Renoir and Monet, his music is like an ocean's foam, light and sparkling.

Manuel de Falla – El amor brujo, El sombrero de tres picos, Noches en los jardines de Espana, Concerto for harpsichord, Siete canciones populares de Espana, El retablo de maese Pedro. Maurice Ravel – Daphnis et Chloe, Piano Concerto in sol major, Piano Concerto for left hand, Rhapsodie espagnole, Bolero, Pavane pour une infante defunte, Gaspard de la nuit. Max Bruch – Violin Concerto no. 1, Violin Concerti no. 2 and 3, Scottish Fantasy, Kol Nidre, Viola and Clarinet Concerto, String Quartet no. 2. Speaking of family, de Falla and Ravel are also family, from my Spanish ancestry and French culture, Max Bruch who was not a Jew but wrote about Jewish subjects as Kol Nidre and Moses Oratorio, is family from my Jewish side. The Kol Nidre's link to a very interesting article on Bruch's Jewish music explains what I maintain all the time, that you don't have to be an African-American in order to compose Gershwin's Porgy and Bess, a Spaniard in order to compose Bizet's Carmen, you can be Jewish as Mendelssohn and Mahler and compose the most German/Austrian music ever, you can be a Russian-born Jew as Irving Berlin and compose the most patriotic and American music. Many of Berlin's songs became popular themes and anthems, including "Easter Parade", "White Christmas", "Happy Holiday", "This Is the Army, Mr. Jones", and "There's No Business Like Show Business". His Broadway musical and 1942 film, This is the Army, with Ronald Reagan, had Kate Smith singing Berlin's "God Bless America" which was first performed in 1938, and God Bless America has become a national anthem of the US. So, I feel very close to de Falla's El amor brujo & Spanish music, Ravel's Bolero and Rhapsodie Espagnole, and Bruch's Violin Concerti and Kol Nidre.

Sergei Prokofiev – Peter and the Wolf, Romeo and Juliet, Lieutenant Kije Suite, Symphony no. 1 Classical, Symphony no. 5, Piano Concerto no. 3, Violin Concerto no. 1, Alexander Nevsky. Sergei Rachmaninov – Piano Concerto no. 2, Symphonies no. 2 and 3, Isle of the Dead, Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini, Piano Concerto no. 3, Symphonic Dances, 24 Preludes, The Bells, Night Vigil. Bela Bartok – Concerto for Orchestra, Music for strings, percussion and celesta, Violin Concerto no. 2, Piano Concerto no. 3, Dance Suite, Bluebeard's Castle, String Quartet no. 6. George Gershwin – Porgy and Bess, An American in Paris, Rhapsody in Blue, Piano Concerto in fa major, Girl Crazy, Songs. Igor Stravinsky – Petrushka, Le sacre du printemps, L'oiseau de feu, Pulcinella Suite, Histoire du soldat, Octet, Psalms Symphony, Apolon musagete, Symphony in 3 movements. Kurt Weill – Die Dreigroschenoper, The Seven Deadly Sins, Symphony no. 2, Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonni, The Eternal Road. Dmitri Shostakovic – Symphony no. 10, Symphonies no. 1, 4, 5 and 7, Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District, String Quartet no. 8, Piano Concerto no. 2, Piano, Trumpet Concerto. All those composers are 20th century composers, they have composed modern music which I like very much, maybe not as much as 19th century's music, but still Rachmaninov's piano concerti are among the best piano concerti ever composed, Prokofiev has composed some of the finest musical works as his symphonies, concerti and Peter and the Wolf. Bartok's music is not so easy to listen, yet I like very much his concerti and chamber music. Gershwin's music is the American music I like most, especially Porgy and Bess, An American in Paris, Rhapsody in Blue, and his songs and musicals. Stravinsky's ballet music is exhilarating, especially Petrushka and Le sacre du printemps. I like some of Shostakovic's symphonies and chamber music. Finally, Kurt Weill is one of the composers I like most, especially Die Dreigroschenoper, Rise & Fall of Mahagonni.

Composers whom I like moderately are: Gaetano Donizetti – Luccia di Lammermoor, Don Pasquale, L'elisir d'amore, Anna Bolena, Lucrezia Borgia, La fille du regiment, Maria Stuarda, Sinfonias, Concerti, Quartets. Vincenzo Bellini – Norma, I puritani, La sonnambula, Il pirata. Mikhail Glinka – Overture Ruslan and Lyudmila, Jota Aragonesa, Kamarinskaya, A Life for the Tsar, Symphonies. Alexander Borodin – Symphony no. 2, String Quartet no. 2, Prince Igor, In the Steppes of Central Asia. Modest Mussorgsky– Boris Godunov, Night on bald mountain, Pictures at an exhibition, Khovanshchina. Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov – Scheherazade, Capriccio Espagnol, The golden cockerel, The snow maiden, The Russian Easter Festival Overture. Anton Bruckner – Symphony no. 8, Symphonies no. 4, 5, 7, 9. Richard Wagner - Der Fliegende Hollander, Lohengrin, Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Parsifal, Tannhauser, The Ring of the Nibelung: Das Rheingold, Die Walkure, Siegfried, Die gotterdammerung, Tristan und Isolde. I have written a lot in this book about my ambivalent attitude towards Wagner's music and how I tried to listen to it. Anyhow, I believe what the experts say that he was a genius, so was Picasso, and Joyce, but I feel much closer as I have stated in this book to Verdi, Renoir, and Zola. I like Donizetti's and Bellini's operas of whom I've heard only arias and never the full operas. I like Russian music, but mainly short works and not long operas. I enjoy much Bruckner's music.

Other liked composers – Juan Arriaga, Louis Spohr, Karl Maria von Weber, Bedrich Smetana, Edouard Lalo, Leo Delibes, Hugo Wolf, Ruggero Leoncavallo, Isaac Albeniz, Gabriel Faure, Carl Nielsen, Erik Satie, Alexander Scriabin, Ferruccio Busoni, Edward Elgar, Richard Strauss, Ralph Vaughan Williams, Enrique Granados, Mily Balakirev, Henrik Wieniawski, Emmanuel Chabrier, Ernest Chausson, Amilcare Ponchielli, Pietro Mascagni, Louis Gottschalk, Leos Janacek, Zoltan Kodaly, Frederick Delius, Gustav Holst, Charles Ives, Samuel Barber, William Walton, Ottorino Respighi, Arnold Schonberg, Alban Berg, Paul Hindemith, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Arthur Honegger, Francis Poulenc, Darius Milhaud, Frank Martin, Boguslaw Martinu, Karol Shimanovsky, Aram Khachaturian, Aaron Copland, Elliott Carter, Joaquin Rodrigo, Olivier Messiaen, Benjamin Britten, Leonard Bernstein, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen. Some of those composers I like more: Spohr, Weber, Smetana, Delibes, Khachaturian, Albeniz, Richard Strauss, Granados, Chabrier, Mascagni, Respighi, Villa-Lobos, Copland, Rodrigo, Bernstein. This book comprises many references to composers and musicians, in the biographies chapter – on Verdi, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, on Verdi's operas – Rigoletto, etc., in my diary and so on.

5.5 CORY'S FAMILY LOVE OF MUSIC AND RELATED COSMOPOLITAN ANECDOTES

Finally, a few words about my children's and grandchildren's love for music. Amir was very talented in his piano lessons, and when he had to focus on his studies he ceased his lessons but still plays very well the piano for his pleasure. He even saved me from trouble when we were invited at an English colleague's dinner with many Jewish guests, who came to meet the Israeli guest of honor. It was a very "aristocratic" dinner with rich and famous persons, and some of them started to boast about their ancestors' achievements. I thought to tell them that my father worked at an English insurance company in Cairo as a human resources manager. When he decided to immigrate to Israel he had to disclose to the general manager where we were heading as he wanted to receive his severance payment in France, where we made a stopover in our way from Egypt to Israel. His boss tried to dissuade him to immigrate to Israel by telling him that all the Israelis over there were thieves. My father, who was very polite and needed the severance payment, tried to answer jokingly how can he be so sure of that, and his boss answered that he was a Major in the British army during the mandate on Palestine. But still, my father argued, all of them are thieves? Well, his boss answered not all of them, let us say half of them. You see, my father said joyously I'll deal with the other half. Don't rejoice too much, answered him the pro-Semite boss, the other half tries to steal also in order to recuperate their money that was stolen. When I read about our prime minister who went to jail for two years of imprisonment, so many ministers including the finance minister who stole money and went to jail, a president who was forced to resign (and another one who raped his secretary), the CEO of the largest bank who was sent to jail, tycoons who don't repay their debts to the public and banks by the billions, hundreds of others who steal, and thousands who are not caught, Israel that deteriorates from the 14th place in Transparency International Ethical Ranking to the 37th place, I am afraid that the future will prove that my father's boss was not mistaken and what he said could become true. This is the main reason why I write and lecture so vehemently on business ethics. I don't want to be part of a state ruled by corruption, leaders who are thieves and rapers, as every day we hear about a new scandal of sexual harassment at the top levels of the police, embezzlement, theft and bribes in the government – civil servants and politicians, unethical conduct of businessmen... It is enough that we live in an eternal conflict with our neighbors, we suffer from terrorism, quality of life is deteriorating, crime and violence are increasing, too many cases of tax evasion – legal but unethical or illegal, poor achievements in sustainability, it is really too much for a Zionist!

Back to London - I didn't tell them this story, fearing to offend them. Then I thought to tell them that my father studied until the age of 16 at the Scottish Mission School in Smyrna, he had a tapestry of Lord Balfour in our two room apartments in Haifa, he anglicized his name by changing the Spanish ending of Cori that all our family used to Cory with an English Y, and finally that he worshiped the Queen and her family and had photos of all the Royal family all over his apartment, more numerous than the photos of his grandchildren. But I was not sure that their British sense of humor would cope with those revelations. So, I chose to tell them about the history of our family up to the town of Coria in Spain, without emphasizing too much on our Greek, Egyptian and Turkish sojourn of a few hundreds years. And I made a mistake, Talleyrand used to say "Surtout pas de zele" – don't be too zealous, and at the last moment I added an additional chapter to our glorious family history – that after leaving Spain our family emigrated to England (that was before I "learned" of our Portuguese saga), and from there they continued to Italy, Greece and Turkey. An embarrassed silence prevailed over the table, and polite coughs ensued, until finally one of the "aristocrats" told me that in 1492, when we were expelled from Spain, there were no Jews in England as they were expelled long before and returned long after. My son Amir who saw my embarrassment proposed to play for them on the piano, so we left the dining room, he gave them a very nice recital, and they forgave me my blunder. Amir even adopted Richard Clayderman's gestures after I took him to his recital when he visited Israel.

Shirly loves the most music and is up-to-date with all the modern music, pop, musicals, etc. As a teenager she worshipped Michael Jackson, had all his records, photos, books, and a two meter cardboard statue of him. When he came to Israel she went to see him and even tried to meet him with hundreds of other teenagers, but to no avail. She sang and danced all his songs and dances, studied very hard dance and steps, appeared on all the shows of her dancing class and school and choreographed some of them. She even had her debut on Broadway... In one of our numerous visits to New York we took her to see Grease on Broadway, as we arrived early, the dancers of the play who were already dancing, asked teenagers from the public to come and dance on stage. Without thinking twice, Shirly jumped to the stage and danced with the other teenagers and dancers for ten minutes until the play began. So, she boasts that she has already made her debut on Broadway. She even wanted to try her luck and stay in New York for a couple of years as a friend of hers did, but we convinced her that it is better for her and her cash flow to study computers, as she excelled in mathematics besides dancing. Her husband Ronny, who plays perfectly the guitar and sings as well, but works as a banker..., gave her a concert with friends on their wedding night to the delight of Shirly and all the relatives and friends. She probably has the genes of my wife Ruthy who played the accordion and trumpet quite well, and her son Noam plays also the guitar. Amir's daughter Noga plays very well the violin which she studied from early childhood, but plays also the piano although she didn't learn it. Finally, Joseph's son Doron plays very well the guitar and sings, studying at a music high school, while his grandfather prays that it will not be his career, as he wants that his grandchildren would be like their parents – an architect like Joseph, a lawyer like Nira his wife, a businessman like me and Amir, a psychologist like his wife Ella, a programmer like Shirly, or a banker like her husband Ronny. None of us wish them to be an ethicist like me in my second career or a teacher like Ruthy. The other children of Joseph – Tomer excels in sports and Ophir is a born breakdancer, the other son of Amir Itai dances perfectly well, and the other children of Shirly Ido is a born actor who has the lead roles, and Yael who sings so well to the delight of their parents and grandparents.

About a hundred books and a hundred videos on the history of business, economics, ethics, etc., and especially on the History of Capitalism, and the Great Recession of 2007-2010, can be seen in the lists of professional books in the document Cultural Activities of Cory in 2011-2013 on Cory's website, as well as in the bibliography of Cory's Courses.

ON EUROPOCENTRISM AND WESTERN CULTURE

This is the right place to discuss Eurocentrism/Europocentrism/Western Culture. This term has become pejorative as it implies that Europe is in the center of the world, its culture is the best, and all the other cultures are inferior. We are all aware that the worst crimes against humanity originated in Europe – the Nazi regime killing millions of civilians in World War II and implementing the Final Solution for the Jews by exterminating six million Jews in the Holocaust, the Communist regime killing millions of civilians in Russia by trying to implement by force a utopian economic concept, the Colonial regime that was almost uniquely European which subjugated millions of Africans, Asians and Americans, killing the "natives", enslaving them, denying them civil and economic rights. I personally, advocate an assimilation of all countries to a model which can be called European/American/Western, but would rather be called Humanism or Humane Capitalism, with civil and economic rights, based on the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Scandinavian/European socio-economic model, that has nothing to do with race but rather with religion and a global Golden Rule – One should treat others as one would like others to treat oneself, and – One should not treat others in ways that one would not like to be treated. I have focused my ethical ideology on this rule and quoted it in my books and in this book, emphasizing that this rule is universal and common to most of the world religions and philosophies, sometimes in Asia even prior to any European or Semitic religion/philosophy.

I observe the situation today – not in the history – and today development, ethics, democracy, human rights, technological progress, are practised especially in "Western" societies, including Japan, South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong, Israel, Chile, Barbados, or Botswana. Bearing in mind that those countries are not in the West, but rather in the East, and of course are not Europeans, one should refer to Western – as to the development, democracy, ethics, human rights and technological progress that prevail and originate mainly in Europe, the US, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and were adopted by other countries in the East. This is what I mean by Eurocentrism/Western/Humane socio-economic culture, which is universal, but unfortunately does not prevail in Arab and Muslim countries and in many developing countries, not because of the Quran, which is as humane as the other religions, but due to a faulty and fundamentalist implementation of the Quran and human rights, which prevents in most of the cases democracy and human rights, gender equality, and keep their countries far away from development.

As far as literature, drama, music, and other cultural components is concerned, I enjoy most European culture, probably because this is my heritage since my early childhood, and the fact that my forefathers came from Spain/Portugal, I was educated in a French and Ladino environment, and Israel is a European state, in most of its cultural components, except of course the language and folklore which is mixed – western/eastern. But also as a youngster and an adult – I didn't opt to practise Eastern philosophies or visit Eastern states, as many Israelis and Europeans do, but rather remained faithful to my original heritage, which I perceive nevertheless not as better or more sophisticated than other cultures. Yet, I enjoyed very much the semester I spent in Singapore, an Asian country with English influence, and felt there almost at home.

AGAINST RACIST REMARKS ON JEWS AND MUSLIMS

I am aware of the fallacy in the racist saying that "most of the Muslims are not terrorists but most of the terrorists are Muslims", which is similar to the racist saying that "most of the Jews are not responsible for the 2008 Great Recession, but most of the responsables for that disaster are Jews". This, bearing in mind the high percentage of Jews among neo-liberals ideologists starting of course with Milton Friedman, the high percentage of Jewish investment bankers who committed ethical crimes and were not convicted, the high percentage of Jewish officials who abolished most of the regulation and supervision of the banks and finance, Fed officials – some of them even belonging to the inner circle of the Jewish libertarian Ayn Rand, who supported ethical egoism and laissez-faire capitalism and rejected altruism. Even, the only mega-criminal Bernie Madoff, who was found guilty and was sentenced to 150 years imprisonment after robbing from his investors $18 billion, was Jewish – a fact that did not inhibit him from stealing primarily from Jews. Why do we tell that, in spite of the fear that this statement will be construed as racist? We tell it, exactly because all those wrongdoers did not commit their crimes because they were Jews, as part of a Jewish ideology of embezzlement, and Jews are the first ones to denounce them. We don't glorify them in schools, naming squares in their names, as Palestinians leaders do to their terrorists who killed thousands of civilians. Furthermore, in parallel, many of those who fight for a humane capitalism are Jews, like Joseph Stiglitz and Naomi Klein. Because the humane Jews have a strong impact, perhaps even larger than the "ethical egoists", because in parallel to the negative influence of some Jews, there is a very large positive influence of many other Jews, also among the Nobel-prize winners, who outnumber by far the percentage of the Jews in the world population. All that, as stated above, in comparison to extremist Palestinian/Arab/Moslem leaders backed by many Arab states, Arab and Western intellectuals, Imams and Tycoons who glorify the terrorists who killed innocent civilians by the thousands calling them freedom fighters in 9/11 or in the Intifada, while demonizing the Israelis and the Jews, in their schools, madrassas, and newspapers, killing innocent Jews in Europe and Argentina, innocent Americans and Europeans, and of course innocent Arabs and Muslims, who are the first victims of their deeds. The problem is with the extreme/fundamentalist leadership.

ON DELEGITIMIZATION OF ISRAEL AND THE JEWS

There is today a diabolic pact between them for the defamation and delegitimation of Israel and the Jews, along the path of the Nazi ideology, that accuses Israel of war crimes and of treating Palestinians as the Nazis treated the Jews. In all the wars and the 100 years of the Palestinian conflict only a few thousands Palestinians were killed, most of them terrorists, and the civilians killed were killed only because the terrorists used them as human shields, none of them was killed on purpose, in order to kill civilians as the terrorists do. Thousands of Israeli civilians were killed and much more would have been killed if they didn't have an adequate protection against thousands of missiles that were launched against the cities of Israel. And who accuses the Jews of Nazi atrocities who killed six million Jews and millions of other people – Europeans and Americans whose countries have killed tens to hundreds of thousands of civilians in Vietnam, Ethiopia, Germany, Japan, Algeria... Israel controls a population of millions of Palestinians since 1967 – if they were Nazis they would have killed all of them like the Nazis did in their Final Solution. On the contrary, it is the Palestinian leadership who wants to annihilate Israel and denies the Holocaust - from the Hamas in Gaza to the President of Palestine Mahmoud Abbas, who denied in his 1983 book "The Other Side: The Secret Relationship Between Nazism and Zionism" based on his PhD dissertation that six million Jews had died in the Holocaust, dismissing it as a "myth" and a "fantastic lie", exactly like the Iranians who deny the Holocaust and want to destroy Israel, exactly like Daesh, Al Qaeda, and all the Moslem fundamentalists do.
